

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

B 1,013,914

GENERAL LIBRARY
UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN.

THE
Hagerman Collection

OF BOOKS RELATING TO HISTORY AND POLITICAL SCIENCE

BOUGHT WITH MONEY PLACED BY JAMES J. HAGERMAN OF CLASS OF '61

IN THE NAME OF Professor Charles Kendall Adams

IN THE YEAR

1883.

30/

H=1

37

HANSARD'S PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES,

THIRD SERIES:

COMMENCING WITH THE ACCESSION OF

WILLIAM IV.

---

31° VICTORIÆ, 1867-8.

---

VOL. CXCI.

COMPRISING THE PERIOD FROM

THE TWENTY-THIRD DAY OF MARCH 1868,

TO

THE EIGHTH DAY OF MAY 1868.

---

Second Volume of the Session.

---

LONDON:

PUBLISHED BY CORNELIUS BUCK,

AT THE OFFICE FOR HANSARD'S PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES,

23, PATERNOSTER ROW [E.C.]

---

1868.

LONDON : CORNELIUS BUCK, PRINTER, 23, PATERNOSTER ROW.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

TO VOLUME CXCI.

THIRD SERIES.

LORDS, MONDAY, MARCH 23, 1868.

Page

Bankruptcy Acts Repeal Bill (No. 30)—

Moved , "That the Bill be now read 2 <sup>a</sup> ,"—( The Lord Chancellor ) ..	1
After debate, Motion agreed to :—Bill read 2 <sup>a</sup> accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on the First Sitting Day after the Recess at Easter .

COMMONS, MONDAY, MARCH 23.

THE IRISH CHURCH ESTABLISHMENT—NOTICE—Observations, Mr. Gladstone; Reply, Mr. Disraeli .. .. .	33
REVISION OF RAILWAYS—Question, Mr. Bazley; Answer, Sir William Hutt ..	35
NAVY—FLOGGING ON BOARD H.M.S. "FAVOURITE"—Question, Mr. Serjeant Gaselee; Answer, Mr. Corry .. .. .	35
ARMY—MORTALITY IN THE 86TH REGIMENT—Question, Mr. Otway; Answer, Sir John Pakington .. .. .	37
IRELAND—DUTY ON SPIRIT LICENCES—Question, General Dunne; Answer, Mr. Selater-Booth .. .. .	38
ARMY—MILITARY PRISONS—Question, Mr. D. Griffith; Answer, Sir J. Pakington	38
GARTER KING AT ARMS—Question, Mr. Alderman Lusk; Answer, Mr. S. Booth	39
COMPULSORY CHURCH RATES ABOLITION BILL—Question, Mr. Newdegate; Answer, Mr. Gladstone .. .. .	39
SALE OF LIQUORS ON SUNDAY BILL—Question, Mr. Roebuck; Answer, Mr. J. A. Smith .. .. .	40

SUPPLY—ARMY ESTIMATES—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

(1.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the number of Land Forces, not exceeding 133,691 Men (including 9,880, all Ranks, to be employed with the Depôts in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland of Regiments serving in Her Majesty's Indian Possessions) be maintained for the Service of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, from the 1st day of April 1868 to the 31st day of March 1869, inclusive" .. .. .	40
After debate, Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the number of Land Forces, not exceeding 135,933 Men (including 9,880, all Ranks, to be employed with the Depôts in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland of Regiments Serving in Her Majesty's Indian Possessions),"—( Mr. Otway .)

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[March 23.]

Page

SUPPLY—ARMY ESTIMATES—Committee—continued.

After further debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn :—Original Question put, and agreed to.

- (2.) 880 Native Indian Troops .. .. . 98
- (3.) £4,249,200, Pay and Allowances, Land Forces, at Home and Abroad.
- (4.) £892,500, Commissariat Establishment, &c.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow ; Committee to sit again upon Wednesday.

Marine Mutiny Bill—

Moved, “That the Bill be now read a second time,”—(Mr. Corry) .. 99

After short debate, Motion agreed to :—Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday.

Representation of the People (Scotland) Bill [Bill 29]—

Order for Committee read .. .. . 99

After short debate, Committee deferred till Monday, 20th April.

Registration of Writs (Scotland) Bill (Lords) [Bill 62]—

Moved, “That the Bill be now read a second time,”—(The Lord Advocate) 100

After short debate, Motion agreed to :—Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday, 23rd April.

Compulsory Church Rates Abolition Bill [Bill 72]—

Order for Third Reading read .. .. . 101

After short debate, Third Reading deferred till To-morrow.

GRAND JURY PRESENTMENTS (IRELAND)—

Moved, “That the Select Committee on Grand Jury Presentments do consist of Nineteen Members,”—(Mr. Vance) .. 101

After short debate, Moved, “That the debate be now adjourned,”—(Sir John Gray :)—The House divided ; Ayes 17, Noes 18 ; Majority 1 :—Original Question again proposed.

Moved, “That this House do now adjourn,”—(The O’Conor Don.)

Motion and Original Question, by leave, withdrawn.

Perth and Brechin Provisional Orders Confirmation Bill—Ordered (The Lord Advocate, Mr. Secretary Gathorne Hardy, Sir James Fergusson) ; presented, and read the first time [Bill 74] .. .. . 102

Petty Sessions and Lock-up Houses, &c. Bill—Ordered (Sir James Fergusson, Mr. Secretary Gathorne Hardy) ; presented, and read the first time [Bill 75] .. 102

LORDS, TUESDAY, MARCH 24.

THE NEW PUBLIC OFFICES—Question, Lord Redesdale ; Answer, The Earl of Malmesbury .. .. . 102

Education Bill [H.L.]—

Bill to regulate the Distribution of Sums granted by Parliament for Elementary Education in England and Wales, presented (The Lord President) ; and, after debate, read 1<sup>a</sup> (No. 53.)

Poor Relief Bill [H.L.] (No. 89)—

Moved, “That the Bill be now read 2<sup>a</sup>,”—(The Earl of Devon) .. 138 Motion agreed to :—Bill read 2<sup>a</sup>, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

COMMONS, TUESDAY, MARCH 24.

PRIVATE BILL LEGISLATION—STANDING ORDER 131—

Moved, “That Standing Order 131 (Competition to be a ground of locus standi) be repealed,”—(Mr. Dodson) .. .. . 139

After short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[ March 4.]	Page
THE BOUNDARY COMMISSION—ASSISTANT BOUNDARY COMMISSIONERS' REPORTS — Questions, Mr. Serjeant Gaselee, Mr. Darby Griffith ; Answers, Mr. Disraeli	146
INDIA — BANK OF BOMBAY — Question, Sir Henry Rawlinson ; Answer, Sir Stafford Northcote	147
CONTRACT LAW FOR INDIA— Question, Mr. Kinnaird ; Answer, Sir S. Northcote	147
NAVY ESTIMATES— Question, Mr. Childers ; Answer, Lord Henry Lennox	147
LICENCES—Moved, “That, in the opinion of this House, it is desirable that all Licences injuriously affecting the Industry and Commerce of the Country should be abolished,”—( Mr. Marsh )	148
After debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn .
SCIENTIFIC INSTRUCTION—Moved, “That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the provisions for giving instruction in theoretical and applied Science to the Industrial Classes,”—( Mr. Samuelson )	160
After debate, Motion agreed to :—And, on March 27, Committee nominated : —List of the Committee	186
POST HORSE AND CARRIAGE LICENCES DUTIES, AND HACKNEY CARRIAGE DUTIES— Moved , “That this House will immediately resolve itself into a Committee to consider the Acts relating thereto,”—( Mr. Alderman Lawrence )	187
After short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn .
Boroughs and Divisions of Counties Bill— Motion for Leave ( Mr. Secretary Gathorne Hardy )	196
Motion agreed to :—Bill to settle and describe the Limits of certain Boroughs and the Divisions of certain Counties in England and Wales, in so far as respects the Election of Members to serve in Parliament, ordered ( Mr. Secretary G. Hardy, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir J. Fergusson. )
London Coal and Wine Duties Continuance Bill [Bill 43]— Order for Committee read :— Moved , “That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair,”—( Lord John Manners )	196
Amendment proposed, To leave out from the word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “this House will, upon this day six months, resolve itself into the said Committee,”—( Mr. Candlish ),—instead thereof.
After short debate, Question put, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question :”—The House divided ; Ayes 147, Noes 33 ; Majority 114.
Main Question, “That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair,” put, and agreed to :—Bill considered in Committee.
After short time spent therein, Bill reported ; as amended, to be considered upon Thursday .
Railways (Guards' and Passengers' Communication) Bill [Bill 66]— Order for Second Reading read	206
After short debate, Second Reading deferred till Tuesday , 21st April.
Compulsory Church Rates Abolition Bill [Bill 72]— Moved , “That the Bill be now read the third time,”—( Mr. Gladstone )	206
After short debate, Moved , “That this House do now adjourn,”—( Mr. Newdegate ),—put, and negatived .
Question again proposed, “That the Bill be now read the third time.” Moved , “That the debate be now adjourned,”—( Mr. Schreiber :)—The House divided ; Ayes 28, Noes 131 ; Majority 103.
After further short debate, Original Question put, and agreed to :—Bill read the third time, and passed .
Investment of Trust Funds Act Amendment Bill—Ordered ( Mr. Henry B. Sheridan, Mr. Ayrton )	207

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[March 24.]	Page
Revenue Officers Disabilities Removal Bill—Ordered ( Mr. Monk, Sir Harry Verney, Mr. Otway ); presented, and read the first time [Bill 76] .. ..	208
Antislavery Bill—Ordered ( Mr. Dodson, Sir John Pakington, The Judge Advocate General ); presented, and read the first time .. ..	208
Expenditure and Means—Resolution [March 23] reported, and agreed to :—Consolidated Fund (£6,000,000) :—Bill ordered ( Mr. Dodson, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Sclater-Booth ); presented, and read the first time .. ..	208

COMMONS, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 25.

IRELAND—THE TOWER OF ARDFERT—KERRY GRAND JURY—Question, The O'Donoghue; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland ..	208
---	-----

Grand Jury Cess (Ireland) Bill [Bill 14]

Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—( Mr. Stacpoole ) ..	209
Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months,"—( The Earl of Mayo :)—After debate, Question put, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question :"—The House divided ; Ayes 57, Noes 70; Majority 13 :—Words added :—Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to :—Second Reading put off for six months.

Industrial Schools (Ireland) Bill [Bill 6]—

Order for Committee read :—Moved, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair,"—( The O'Conor Don ) .. ..	217
---	-----

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words, "this House will, upon this day six months, resolve itself into the said Committee,"—(Mr. Vance,)—instead thereof.

After short debate, Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question :—The House divided; Ayes 82, Noes 46; Majority 36 :—Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to :—Bill considered in Committee.

After short time spent therein, Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

Unincorporated's Charity Bill [Bill 67]—

Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—( Mr. Beresford Hope ) ..	224
Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months,"—( Mr. Shaw-Lefevre :)—After debate, Question put, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question :"—The House divided ; Ayes 69, Noes 83; Majority 14 :—Words added :—Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to :—Second Reading put off for six months.

Antislavery Bill—

Order for Second Reading read .. ..	238
After short debate, Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow .

GRAND JURY PRESENTMENTS (IRELAND)—

Moved, "That the Select Committee on Grand Jury Presentments (Ireland) do consist of Nineteen Members,"—( Mr. Vance ) .. ..	238
After short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn .

LORDS, THURSDAY, MARCH 26.

ECCLIASTICAL TITLES IN GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND—Moved, That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the Operation of any Law or Laws as to the Assumption of Ecclesiastical Titles in Great Britain and Ireland; and whether any and what Alteration should be made therein,—( The Earl Stanhope ) ..	239
After debate, Motion agreed to .
And, on March 30, Committee nominated :—List of the Committee ..	255

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[ March 26. ]	Page
Compulsory Church Rates Abolition Bill— Presented (The Earl Russell) ; read 1 <sup>a</sup> (No. 55) .. .. .	255
Medical Practitioners (Colonies) Bill [H.L.]— Presented (The Duke of Buckingham and Chandos) ; read 1 <sup>a</sup> (No. 56) .. .. .	255
COMMONS, THURSDAY, MARCH 26.
LOCAL GOVERNMENT ACTS—Question, Mr. Pim; Answer, The Earl of Mayo ..	256
ARMY—COOKING APPARATUS—Question, Colonel Sykes; Answer, Sir John Pakington .. .. .	257
POST OFFICE—EASTERN MAIL SERVICES—Question, Mr. Crawford; Answer, Mr. Solater-Booth .. .. .	258
RATES FOR SANITARY IMPROVEMENTS—Question, Viscount Enfield; Answer, Sir James Fergusson .. .. .	258
IRELAND—TREATMENT OF PRISONERS CONVICTED OF SEDITIOUS LIBEL—Question, Mr. Stock; Answer, The Earl of Mayo .. .. .	259
ARMY—GRANT FOR FORTIFICATIONS—Question, Colonel Sykes; Answer, Mr. Solater-Booth .. .. .	260
THE SURVIVORS OF THE “ST. ABBE” — Question, Mr. Baillie Cochrane; Answer, Sir Stafford Northcote .. .. .	260
INDIA—THE BONUS COMMITTEE—Question, Mr. Bruen; Answer, Sir Stafford Northcote .. .. .	261
DR. ROGERS, MEDICAL OFFICER OF THE STRAND UNION—Question, Sir John Simeon; Answer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach .. .. .	261
INDIA—RELIGIOUS PROVISION FOR SOLDIERS IN INDIA—Question, Mr. O'Reilly; Answer, Sir Stafford Northcote .. .. .	262
ARMY—DAILY PAYMENT OF MEN—Question, Colonel W. Stuart; Answer, Sir John Pakington .. .. .	263
PETIT JURIES (IRELAND) BILL—Question, Mr. Esmonde; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland .. .. .	263
PARLIAMENT—ARRANGEMENT OF BUSINESS—Question, Mr. Gladstone; Answer, Mr. Disraeli .. .. .	263
STATE OF IRELAND—THE REV. MR. WILSON—Personal Explanation, Mr. Gregory .. .. .	264
SUPPLY—Order for Committee read; Motion made, and Question proposed, “That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair:”—
BANKRUPTCY LAW—Observations, Mr. Moffatt; Reply, The Attorney General	265
Motion, “That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair,” agreed to.
SUPPLY—ARMY ESTIMATES— considered in Committee .. .. .	268
(In the Committee.)
(1.) £322,900, Clothing Establishments.
(2.) £506,300, Barrack Establishment.
(3.) £26,800, Divine Service.
(4.) £13,000, Martial Law.
(5.) £280,800, Hospital Establishment.
(6.) £686,800, Militia and Inspection of Reserve Forces.
(7.) £58,000, Yeomanry Cavalry.
(8.) £285,100, Volunteer Corps.—After debate, Vote agreed to .. .. .	284
(9.) £39,600, Enrolled Pensioners and Army Reserve Force.—After short debate, Vote agreed to .. .. .	284
(10.) Motion made, and Question proposed, “That a sum, not exceeding £768,400, be granted to Her Majesty (in addition to the sum of £200,000 already voted on account), towards defraying the Charge of Superintending Establishment of, and Expenditure for, Works, Buildings, and Repairs, at Home and Abroad, which will come in course of payment from the 1st day of April 1868 to the 31st day of March 1869, inclusive.”
After debate, Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Item of £3,000, for Billiard Rooms in Barracks, be omitted from the proposed Vote,”—( Mr. Lusk ) .. .. .	295
After further short debate, Question put :—The Committee divided ; Ayes 24, Noes 72; Majority 48 :—Original Question put, and agreed to. Resolutions to be reported To-morrow ; Committee to sit again To-morrow.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

	Page
[ March 26. ]
Election Petitions and Corrupt Practices at Elections (re-committed) Bill [Bill 63]—
Order for Committee read:— Moved , "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair" .. .. .	296
Amendment proposed,
To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House, while earnestly desiring to provide the best tribunal for the trial of Controverted Elections, to reduce the cost of such trials, and to ensure the detection and punishment of bribery and corruption, is not prepared to assent to any measure which aims at the destruction of its ancient right and privilege to hold in its own hands the power of determining who are its Members, a right which the House has asserted and exercised to its great advantage for several hundred years, and upon the possession of which the dignity and independence of this House and the constitutional freedom of the electors greatly depend,"—( Mr. Alexander Mitchell. )
After long debate, Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question," put, and agreed to.
Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.
Bill considered in Committee .. .. .	321
Moved , "That the Chairman report Progress,"—( Mr. Disraeli :)—Motion agreed to :—Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.
Tutiny Bill—
Bill considered in Committee .. .. .	321
After short time spent therein, Bill reported ; as amended, to be considered upon Monday next.
London Coal and Wine Duties Continuance Bill [Bill 43]—
Order for Consideration of the Bill, as amended, read .. .. .	326
After short debate, Bill to be read the third time To-morrow.
Ecclesiastical Commissioners Orders in Council Bill (Lords) [Bill 69]—
Order for Second Reading read .. .. .	327
After short debate, Bill read a second time, and committed for Wednesday next.
Local Government Supplemental Bill—Ordered ( Mr. Secretary Gathorne Hardy, Sir James Fergusson ); presented , and read the first time [Bill 77] .. .. .	327

LORDS, FRIDAY, MARCH 27.

SCOTLAND—POOR ASSESSMENT—Motion for,
Return from each Parish in the several Counties of East Lothian, Mid Lothian, Lanark, Renfrew, Ayr, Aberdeen, Fife, and Forfar, showing in a tabular Form the Deductions allowed by Parochial Boards to the several Classes of Occupiers of Lands, Minerals, Dwelling Houses, Public Works, and Railways; and showing the Gross Rent which, subject to such Deductions, is required in order to give to each Class of Occupiers a clear Rent of £12 rated for Poor Assessment: Also, for a Return of the Parishes in Scotland in which the Occupiers are not rated for the Relief of the Poor,—( The Earl of Argyll ) .. .. .	328
Motion agreed to.
UNITED STATES—THE NEUTRALITY LAWS—THE "ALABAMA" CLAIMS—MOTION FOR PAPERS—Moved,
"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for, Copies or Extracts of any further Correspondence that may have taken place between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of the United States in reference to the Alabama and other claims,"—( The Earl Russell ) .. .. .	333
After debate, Motion (by Leave of the House) withdrawn.

COMMONS, FRIDAY, MARCH 27.

PRIVATE BILL LEGISLATION—Personal Explanation, Mr. S. Cave, Sir J. Hanmer	351
ESTABLISHED CHURCH (IRELAND)—Notice of Amendment ( Lord Stanley ) .. .. .	356
THE PARIS EXHIBITION—Question, Mr. Bayley Potter; Answer, Lord R. Montagu	356

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[March 27.]	Page
METROPOLIS—DEPTFORD CREEK OUTFALLS—Question, Mr. Alderman Salomons ; Answer, Mr. Gatherne Hardy .. .. .	357
SCOTLAND — ROADS—Question, Mr. Waldegrave-Leslie ; Answer, The Lord Advocate .. .. .	357
IRELAND—THE RIVER SHANNON—Question, Colonel French ; Answer, The Earl of Mayo .. .. .	357
ARMY—COMMISSIONS—Question, Sir T. Lloyd ; Answer, Sir John Pakington .. .. .	358
POST OFFICE—THE SOUTHERN DISTRICT—Question, Mr. Locke ; Answer, Mr. Solater-Booth .. .. .	358
REPRESENTATION OF BRISTOL—Question, Mr. Neville-Grenville ; Answer, Mr. Powell .. .. .	359
WAR IN BRAZIL—Question, Mr. Horsman ; Answer, Lord Stanley .. .. .	359
ARMY—TROOPS IN THE MAURITIUS—Question, Mr. Otway ; Answer, Sir John Pakington .. .. .	360
SUPPLY—Order for Committee read ; Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair :"—
COMPULSORY PILOTAGE—RESOLUTION—Amendment proposed, To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, representing that, in the opinion of this House, measures ought to be taken for the early abolition of Compulsory Pilotage, with due regard to existing interests, and for requiring Pilotage Authorities to examine and license all competent persons applying to them for the purpose of qualifying to act as pilots,"—(Mr. Candlish,)—instead thereof .. .. .	361
Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question :—After debate, Amendment, by leave, withdrawn .
BRITISH MUSEUM—Observations, Mr. Gregory, Mr. Beresford Hope ; Reply, Mr. Disraeli .. .. .	388
SYSTEMS OF GOVERNMENT IN INDIA—Observations, Lord William Hay, Mr. Smollett, Mr. Fawcett .. .. .	405
INDIA—BANK OF BOMBAY—Question, Mr. Dyce Nicol ; Answer, Sir Stafford Northcote :—Debate thereon .. .. .	426
IRELAND—IMPRISONMENT OF MESSRS. SULLIVAN AND PIGOTT—Question, Mr. Maguire ; Answer, The Earl of Mayo :—Debate thereon .. .. .	439
OVERLOADING OF PASSENGER STEAMERS—Question, Mr. Sinclair Aytoun ; Answer, Mr. Stephen Cave .. .. .	450
Motion, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," by leave, withdrawn :—Committee deferred till Monday next.

LORDS, SATURDAY, MARCH 28.

Their Lordships met ; and having gone through the business on the Paper, without debate, House adjourned.

LORDS, MONDAY, MARCH 30.

HOSTILITIES IN THE RIVER PLATE—Observations, Lord Lyveden ; Reply, The Earl of Malmesbury .. .. .	452
Poor Relief Bill [H.L.] (No. 39) — Moved , "That the House do now resolve itself into a Committee on the said Bill,"—(The Earl of Devon) .. .. .	457
After short debate, Motion (by Leave of the House) withdrawn ; and Bill referred to a Select Committee.
And, on April 2, Committee nominated :—List of the Committee .. .. .	465
Sea Fisheries Bill (No. 46)— Moved , "That the Bill be now read 2 <sup>a</sup> ,"—(The Duke of Richmond) .. .. .	465
After short debate, Motion agreed to :—Bill read 2 <sup>a</sup> accordingly.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

COMMONS, MONDAY, MARCH 30.

	Page
IRELAND—STAKE-NETS ON THE SHANNON—Question, Colonel French ; Answer, The Earl of Mayo .. .. .	467
COMMISSION ON FALSE WEIGHTS AND MEASURES—Question, Lord Eustace Cecil ; Answer, Mr. Gathorne Hardy .. .. .	467
METROPOLIS—BURLINGTON HOUSE—Question, Mr. Cowper ; Answer, Lord John Manners .. .. .	467
IRELAND—SEARCHING SUSPICIOUS PERSONS—Question, Mr. Blake ; Answer, The Earl of Mayo .. .. .	468
ARMY—COOKING APPARATUS—Question, Mr. Thomson Hankey ; Answer, Sir John Pakington .. .. .	468
IRELAND—CASE OF MR. JOHNSTON—Question, Colonel Forde ; Answer, The Earl of Mayo .. .. .	469
ESTABLISHED CHURCH (IRELAND)—
Moved , “ That this House will immediately resolve itself into a Committee to consider the said Acts,”—( Mr. Gladstone ) .. .. .	469
Amendment proposed,
To leave out from the word “ House ” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “ while admitting that considerable modifications in the Temporalities of the United Church in Ireland may, after the pending inquiry, appear to be expedient, is of opinion that any proposition tending to the disestablishment or disendowment of that Church ought to be reserved for the decision of a new Parliament,”—( Lord Stanley ),—instead thereof .. .. .	495
Question proposed, “ That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question : ”—After long debate, Debate adjourned till To-morrow .
Mutiny Bill—
Bill, as amended, considered .. .. .	556
After short debate, Bill to be read the third time To-morrow .
Marine Mutiny Bill—
Order for Committee read .. .. .	559
After short debate, Bill considered in Committee.
After short time spent therein, Bill reported ; as amended, to be considered To-morrow .
Marriages (Frampton Mansel) Bill—Ordered ( Sir James Fergusson, Mr. Secretary Gathorne Hardy ) ; presented , and read the first time [Bill 79] .. .. .	559
Prisons (Compensation to Officers) Bill—Ordered ( Sir James Fergusson, Mr. Secretary Gathorne Hardy ) ; presented , and read the first time [Bill 80] .. .. .	560

LORDS, TUESDAY, MARCH 31.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—REPORT OF SELECT COMMITTEE—RESOLUTION—
Moved , “ To agree to the Report of the Select Committee on Business of the House,”—( The Lord Privy Seal ) .. .. .	560
After debate, Motion (by Leave of the House) withdrawn .
PROXIES—RESOLUTION—
Resolved , That the following Order be added to the Roll of Standing Orders :
“ Standing Order XXXIIa. Ordered, That the Practice of calling for Proxies on a Division shall be discontinued, and that Two Days’ Notice be given of any Motion for the Suspension of this Standing Order.”

COMMONS, TUESDAY, MARCH 31.

DISMISSAL OF AN INSPECTOR OF THE SURREY CONSTABULARY—Question, Mr. Onslow ; Answer, Mr. Gathorne Hardy .. .. .	571
Mutiny Bill—
Order for Third Reading read .. .. .	573
After short debate, Bill read the third time, and passed .

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[ March 31. ]	Page
Marine Mutiny Bill—
As amended, considered .. .. .	573
Moved , “That the Bill be now read the third time,”—( Lord Henry Lennox. )
After short debate, Motion agreed to :—Bill read the third time, and passed .
INDIA—IRRIGATION—Postponement of Motion (Mr. Kinnaird) ..	575
ESTABLISHED CHURCH (IRELAND)—
Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [30th March],
“That this House will immediately resolve itself into a Committee to consider the said Acts,”—( Mr. Gladstone :)
And which Amendment was,
To leave out from the word “House” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “while admitting that considerable modifications in the Temporalities of the United Church in Ireland may, after the pending inquiry, appear to be expedient, is of opinion that any proposition tending to the disestablishment or disendowment of that Church ought to be reserved for the decision of a new Parliament,”—( Lord Stanley ), instead thereof.
Question again proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question :”—Debate resumed .. .. .	575
After long debate, Debate further adjourned till Thursday .
COMMONS, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 1.
FEVER AT THE MAURITIUS—THE 86TH REGIMENT—Questions, Mr. Barclay, Mr. Whalley ; Answer, Mr. Adderley .. .. .	660
Religious, &amp;c. Buildings (Sites) Bill [Bill 18]—
Moved , “That the Bill be now read the second time,”—( Mr. Hadfield ) ..	662
After short debate, Motion agreed to :—Bill read a second time, and committed for Tuesday , 21st April.
Libel Bill [Bill 3]—
Moved , “That the Bill be now read the second time,”—( Sir Colman O’Loghlen ) .. .. .	664
After debate, Motion agreed to :—Bill read a second time, and committed for Wednesday , 20th May.
Artizans’ and Labourers’ Dwellings Bill [Bill 1]—
Bill considered in Committee .. .. .	672
After short time spent therein, Committee report Progress ; to sit again upon Tuesday , 21st of April.
Electric Telegraphs Bill—
Motion for Leave ( Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer ) .. .. .	678
After short debate, Motion agreed to :—Bill to enable Her Majesty’s Postmaster General to acquire, work, and maintain Electric Telegraphs, ordered ( Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer , Mr. Stephen Cave , Mr. Sclater-Booth ) ; presented , and read the first time [Bill 82.]
United Parishes (Scotland) Bill—Ordered (Mr. Waldegrave-Leslie, Major Walker, Mr. Wellwood Maxwell, Mr. M’Lagan) ; presented, and read the first time [Bill 81]	682

LORDS, THURSDAY, APRIL 2.

PRIVATE BILLS—THE EASTER RECESS—

Resolved , That Standing Order No. 179. Sect. 1. be suspended ; and that the Time for depositing Petitions praying to be heard against Private Bills, which would otherwise expire during the Adjournment of the House, be extended to the First Day on which the House shall sit after the Recess at Easter .. .. .	682
---	-----

Marine Mutiny Bill—

Moved , “That the Bill be now read 2 <sup>a</sup> ,”—( The Earl of Longford ) ..	683
After short debate, Motion agreed to :—Bill read 2 <sup>a</sup> accordingly ; Committee negatived , and Bill to be read 3 <sup>a</sup> To-morrow .

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[April 2.]	Page
Door Relief Bill [H.L.]—Select Committee nominated :—List of the Committee ..	688
PUBLIC PETITIONS—PRINTING PETITIONS—
Moved , “That a Select Committee be appointed to whom all Petitions presented to this House shall be referred, with Instructions to the said Committee to report whether any of the Petitions so referred ought to be printed for the Use of this House,”—( The Earl Russell ) .. .. .	688
After short debate, Motion amended, and agreed to .
Resolved , That a Select Committee be appointed to whom all Petitions presented to this House, other than Petitions relating to Private Bills, shall be referred, with Instructions to the said Committee to direct the printing for the Use of the House of such Petitions as they shall think fit,—( The Earl Russell .)
BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—RESOLUTIONS—
Moved , “That it is expedient that Notice of an Intention to ask a Question should be given in the Minutes, except in Cases which admit of no Delay,”—( The Lord Privy Seal )	690
After short debate, Motion (by Leave of the House) withdrawn .
Moved , That it is desirable where it is intended to make a Statement or raise a Discussion on asking a Question that Notice of the Question should be given in the Orders of the Day and Notices,—( The Lord Chancellor ) .. .. .	693
After short debate, Motion agreed to .
Moved , “That the Committee of Selection are desired to exercise their Discretion in calling for the Service of Lords absent from the House,”—( The Lord Privy Seal .)
Amendment moved , To leave out from (“Selection”) to the end of the Motion for the Purpose of inserting the Words following. (“should in the Exercise of their Discretion call more frequently than at present for the Service of Lords absent from the House,”)—( Lord Chelmsford .)
Amendment (by Leave of the House) withdrawn .
Moved , That the Absence of any Lord from this House, except for sufficient Reason, ought not to prevent the Committee of Selection from calling for his Services,”—( The Viscount Halifax .)
Motion agreed to .
Resolved , That in entering in the Journals the Reports of Bills amended in Committees of the Whole House, the only Name entered therewith shall be that of the Lord who moves the Reception of the Report and takes Charge of the Bill in that Stage,—( The Lord Privy Seal .)
Bills of Exchange and Promissory Notes Bill [H.L.]— Presented ( The Marquess of Clanricarde ); read 1 <sup>a</sup> (No. 65) .. .. .	697

COMMONS, THURSDAY, APRIL 2.

PRIVILEGE—MEMBERS’ SEATS IN THIS HOUSE—Observations, Colonel Greville-Nugent; Reply, Colonel Sykes .. .. .	697
MERCHANT SHIPPING CONSOLIDATION BILL—Question, Mr. Graves; Answer, Mr. Stephen Cave .. .. .	699
TECHNICAL EDUCATION—MR. WHITWORTH’S ENDOWMENT—Question, Mr. Bruce; Answer, Lord Robert Montagu .. .. .	699
COURT OF CHANCERY—SALARIES AND EXPENSES — Question, Mr. Childers; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer .. .. .	700
VACCINATION—SMALL-POX AT WOOLWICH—Question, Sir J. Clarke Jervoise; Answer, Lord Robert Montagu .. .. .	701
ECCLIASTICAL COMMISSIONERS—BENEFICE OF KILPEO, HEREFORD—Question, Colonel Barttelot; Answer, Mr. Mowbray .. .. .	701
LECTION PETITIONS AND CORRUPT PRACTICES AT ELECTIONS BILL—BRIBERY AT MUNICIPAL ELECTIONS—Question, Mr. J. Stuart Mill; Answer, Mr. Disraeli .. .. .	702
USE OF POLICE SERGEANT STONE—Question, Mr. Labouchere; Answer, Mr. Gathorne Hardy .. .. .	702
THE ABYSSINIAN EXPEDITION ESTIMATES—Question, Mr. Fawcett; Answer, Sir Stafford Northcote .. .. .	703

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[April 2.]	Page
CHOLERA IN THE MEDITERRANEAN—Question, Sir J. Clarke Jervoise ; Answer, Lord Stanley .. .. .	703
POOR LAW—GRAVESEND BOARD OF GUARDIANS—Question, Mr. O'Reilly ; Answer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach .. .. .	704
RULE OF THE ROAD AT SEA—Question, Mr. Holland ; Answer, Mr. S. Cave ..	705
INSURRECTION IN CRETE—Question, Mr. Kennedy ; Answer, Lord Stanley ..	705
BOUNDARY BILL—Question, Mr. Watkin ; Answer, Mr. Gathorne Hardy ..	706
ELECTRIC TELEGRAPHS BILL—Question, Mr. Ayrton ; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer .. .. .	706
ESTABLISHED CHURCH (IRELAND)—THE APPROACHING DIVISION—Questions, Mr. Yorke, Viscount Cranborne ; Answers, Lord Stanley, Mr. Speaker ..	706
ESTABLISHED CHURCH (IRELAND) — THE MAYNOOTH GRANT—Question, Mr. Whalley ; Answer, Mr. Gladstone .. .. .	708
ESTABLISHED CHURCH (IRELAND)—
Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [30th March],—
“That this House will immediately resolve itself into a Committee to consider the said Acts,”—( Mr. Gladstone :)
And which Amendment was,
To leave out from the word “House” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “while admitting that considerable modifications in the Temporalities of the United Church in Ireland may, after the pending inquiry, appear to be expedient, is of opinion that any proposition tending to the disestablishment or disendowment of that Church ought to be reserved for the decision of a new Parliament,”—( Lord Stanley ), instead thereof.
Question again proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question : ”—Debate resumed .. .. .	790
After long debate, Debate further adjourned till To-morrow .
Metropolis Gas Bill [Bill 49]—
Moved , “That the Bill be now read a second time,”—( Mr. Morrison ) ..	798
After short debate, Motion agreed to :—Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow .
SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES—considered in Committee.
(In the Committee.)
Resolved , That a sum, not exceeding £1,200,000, be granted to Her Majesty, on account, for or towards defraying the Charge for the following Civil Services, to the 31st day of March 1869 .. .. .	799
[Then the several Services set forth at length.]
Resolution to be reported To-morrow ; Committee to sit again To-morrow .
County General Assessment (Scotland) Bill—Ordered ( The Lord Advocate, Mr. Secretary Gathorne Hardy, Sir James Fergusson ) ; presented , and read the first time [Bill 84] .. .. .
	801
Peerage (Ireland) Bill—Ordered ( Sir Colman O'Loughlen, Mr. Monsell, Mr. Shaw-Lefevre ) ; presented , and read the first time [Bill 83] .. .. .
	802

LORDS, FRIDAY, APRIL 3.

BANKRUPTCY BILL—Question, Lord Chelmsford ; Answer, The Lord Chancellor	802
INSURRECTION IN CRETE—MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS—Moved,
“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for, Copy of the Instructions to the British Representative at Paris in reference to the identic Note proposed to be communicated to the Porte by Russia, France, Italy, and Prussia,”—( The Lord Campbell )	803
After debate, Motion (by Leave of the House) withdrawn .

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[April 3.]

Page

TECHNICAL EDUCATION—THE WHITWORTH SCHOLARSHIPS—Observations, Earl Granville; Reply, The Duke of Marlborough ..	820
Minute by the Lords of the Committee of Privy Council on Education respecting the Scholarships proposed to be founded by Mr. Whitworth: Presented (by Command), and Ordered to lie on the Table.
Partition Bill [S.L.]— Presented (The Lord Chancellor); read 1 <sup>o</sup> (No. 67) ..	825

COMMONS, FRIDAY, APRIL 3.

THE EASTER RECESS—Ministerial Statement ( Mr. Disraeli ) ..	826
Moved , "That the House upon its rising should adjourn until Monday, 20th April ."
After short debate, Motion agreed to :—House, at rising, to adjourn till Monday, 20th April .
THE SCOTCH REFORM BILL—Question, Mr. Craufurd; Answer, Mr. Disraeli ..	829
CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES—Question, Mr. Childers; Answer, Mr. Disraeli ..	830
RETIREMENT OF FIELD OFFICERS OF THE INDIAN ARMY—Question, Mr. Dimsdale; Answer, Sir Stafford Northcote ..	830
LAND WRITS REGISTRATION (SCOTLAND) BILL FEES—Question, Mr. Childers; Answer, Mr. Selater-Booth ..	830
BANKRUPTCY (IRELAND)—Question, Mr. Serjeant Armstrong; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland ..	830
BOARD OF TRADE—PRIVATE BILLS—Question, Mr. Waldegrave-Leslie; Answer, Mr. Stephen Cave ..	831
MEMBER FOR THETFORD—TITLES OF DIGNITY—Question, Mr. Darby Griffith; Answer, Mr. Disraeli ..	831
IRELAND—ARREST OF MR. J. DOWNY—Question, Mr. Bearden; Answer, The Earl of Mayo ..	833
TURNPIKE TRUSTS—Question, Mr. Whalley; Answer, Mr. Gathorne Hardy ..	833
ARMY—ALLEGED FLOGGING OF MULE DRIVERS IN ABYSSINIA—Question, Mr. Buxton; Answer, Sir Stafford Northcote ..	834
THE PLAY OF "OLIVER TWIST"—Question, Mr. Brady; Answer, Mr. G. Hardy ..	834
IRELAND—THE REGIUM DONUM—Question, Mr. Vance; Answer, Mr. Gladstone ..	835
IRELAND—THE MAYNOOTH GRANT—Observations, Mr. Whalley ..	836
RIOTS IN BELGIUM—Question, Mr. Grant; Answer, Lord Stanley ..	837
ESTABLISHED CHURCH (IRELAND)—
Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [30th March],
"That this House will immediately resolve itself into a Committee to consider the said Acts,"—( Mr. Gladstone :)
And which Amendment was,
To leave out from the word "House" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "while admitting that considerable modifications in the Temporalities of the United Church in Ireland may, after the pending inquiry, appear to be expedient, is of opinion that any proposition tending to the disestablishment or disendowment of that Church ought to be reserved for the decision of a new Parliament,"—( Lord Stanley .)—instead thereof.
Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question :"—Debate resumed ..	837
After long debate, Question put:—The House divided ; Ayes 330, Noes 270; Majority 60 ..	941
Division List, Ayes and Noes ..	941
Main Question put:—The House divided ; Ayes 328, Noes 272; Majority 56:—Acts considered in Committee.
Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday 27th April .
Entail Amendment (Scotland) Bill— Ordered ( Sir James Fergusson, Mr. Secretary Gathorne Hardy ); presented , and read the first time [Bill 86] ..	946

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

	Page
COMMONS, MONDAY, APRIL 20.
SUPPLY —Order for Committee read; Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair:"—
INDIA—IRRIGATION OF PUBLIC LANDS—RESOLUTION— Amendment proposed, To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, the advance of £600,000 of public money on loan to a private company of adventurers styling themselves the Madras Irrigation Company, granted on the 15th day of May 1866 for their sole benefit, and likewise the offer of a large loan on similar terms announced by the Secretary of State on the 20th day of February last as contemplated to be given to the East India Irrigation and Canal Company, are acts of impropriety, are mischievous in policy, and should be discontinued,"—( Mr. Smollett .)—instead thereof .. .. .	946
Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question:"—After debate, Amendment, by leave, withdrawn .
CONDITION OF CEYLON—MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE— Amendment proposed, To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the condition of Ceylon and the action of its Government,"—( Mr. Watkin .)—instead thereof .. .. .	971
After short debate, Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question," put, and agreed to .
Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to .
SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES—considered in Committee .. .. .	983
(In the Committee.)
(1.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £59,920, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1869, for the British Embassy Houses, Chapel, Consular Offices, &c. at Constantinople, China, and Japan."
Whereupon Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Item of £6,000, for the Embassy House at Therapia, be omitted from the proposed Vote,"—( Mr. Monk .)
After short debate, Question put:—The Committee divided ; Ayes 20, Noes 37; Majority 17:—Original Question again proposed.
After short debate, Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the item of £15,000, for Consular Buildings in Japan, be omitted from the proposed Vote,"—( Mr. Lusk .)
After further short debate, Question put, and negatived :—Original Question put, and agreed to .
(2.) £8,000, to complete the sum for the Metropolitan Fire Brigade.
(3.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £8,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1869, for the purchase of Ground and for the Erection of a House for Her Majesty's Mission at Teheran" .. .. .	997
After short debate, Question put:—The Committee divided ; Ayes 70, Noes 25; Majority 45:—Vote agreed to .
(4.) £103,675, to complete the sum for certain Harbours of Refuge, &c.—After short debate, Vote agreed to .. .. .	1000
(5.) £37,310, to complete the sum for certain Lighthouses Abroad, &c.—After short debate, Vote agreed to .. .. .	1003
(6.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £51,238, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1869, for the Maintenance and Repair of the Royal Palaces" .. .. .	1004
After short debate, Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Item of £5,636, for Palaces, &c. partly in the occupation of Her Majesty, be omitted from the proposed Vote,"—( Mr. Fawcett ):—After further short debate, the Committee divided ; Ayes 8, Noes 82; Majority 74 .. .. .	1068
Original Question again proposed.
Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Item of £7,313, for Hampton Court Palace, Stables, and Outbuildings, with Orangery and Vinery, be reduced by the sum of £5,000,"—( Mr. Labouchere ):—After short debate, Question put, and negatived .
Motion made, and Question, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,"—( Mr. Ayrton .)—put, and negatived :—Original Question put, and agreed to .
Resolutions to be reported To-morrow ; Committee to sit again upon Wednesday .

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[April 20.]

Page

Boundary Bill [Bill 78]—

Moved, “That the Bill be now read a second time,”—(Mr. Gathorne Hardy) 1014 After short debate, Moved, “That this House do now adjourn,”—(Mr. Serjeant Gaselee :)—Motion, by leave, withdrawn :—Main Question put, and agreed to :—Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday, 30th April.

COMMONS, TUESDAY, APRIL 21.

Married Women's Property Bill—

Motion for Leave (Mr. Shaw-Lefevre) .. .. . 1015
Bill to amend the Law with respect to the Property of Married Women, ordered (Mr. Shaw-Lefevre, Mr. Russell Gurney, Mr. Stuart Mill); presented, and read the first time [Bill 89.]

PROCEEDINGS IN COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY—RESOLUTION—

Resolution [9th February 1858] relative to Proceedings in Committee of Supply read, as followeth :—

“That when it has been proposed to omit or reduce items in a Vote, the Question shall be afterwards put upon the original Vote or upon the reduced Vote, as the case may be, without amendment” .. .. . 1025

Moved, “That the said Resolution be rescinded,”—(Mr. Ayrton)
After short debate, Moved, “That the Debate be adjourned till Tuesday next,”—(Mr. Disraeli :)—Motion agreed to :—Debate adjourned till Tuesday next.

Capital Punishment within Prisons Bill [Bill 36]—

Order for Committee read :—Moved, “That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair” .. .. . 1033

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “in the opinion of this House, it is expedient, instead of carrying out the punishment of death within prisons, that Capital Punishment should be abolished,”—(Mr. Gilpin,)—instead thereof.

After debate, Question put, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question :”—The House divided; Ayes 127, Noes 23; Majority 104.

Main Question, “That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair,” put, and agreed to :—Bill considered in Committee .. .. . 1055

After short time spent therein, Bill reported; as amended, to be considered upon Thursday.

Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings Bill [Bill 1]—

Order for Committee read .. .. . 1063

Bill considered in Committee.

After short time spent therein, Bill reported; as amended, to be considered upon Tuesday next, and to be printed. [Bill 88.]

Broughty Ferry Provisional Order Confirmation Bill—Ordered (The Lord Advocate, Mr. Secretary Gathorne Hardy, Sir James Fergusson) .. .. . 1067

COMMONS, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 22.

Burials (Ireland) Bill [Bill 5]—

Moved, “That the Bill be now read a second time,”—(Mr. Monsell) .. 1067

After short debate, Amendment proposed, to leave out the word “now,” and at the end of the question to add the words “upon this day six months,”—(Colonel William Stuart.)

Question put, “That the word ‘now’ stand part of the Question :”—The House divided; Ayes 74, Noes 51; Majority 23 :—Main Question put, and agreed to :—Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[April 22.]

Page

Sunday Trading Bill [Bill 40]—

Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Mr. Thomas Hughes) 1084 Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months,"—(Mr. Graham.)
 After short debate, Question put, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question :"—The House divided; Ayes 68, Noes 31; Majority 37 :—Main Question put, and agreed to :—Bill read a second time, and committed for
To-morrow.

Canongate Annuity Tax Bill [Bill 60]—

Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Mr. M'Laren) .. 1087
 Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months,"—(The Lord Advocate.)
 After debate, Question put, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question :"—The House divided; Ayes 59, Noes 86; Majority 27.
 Division List, Ayes and Noes .. 1107
 Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to :—Bill put off for six months.

LORDS, THURSDAY, APRIL 23.

ASSASSINATION OF MR. D'ARCY M'GEE—Question, The Earl of Carnarvon ; Answer, The Duke of Buckingham .. .. 1108

Compulsory Church Rates Abolition Bill (No. 55)—

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>a</sup>,"—(Earl Russell) .. 1108
 After debate, Motion agreed to :—Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

COMMONS, THURSDAY, APRIL 23.

MIDDLESEX REGISTRY OFFICE—Question, Mr. Childers; Answer, Mr. G. Hardy 1146
 SPAIN AND PRUSSIA—Question, Mr. Akroyd; Answer, Lord Stanley .. 1147
 CHINA—TREATY OF TIRN-TSIN—Question, Colonel Sykes; Answer, Lord Stanley 1147
 INDIA—HYDERABAD—Question, Mr. Stacpoole; Answer, Sir Stafford Northcote 1148
 ABYSSINIAN EXPEDITION—Question, Mr. Fawcett; Answer, Sir S. Northcote 1148 PARLIAMENT—THE CONFERENCE ROOM—Question, Colonel French; Answer, Lord John Manners .. .. 1148
 TURKEY—CONDITION OF CRETE—Question, Mr. Layard; Answer, Lord Stanley 1149 IMPORTATION OF FOREIGN CATTLE—Observations, Lord Robert Montagu; Reply,
 Mr. Horsfall .. .. 1149

WAYS AND MEANS—THE FINANCIAL STATEMENT—

WAYS AND MEANS considered in Committee.

Financial Statement of The Chancellor of the Exchequer on moving the First Resolution.

That, towards raising the Supply granted to Her Majesty, the Duty of Customs now charged on Tea shall continue to be levied and charged on and after the 1st day of August 1868 until the 1st day of August 1869, on the importation thereof into Great Britain and Ireland : viz.—Tea . . . . . the lb. 0s. 6d. 1149

After long debate, Resolution agreed to.

Resolution to be reported To-morrow; Committee to sit again To-morrow.

Ecclesiastical Commissioners Orders in Council Bill (Lords) [Bill 69]—

Order for Committee read :—Moved, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair,"—(Mr. Gathorne Hardy) .. .. 1194

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words
 "this House will, upon this day six months, resolve itself into the said Committee,"—
 (Mr. Bentinck,)—instead thereof.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[April 23.]

Page

Ecclesiastical Commissioners Orders in Council Bill (Lords) [Bill 62]—continued.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question:"—After short debate, Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee.

After short time spent therein, Bill reported, without Amendment; to be read the third time To-morrow.

Government of India Act Amendment Bill—

Motion for Leave (Sir Stafford Northcote) .. .. . 1201

Bill to amend in certain respects the Act for the better Government of India, ordered (Sir Stafford Northcote, Sir James Fergusson); presented, and read the first time [Bill 91.]

BANK HOLIDAYS BILL—Select Committee nominated :—List of the Committee 1216

Governor General of India Bill—Ordered (Sir Stafford Northcote, Sir James Fergusson); presented, and read the first time [Bill 92] .. .. . 1216

Petroleum Act Amendment Bill—Ordered (Sir James Fergusson, Mr. Secretary Gathorne Hardy); presented, and read the first time [Bill 93] .. .. . 1216

LORDS, FRIDAY, APRIL 24.

COMPULSORY CHURCH RATES ABOLITION BILL—Statement (Earl Russell) .. 1217

Bankruptcy Acts Repeal Bill (No. 74)—

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee read .. 1217

After short debate, Bill considered in Committee.

Bill reported, without Amendment; Amendments made; Bill re-committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday the 4th of May next; and to be printed as amended.

Bankruptcy Bill [H.L.] (No. 75)—

House in Committee (according to Order); Bill reported, without Amendment; Amendments made; Bill re-committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday the 4th of May next; and to be printed as amended.

Judgment Debtors Bill [H.L.] (No. 76)—

House in Committee (according to Order); Bill reported, without Amendment; Amendments made; Bill re-committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday the 4th of May next; and to be printed as amended.

RIOTS IN LANCASHIRE—Question, The Earl of Lichfield; Answer, The Earl of Malmesbury .. .. . 1221

PUBLIC PETITIONS—Select Committee on :—List of the Committee .. 1221

COMMONS, FRIDAY, APRIL 24.

POST OFFICE — WEST INDIA MAILS — Question, Mr. Graves; Answer, Mr. Selater-Booth .. .. . 1222

INDIA—BANK OF BOMBAY—Questions, Lord William Hay; Answers, Sir Stafford Northcote .. .. . 1223

STRIKE OF COLLIERIES IN THE WIGAN DISTRICT—Question, Major Anson; Answer, Sir James Fergusson .. .. . 1224

SUPPLY—Order for Committee read; Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair :"—

INSURRECTION IN CRETE—MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS—

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[April 24.]

Page

INSURRECTION IN CRETE—MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS—continued.

graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House, Copy of any Despatches or Correspondence between the Russian Government and the Foreign Office on the subjects of the Insurrection in Crete and of the condition of the Christians in Turkey in the years 1866 and 1867,"—(Mr. Monk,)—instead thereof

1226

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question :"—After long debate, Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

CASE OF SIR T. J. METCALFE—MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE—Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the case of Sir Theophilus John Metcalfe, C.B., as set forth in his Petition of the 24th day of February, and printed in the Appendix to the Fifth Report on Public Petitions on the 7th day of March 1868,"—(Major Anson,)—instead thereof .. .. .

1268

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question :"—After short debate, Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

PERMANENT EXPENSES OF COMMISSIONS—RESOLUTION—Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, the expenses of the Copyhold, Inclosure, and Tithe Commission, Inclosure and Drainage Acts, and Charity Commission, ought not to be borne by the public,"—(Mr. Goldney,)—instead thereof .. .. .

1280

After debate, Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question :"—The House divided ; Ayes 104, Noes 105 ; Majority 1 :—Question put, "That those words be there added :"—The House divided ; Ayes 106, Noes 105 ; Majority 1 :—Words added :—Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Resolved, That, in the opinion of this House, the expenses of the Copyhold, Inclosure, and Tithe Commission, Inclosure and Drainage Acts, and Charity Commission, ought not to be borne by the public.

SUPPLY—Resolved, That this House will immediately resolve itself into the Committee of Supply.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair :"—

GENERAL POST OFFICE—CASE OF A. J. DUFFY—MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE—Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the circumstances connected with the removal of Anthony J. Duffy from his appointment of permanent clerk in the Circulation department of the General Post Office,"—(Sir Patrick O'Brien,)—instead thereof

1296

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question :"—After short debate, Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

INDIA—MADRAS IRRIGATION COMPANY—Observations, Mr. Stansfeld .. 1298

Motion, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," by leave, withdrawn :—Committee deferred till Monday next.

LORDS, MONDAY, APRIL 27.

ESTABLISHED CHURCH (IRELAND)—THE RESOLUTIONS—Notice (The Earl of Derby) 1303

PRIVATE BILLS—On the Motion of the CHAIRMAN of COMMITTEES—

Ordered, That no Private Bill brought from the House of Commons shall be read a Second Time after Friday the 12th Day of June next : [and other Orders] .. .. .

1303

HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE DUKE OF EDINBURGH—Motion for an Address (The Earl of Malmesbury) .. .. .

1304

After short debate, Resolved and Ordered, Nemine Dissentiente,

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, to convey to Her Majesty the Expression of the Sorrow and Indignation with which this House has learned the atrocious

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[April 27.]

Page

HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE DUKE OF EDINBURGH—MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS—continued.

Attempt to assassinate His Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh while on a Visit to Her Majesty's loyal Australian Colonies, and of their heartfelt Congratulations to Her Majesty on his Preservation from mortal Injury; and to assure Her Majesty of the Sympathy of this House in Her Majesty's present Anxiety, and of their earnest Hope for the speedy Recovery of His Royal Highness."

The said Address to be presented to Her Majesty by the Lords with White Staves.

Education Bill (No. 53)—

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>a</sup>,"—(The Lord President) .. 1305 Amendment moved to leave out ("now") and insert ("this Day Three Months,")
—(The Earl of Airlie :)—After debate, Amendment (by Leave of the House) withdrawn :—Then the original Motion agreed to; Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday the 7th of May next.

COMMONS, MONDAY, APRIL 27.

THAMES EMBANKMENT—STEAMBOAT PIERS—Question, Mr. Watkin; Answer, Mr. Tite .. 1332

CONSECRATION AND ORDINATION FEES—Question, Mr. Monk; Answer, Mr. Sclater-Booth .. 1332

ARMY—OFFICERS HOLDING CIVIL APPOINTMENTS—Question, Mr. White; Answer, Sir John Pakington .. 1333

CARRIAGE OF PARCELS BY RAILWAY—Question, Mr. W. E. Forster; Answer, Mr. Stephen Cave .. 1333

HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE DUKE OF EDINBURGH—Motion for an Address (Mr. Disraeli) .. 1334

After short debate, Resolved, Nemine Contradicente,

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, to convey to Her Majesty the expression of the sorrow and indignation with which this House has learned the atrocious attempt to assassinate His Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh, while on a visit to Her Majesty's loyal Australian Colonies, and of their heartfelt congratulations to Her Majesty on His preservation from mortal injury; and to assure Her Majesty of the sympathy of this House in Her Majesty's present anxiety, and of their earnest hope for the speedy recovery of His Royal Highness."

To be presented by Privy Councillors.

ABYSSINIAN EXPEDITION—Question, Mr. Layard; Answer, Mr. Disraeli .. 1337

ESTABLISHED CHURCH (IRELAND)—

Acts considered in Committee .. 1338

(1.) Question again proposed,

"That it is necessary that the Established Church of Ireland should cease to exist as an Establishment, due regard being had to all personal interests and to all individual rights of property,"—(Mr. Gladstone.)

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the first word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "so long as the Union between Great Britain and Ireland continues to exist, it is just and consistent that the principle of the Established Church should be maintained in Ireland, and its endowment on a scale suitable to the wants of the population,"—(Sir Frederick Heygate.)—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the proposed Resolution."

After long debate, Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

Military at Elections (Ireland) Bill—Ordered (Mr. Serjeant Barry, Major Gavin, Mr. Esmonde); presented, and read the first time [Bill 95] .. 1424

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[April 27.]	Page
Cotton Statistics Bill—Ordered ( Mr. Bazley, Mr. Milner Gibson, Mr. Horsfall, Mr. Watkin, Mr. Cheetham ); presented , and read the first time [Bill 96]	.. 1424
Documentary Evidence Bill—Ordered ( Sir James Fergusson, Mr. Secretary Gathorne Hardy ); presented , and read the first time [Bill 97]	.. 1425

LORDS, TUESDAY, APRIL 28.

REGULATION OF RAILWAYS BILL—THE PARCELS CLAUSE—Question , Viscount Halifax; Answer , The Duke of Richmond	.. 1425
ESTABLISHED CHURCH (IRELAND)—THE RESOLUTIONS—Question , The Earl of Derby; Answer , The Earl Russell	.. 1425

COMMONS, TUESDAY, APRIL 28.

BURIALS (IRELAND) BILL—MR. MONSELL AND THE DEAN OF CORK—Explanation , Mr. Monsell	.. 1454
GRIEVANCES OF CUSTOMS OFFICERS—Question , Mr. Graves; Answer , Mr. Sclater-Booth	.. 1455
ARMY—WOOLWICH ARSENAL—Question , Captain Pack-Beresford; Answer , Sir John Pakington	.. 1455
DEVIZES GAOL—Question , Mr. Marsh; Answer , Mr. Gathorne Hardy	.. 1455
ARMY—FORTIFICATIONS—Question , Mr. O'Beirne; Answer , Sir J. Pakington	.. 1456
IRELAND—LOCAL GOVERNMENT—Question , Mr. Pim; Answer , The Earl of Mayo	1457
CASE OF MR. COBLE—Question , Mr. Bagnall; Answer , Mr. Sclater-Booth	.. 1457
REGISTRATION OF ELECTORS—Question , Sir E. Buller; Answer , Mr. Disraeli	.. 1458
INDIA—TELEGRAPHIC COMMUNICATION—Question , Mr. Dyce Nicol; Answer , Mr. Corry	.. 1458
IRELAND—THE LAND QUESTION—Question , Mr. Pim; Answer , The Earl of Mayo	.. 1459
IRELAND—MURDER OF MR. FEATHERSTONHAUGH—Question , Mr. Eykyn; Answer , The Earl of Mayo	.. 1459
INDIA—CIVILIAN JUDGES (BOMBAY)—Question , Sir Robert Collier; Answer , Sir Stafford Northcote	.. 1460
ARMY—THE 86TH REGIMENT AT THE MAURITIUS—Question , Mr. Whalley; Answer , Sir John Pakington	.. 1460
TURNPIKE TOLLS—Question , Mr. More; Answer , Mr. Gathorne Hardy	.. 1461
ESTABLISHED CHURCH (IRELAND)—Question , Mr. Verner; Answer , Mr. Disraeli	1462
IRELAND—REPORT OF THE IRISH RAILWAY COMMISSION—Question , Mr. Monsell; Answer , The Earl of Mayo	.. 1463
COLLIERY ACCIDENTS—Observations , Mr. Greene	.. 1464

PROCEEDINGS IN COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY—RESOLUTION—

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [21st April],

“That the Resolution of the House of the 9th day of February 1858, relative to Proceedings in Committee of Supply,—‘That when it has been proposed to omit or reduce items in a Vote, the Question shall be afterwards put upon the original Vote or upon the reduced Vote, as the case may be, without amendment,’—be rescinded,”—(Mr. Ayrton) 1464

Question again proposed, “That the said Resolution be rescinded.”

After short debate, Question put, and agreed to.

1. Resolved, That when it has been proposed to omit or reduce items in a Vote, the Question shall be afterwards put upon the original Vote or upon the reduced Vote, as the case may be.

2. Resolved, That after a Question has been proposed from the Chair for a reduction of the whole Vote, no Motion shall be made for omitting or reducing any item,—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[April 28.]

Page

ESTABLISHED CHURCH (IRELAND)—

Acts considered in Committee .. .. . 1466

(1.) Question again proposed,

“That it is necessary that the Established Church of Ireland should cease to exist as an Establishment, due regard being had to all personal interests and to all individual rights of property,”—(Mr. Gladstone :)

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the first word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “so long as the Union between Great Britain and Ireland continues to exist, it is just and consistent that the principle of the Established Church should be maintained in Ireland, and its endowment on a scale suitable to the wants of the population,”—(Sir Frederick Heygate,)—instead thereof.

Question proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the proposed Resolution.”

After long debate, Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Thursday.

COMMONS, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 29.

Church Rates Commutation Bill [Bill 10]—

Moved, “That the Bill be now read a second time,”—(Mr. Newdegate) .. 1535

After short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn :—Bill to be read a second time To-morrow.

Railway and Joint-Stock Companies Accounts Bill [Bill 53]—

Moved, “That the Bill be now read a second time,”—(Sir William Hutt) .. 1535

After short debate, Motion agreed to :—Bill read a second time, and committed for Wednesday next.

County Financial Boards (No. 2) Bill [Bill 52]—

Moved, “That the Bill be now read a second time,”—(Mr. Wyld) .. 1542

After debate, Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the present mode of conducting the Financial Arrangements of the Counties in England and Wales, and whether any alteration ought to be made either in the persons by whom or the manner in which such arrangements are now conducted,”—(The Judge Advocate,)—instead thereof .. 1558

After further short debate, Question put, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question :”—The House divided; Ayes 46, Noes 154; Majority 108 :—Words added :—Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Ordered, That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the present mode of conducting the Financial Arrangements of the Counties in England and Wales, and whether any alteration ought to be made either in the persons by whom or the manner in which such arrangements are now conducted,—(The Judge Advocate.)

Peerage (Ireland) Bill [Bill 83]—

Moved, “That the Bill be now read a second time,”—(Sir Colman O’Loghlen) 1559

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word “now,” and at the end of the Question to add the words “upon this day six months,”—(Colonel French :)
—Question proposed, “That the word ‘now’ stand part of the Question.”

After short debate, Amendment and Motion, by leave, withdrawn :—Bill withdrawn.

Artizans’ and Labourers’ Dwellings Bill [Bill 88]—

Bill, as amended, considered .. .. . 1564

After short debate, Debate adjourned till Wednesday next.

Municipal Rate (Edinburgh) Bill—Ordered (Mr. McLaren, Mr. Dunlop, Mr. Baxter):

presented, and read the first time [Bill 96] .. .. . 1569

Ejectments Suspension (Ireland) Bill—Ordered (Mr. Kennedy, Mr. Serjeant

Armstrong); presented, and read the first time [Bill 100] .. .. . 1570

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

LORDS, THURSDAY, APRIL 30.		Page
Compulsory Church Rates Abolition Bill (No. 55)—
Moved , "That the House do now resolve itself into a Committee on the said Bill,"—( Earl Russell )	..	1570
After short debate, Motion (by Leave of the House) withdrawn : and Bill referred to a Select Committee.
And, on May 1, Committee nominated :—List of the Committee	..	1574
COMMONS, THURSDAY, APRIL 30.
PASSENGER ACTS—Question, Mr. Graves ; Answer, Mr. Adderley	..	1574
COAL FOR THE NAVY—Question, Mr. Headlam ; Answer, Lord Henry Lennox		1575
VICTORIA—CASE OF THE CONVICT MILLAR—Question, Mr. Hurst ; Answer, Mr. Adderley	..	1576
INDIA—FURLONGS—Question, Mr. Gregory ; Answer, Sir Stafford Northcote		1576
OBSTRUCTIONS IN THE RIVER THAMES—Questions, Mr. Harcastle, Lord Otho Fitzgerald ; Answers, Mr. Stephen Cave	..	1577
SLAVE TRADE, ZANZIBAR—Question, Sir T. F. Buxton ; Answer, Lord Stanley		1578
CATTLE PLAGUE—Question, Mr. Read ; Answer, Lord Robert Montagu	..	1578
THE CONVICT BARRETT—Question, Mr. Rearden ; Answer, Mr. Gathorne Hardy		1579
ARMY—PROMOTIONS IN THE COLDSTREAM GUARDS—Question, Sir Patrick O'Brien ; Answer, Sir John Pakington	..	1579
THE ROYAL ACADEMY—Question, Mr. Layard ; Answer, Lord John Manners		1580
IRELAND—PRESBYTERY OF ANTRIM—Questions, Sir Charles Lanyon, Sir Thomas Bateson ; Answers, Mr. Gladstone	..	1581
ROMAN CATHOLIC OATH—
Moved , "That the Oath taken by Roman Catholic Members previous to the alteration of the Oath on the 30th of April, 1866, be read by the Clerk at the Table,"—( Mr. Freville-Surtees )	..	1582
After short debate, Question put, and negatived .
ESTABLISHED CHURCH (IRELAND)—
Acts considered in Committee	..	1583
(1.) Question again proposed,
"That it is necessary that the Established Church of Ireland should cease to exist as an Establishment, due regard being had to all personal interests and to all individual rights of property,"—( Mr. Gladstone :)
Amendment again proposed,
To leave out from the first word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "so long as the Union between Great Britain and Ireland continues to exist, it is just and consistent that the principle of the Established Church should be maintained in Ireland, and its endowment on a scale suitable to the wants of the population,"—( Sir Frederick Heygate :)—instead thereof.
Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the proposed Resolution : "—After long debate, Amendment, by leave, withdrawn :—Main Question put :—The Committee divided ; Ayes 330, Noes 265 ; Majority 65.
Division List, Ayes and Noes	..	1675
Committee report Progress ; to sit again upon Monday next.
PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—
Moved , "That the House, at rising, adjourn till Monday next,"—( Mr. Disraeli )		1679
After short debate, Motion agreed to :—House, at rising, to adjourn till Monday next.
Sea Fisheries (Ireland) Bill— Ordered ( Mr. Blake, Colonel Annesley, Lord Claud John Hamilton, Mr. Kavanagh ) ; presented, and read the first time [Bill 101]	..	1681
Vagrant Act Amendment Bill— Ordered ( Mr. Pease, Mr. Akroyd, Mr. Liddell ) ; presented, and read the first time [Bill 102]	..	1681

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

Page

LORDS, FRIDAY, MAY 1.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—VICTORIA—THE APPROPRIATION ACT—POSTPONEMENT OF MOTION—Observations, The Earl of Malmesbury:—Short debate thereon .. .. .	1682
HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE DUKE OF EDINBURGH—THE QUEEN'S ANSWER TO THE ADDRESS [27th April] reported .. .. .	1682
THE PUBLIC OFFICES—NEW INDIA AND FOREIGN OFFICES—Question, Lord Redesdale; Answer, The Earl of Malmesbury:—Short debate thereon	1683
Friendly Societies Bill (No. 43)—
Order of the Day for the Second Reading read .. .. .	1685
After short debate, Second Reading put off to Tuesday next.
PUBLIC PETITIONS—
Ordered, That the Name of the Lord presenting a Petition shall be written thereon .. .. .	1685

LORDS, MONDAY, MAY 4.

MINISTERIAL STATEMENT—DEFEAT OF THE GOVERNMENT ON THE IRISH CHURCH RESOLUTIONS—Observations, The Earl of Malmesbury:—Short debate thereon	1686
---	------

COMMONS, MONDAY, MAY 4.

TAXATION OF CHARITABLE INSTITUTIONS—Question, Mr. Hadfield; Answer, Mr. Disraeli .. .. .	1693
NAVY—RETIRED OFFICERS—Question, Captain Mackinnon; Answer, Mr. Corry	1693
COUNTY FINANCIAL ARRANGEMENTS—Question, Sir William Gallwey; Answer, Mr. Gathorne Hardy .. .. .	1694
HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE DUKE OF EDINBURGH—HER MAJESTY'S ANSWER TO THE ADDRESS [27th April] reported .. .. .	1694
MINISTERIAL STATEMENT—DEFEAT OF THE GOVERNMENT ON THE IRISH CHURCH RESOLUTIONS—Observations, Mr. Disraeli:—Debate thereon .. .. .	1694
Moved , "That this House do now adjourn,"—( Mr. Conolly :)—After long debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn .
WAYS AND MEANS— considered in Committee .. .. .	1746
(1.) Moved , That, towards raising the Supply granted to Her Majesty, there shall be charged, collected, and paid for one year, commencing on the 6th day of April 1868, for and in respect of all Property, Profits, and Gains mentioned or described as chargeable in the Act passed in the 16th and 17th years of Her Majesty's reign, chapter 34, for granting to Her Majesty Duties on Profits arising from Property, Professions, Trades, and Offices, the following Rates and Duties (that is to say):
For every Twenty shillings of the annual value or amount of all such Property, Profits, and Gains (except those chargeable under Schedule (B) of the said Act), the Rate or Duty of Six pence.
And for and in respect of the occupation of Lands, Tenements, Hereditaments, and Heritages chargeable under Schedule (B) of the said Act, for every Twenty shillings of the annual value thereof,
In England, the Rate or Duty of Three pence, and
In Scotland and Ireland respectively, the Rate or Duty of Two pence farthing.
Subject to the provisions contained in Section 3 of the Act 26th Victoria, chapter 22, for the exemption of persons whose whole Income from every source is under £100 a-year, and relief of those whose Income is under £200 a-year.
After long debate, Resolution agreed to
(2.) Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That, towards making good the Supply granted to Her Majesty, the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury be authorized to raise any sum of money, not exceeding One Million pounds sterling, by an issue of Exchequer Bonds" .. .. .
	1773

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

	Page
[May 4.]
WAYS AND MEANS—Committee—continued.
Amendment proposed, To leave out all the words after the words “authorized to,” in order to insert the words “suspend so much of the payment of the Terminable-Annuities created in 1866 till the year 1885 as may amount to the difference of the annual payment made on their account, and of the interest of the £24,000,000 Stock for which they were exchanged, that is to say, a sum of £1,005,000,”—( Mr. Darby Griffith ,)—instead thereof ..	1774
Question proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the proposed Resolution : ”—After short debate, Amendment, by leave, with- drawn .
Original Question put, and agreed to .
(3.) Resolved , That the principal of all Exchequer Bonds which may be so issued shall be paid off at par at any period not exceeding twelve months from the date of such Bonds.
(4.) Resolved , That the interest of such Exchequer Bonds shall be payable half-yearly, and shall be charged upon and issued out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom, or the growing produce thereof.
Resolutions to be reported To-morrow ; Committee to sit again upon Wednesday .
Poor Law (Ireland) Amendment Bill—Ordered ( Mr. Serjeant Barry, Major Gavin ) ; presented , and read the first time [Bill 103] .. ..	1775

LORDS, TUESDAY, MAY 5.

The Right Honourable Sir JOHN TROLLOPE, Baronet, having been created Baron Kesteven of Casewick in the County of Lincoln, Sir BROOK WILLIAM BRIDGES, Baronet, having been created Baron Fitzwalter of Woodham Walter in the County of Essex—Were severally introduced.
Friendly Societies Bill (No. 43)— Moved , “That the Bill be now read 2 <sup>a</sup> ,”—( The Earl of Lichfield ) ..	1775
After short debate, Motion agreed to :—Bill read 2 <sup>a</sup> accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday the 19 th instant.
ENDOWED GRAMMAR SCHOOLS—Question , Lord Taunton ; Answer, The Duke of Marlborough .. ..	1782
Marriage Law (Ireland) Amendment Bill—Presented ( The Marquess of Clanricarde ) ; read 1 <sup>a</sup> . (No. 89) .. ..	1783

COMMONS, TUESDAY, MAY 5.

IRELAND—CATTLE PLAGUE—Question , Mr. Gregory ; Answer, The Earl of Mayo	1784
IRELAND—DEATHS FROM SMALL-POX—Question , Mr. Gregory ; Answer, The Earl of Mayo .. ..	1784
IRELAND—HABEAS CORPUS ACT—Question , Mr. Bagwell ; Answer, The Earl of Mayo .. ..	1784
REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE ACT (1867)—COMPOUND HOUSEHOLDERS— Question , Mr. Schreiber ; Answer, Mr. Disraeli ..	1785
SCHOOL AND TRAINING SHIPS—Question , Mr. Whalley ; Answer, Lord Henry Lennox .. ..	1785
DEBATES IN THE HOUSE OF LORDS — Question , Mr. Darby Griffith ; Answer, Mr. Speaker .. ..	1786
BOUNDARY BILL—Question , Mr. Hibbert ; Answer, Mr. Gathorne Hardy ..	1786
ARMY—RESERVE FORCES—Question , The Marquess of Hartington ; Answer, Sir John Pakington .. ..	1787
MINISTERIAL STATEMENT—DEFEAT OF THE GOVERNMENT ON THE IRISH CHURCH RESOLUTIONS—Question , Mr. Gladstone ; Answer, Mr. Disraeli ..	1787
Moved , “That this House do now adjourn,”—( Mr. Gladstone .) After debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn .

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[May 5.]

Page

ARMY—MILITARY EDUCATION—RESOLUTION—

Moved, "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that a Royal Commission composed of Military and Civilian Members be appointed to inquire into the present state of Military Education in this Country, and more especially into the training of Candidates for Commissions in the Army, and into the constitution, system of Education, and discipline of the Royal Military Academy at Woolwich, and of the Royal Military College at Sandhurst, as well as into the rules and regulations under which Candidates are admitted into those Colleges,"—(Lord Eustace Cecil) .. .. 1819

After short debate, Motion agreed to.

EAST INDIA CIVIL SERVICE—RESOLUTION—

Moved, "That this House, whilst cordially approving of the system of open competition for appointments in the East India Civil Service, is of opinion that the people of India have not a fair chance of competing for these appointments as long as the examinations are held nowhere but in London; this House would therefore deem it desirable that, simultaneously with the examination in London, the same examination should be held in Calcutta, Bombay and Madras,"—(Mr. Fawcett) .. .. 1838

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the words "open competition" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "as regards the appointment of untried young men to the East India Civil Service, is of opinion that natives of India who have proved in the Uncovenanted Service or otherwise their superior fitness for situations at present held exclusively by Members in the Covenanted Service should be appointed to them without undergoing a competing examination,"—(Mr. Trevelyan),—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question:"—After short debate, Amendment and Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Municipal Corporations (Metropolis) Bill—

Motion for Leave (Mr. J. Stuart Mill) .. .. 1859

After short debate, Motion agreed to:—Bill to provide for the establishment of Municipal Corporations within the Metropolis, ordered (Mr. Mill, Mr. Thomas Hughes, Mr. Tomline, Mr. Buxton, Mr. Layard.)

Corporation of London Bill—Ordered (Mr. Mill, Mr. Thomas Hughes, Mr. Tomline, Mr. Buxton, Mr. Layard) .. .. 1864

Stockbrokers (Ireland) Bill—Ordered (Mr. Pim, Sir Benjamin Guinness) .. 1864

COMMONS, WEDNESDAY, MAY 6.

Lines Assessment Bill [Bill 11]—

Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Mr. Percy Wyndham) 1864

After short debate, Motion agreed to:—Bill read a second time, and committed for Wednesday, 20th May.

Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Court Bill [Bill 50]—

Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Mr. C. Forster) .. 1873

After short debate, Motion agreed to:—Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow.

Cotton Statistics Bill [Bill 96]—

Moved "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Mr. Baxley) .. 1874

Motion agreed to:—Bill read a second time, and committed for Wednesday next.

Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings Bill [Bill 88]—

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [29th April], "That the Clause (Act not to apply to cases in which freeholder has successfully instituted proceedings and carries out necessary repairs,)—(Sir Francis Goldsmid),—which was offered to be added on Consideration of the Bill, as amended, be now read a second time."

Question again proposed:—Debate resumed .. .. 1875

After short debate, Motion and Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

Bill to be read the third time upon Friday.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

LORDS, THURSDAY, MAY 7.

Page

Capital Punishment within Prisons Bill (No. 83)—

- Moved*, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>a</sup>,"—(The Duke of Richmond) .. 1879 After short debate, Motion agreed to:—Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House To-morrow.

- RAILWAYS—ACCIDENT UPON THE BRECON AND NEATH RAILWAY—Question, The Marquess of Clanricarde; Answer, The Duke of Richmond .. 1879

COMMONS, THURSDAY, MAY 7.

- SCOTLAND — TRAWLING FOR HERRINGS—Question, Mr. Lamont; Answer, The Lord Advocate .. .. . 1882
- QUEENSLAND—POLYNESIAN LABOURERS—Question, Mr. P. A. Taylor; Answer,
Mr. Adderley .. .. . 1882
- METROPOLIS—PARK LANE—Question, Mr. Locke; Answer, Lord John Manners 1882
- ARMY—FEVER AT THE MAURITIUS—Question, Colonel North; Answer, Sir John Pakington .. .. . 1883
- ARMY—PROMOTION IN THE COLDSTREAM GUARDS—Question, Sir Patrick O'Brien; Answer, Sir John Pakington .. .. . 1883
- THE ESTABLISHED CHURCH OF SCOTLAND—Question, Sir Robert Peel; Answer,
The Lord Advocate .. .. . 1884
- REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE (SCOTLAND) BILL — Questions, Mr. Moncreiff, Mr. Bouverie; Answers, Mr. Disraeli .. .. . 1885
- ESTABLISHED CHURCH (IRELAND)—THE MEETING AT ST. JAMES'S HALL—Question, Mr. Verner .. .. . 1886
- ESTABLISHED CHURCH (IRELAND)—
Considered in Committee .. .. . 1886
- (2.) Moved, That, subject to the foregoing considerations, it is expedient to prevent the creation of new personal interests by the exercise of any public patronage, and to confine the operations of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners of Ireland to objects of immediate necessity, or such as involve individual rights, pending the final decision of Parliament,—
(Mr. Gladstone.)
After short debate, Question put, and agreed to.
- (3.) Moved, That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, humbly to pray that, with a view to preventing, by legislation during the present Session, the creation of new personal interests through the exercise of any public patronage, Her Majesty would be graciously pleased to place at the disposal of Parliament, Her interest in the temporalities of the Archbishoprics, Bishoprics, and other Ecclesiastical Dignities and Benefices in Ireland, and in the custody thereof,—(Mr. Gladstone) .. .. . 1898
- After short debate, Question put, and agreed to.
- Moved*, "That when the Anglican Church in Ireland is disestablished and disendowed, it is right and necessary that the Grant to Maynooth and the Regium Donum be discontinued; and that no part of the secularized funds of the Anglican Church, or any State funds whatever, be applied in any way, or under any form, to the endowment or furtherance of the Roman Catholic religion in Ireland, or to the establishment or maintenance of Roman Catholic denominational schools or colleges,—(Mr. Sinclair Aytoun) .. 1902
- After debate, Amendment proposed,
To leave out from the first word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "when legislative effect shall have been given to the First Resolution of this Committee respecting the Established Church of Ireland, it is right and necessary that the Grant to Maynooth and the Regium Donum be discontinued,"—(Mr. Whitbread)—
instead thereof .. .. . 1923
- After short debate, Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the proposed Resolution: "—The Committee divided; Ayes 85, Noes 198; Majority 113.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[May 7.]

Page

ESTABLISHED CHURCH (IRELAND)—continued.

Question proposed,

That the words 'when legislative effect shall have been given to the First Resolution of this Committee respecting the Established Church of Ireland, it is right and necessary that the Grant to Maynooth and the Regium Donum be discontinued' be added,"—instead thereof .. .. . 1925

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment, by adding the words "due regard being add to all personal interests,"—(Mr. Gladstone) .. 1926

After short debate, Question, "That those words be there added," put, and agreed to.

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment, as amended, by adding the words—

And that no part of the Endowments of the Anglican Church be applied to the endowment of the institutions of other religious communions,"—(Mr. Greene) .. 1931

Question proposed, "That those words be added to the said proposed Amendment, as amended."

After short debate, Moved, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,"—(Mr. Whalley :)—Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Question put, "That those words be added to the said proposed Amendment, as amended :"—The Committee divided; Ayes 97, Noes 132; Majority 35.

Question,

That the words 'when legislative effect shall have been given to the First Resolution of this Committee respecting the Established Church of Ireland, it is right and necessary that the Grant to Maynooth and the Regium Donum be discontinued, due regard being had to all personal interests,' be added to the word 'That' in the original Question,"—put, and agreed to.

Moved, "That the Chairman report the Resolutions to the House,"—(Mr. Gladstone) .. .. . 1941

After short debate, Resolutions reported and agreed to.

ESTABLISHED CHURCH (IRELAND)—

Resolved, "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, humbly to pray that, with a view to preventing, by legislation during the present Session, the creation of new personal interests through the exercise of any public patronage, Her Majesty would be graciously pleased to place at the disposal of Parliament, Her interest in the temporalities of the Archbishoprics, Bishoprics, and other Ecclesiastical Dignities and Benefices in Ireland, and in the custody thereof,"—(Mr. Gladstone) .. .. . 1949

To be presented by Privy Councillors.

Parliamentary Reform—Representation of the People (Ireland) Bill [Bill 71]—

Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(The Earl of Mayo) .. 1949

After debate, Question put, and agreed to :—Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday next.

LORDS, FRIDAY, MAY 8.

STORIA—THE APPROPRIATION ACT—Observations, Lord Lyveden; Reply, The Duke of Buckingham :—Long debate thereon .. .. . 1963

COMMONS, FRIDAY, MAY 8.

T OFFICE RETURNS—Question, Mr. Moffatt; Answer, Mr. Solater-Booth 2001

TLAND — EDUCATION — Question, Admiral Erskine; Answer, The Lord Advocate .. .. . 2001

MY—BALL CARTRIDGE—Question, Mr. Hayter; Answer Sir J. Pakington 2002

ITED STATES—THE "SPRINGBOK"—Question, Mr. Bentinck; Answer, Lord Stanley .. .. . 2002

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[May 8.]

Page

SUPPLY—Order for Committee read; Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair:”—

ADMINISTRATION OF THE ARMY—RESOLUTION—Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “in the opinion of this House, it would be advantageous and convenient to substitute a system of weekly in lieu of daily payments to those non-commissioned Officers and Soldiers of the Army whose previous conduct might warrant the extension of this indulgence,”—(Mr. Percy Wyndham,)—instead thereof .. .. .

2003

Question proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question:”—After short debate, Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE (SCOTLAND) BILL—Question, Mr. Gladstone; Answer, Mr. Disraeli .. .. .

2004

INFECTIOUS DISEASES—MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS—Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to cause such inquiry to be instituted into the spread of disease by infection (distinguished from contagion) as may tend to check legislation and action in cases unsupported by the evidence, which in times of excitement saves a people from the commission of great crimes or great follies,”—(Sir Jervoise Clarke Jervoise,)— instead thereof .. .. .

2005

Question proposed, “That the word proposed to be left out stand part of the Question:”—After short debate, Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

TURNPIKE TRUSTS—MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS—Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “an humble address be presented to Her Majesty, that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House, Copy of all the Communications received in reply to the Circular sent in February 1866 to certain Turnpike Trustees referred to in p. 9 of the Seventeenth Report on Turnpike Trusts, of which Extracts are therein given, together with the names of the Correspondents,”—(Mr.
Clive,)—instead thereof .. .. .

2012

Question proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question:”—After short debate, Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

ARMY—FORTIFICATIONS—DOCKYARDS AND NAVAL ARSENALS—RESOLUTION—
Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “two Members of this House and another Civil Engineer should be added to the Committee appointed to consider the question of the Fortifications for the defence of the United Kingdom and of the Colonies, and that arrangements shall be made to stop, as far as possible, all further outlay until that Committee shall have reported to this House,”—(Mr. O’Beirne,)—instead thereof .. .. .

2021

Question proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question:”—After debate, Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Another Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “in the opinion of this House, no further outlay on the Fortifications for the defence of the United Kingdom and of the Colonies, except such as may be absolutely necessary under existing Contracts, or to complete works which cannot be suspended without serious inconvenience, ought to be incurred until the Report of the Committee recently appointed shall have been laid before this House,”—(Mr. Childers,)— instead thereof .. .. .

2049

Question put, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question:”—The House divided; Ayes 93, Noes 48; Majority 45.

Question again proposed, “That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair.”

INDIA—BANK OF BOMBAY—Question, Mr. Ayrton; Answer, Sir Stafford Northcote .. .. .

2055

Motion, by leave, withdrawn:—Committee deferred till Monday next.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[May 8.]

Page

Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings Bill [Bill 88]—

Moved, “That the Bill be now read the third time,”—(Mr. M' Cullagh Torrens) 2060

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the words “Bill be” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “re-committed, for the purpose of amending the Schedule,”—(Mr. Ayrton), —instead thereof.

After short debate, Question, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question,” put, and agreed to :—Main Question put, and agreed to :—Bill read the third time, and passed.

DAYS AND MEANS—considered in Committee .. .. 2062

Resolutions to be reported upon Monday next; Committee to sit again upon Monday next.

Weights and Measures (Scotland) Bill—Ordered (Mr. Craufurd, Sir Edward Colebrooke); presented, and read the first time [Bill 109] .. 2062

Errors' Affirmations (Scotland) Bill—Ordered (Mr. Craufurd, Mr. Dunlop); presented, and read the first time [Bill 110] .. 2062

Customs and Income Tax Bill—Presented, and read the first time [Bill 108] .. 2062

LORDS.

SAT FIRST.

THURSDAY, APRIL 2.

The Lord Carrington, after the Death of his Father.

THURSDAY, MAY 7.

The Marquess of Salisbury, after the Death of his Father.

FRIDAY, MAY 8.

The Earl of Ellesmere, after the Death of his Father.

NEW PEERS.

TUESDAY, MAY 5.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE SIR JOHN TROLLOPE, Baronet, having been created Baron Kesteven of Casewick in the County of Lincoln—Was (in the usual Manner) introduced.

SIR BROOK WILLIAM BRIDGES, Baronet, having been created Baron Fitzwalter of Woodham Walter in the County of Essex—Was (in the usual Manner) introduced.

---

COMMONS.

NEW WRITS ISSUED.

FRIDAY, APRIL 3.

For Launceston, v. Alexander Henry Campbell, Esq., Manor of Northstead.

For Chipping Wycombe, v. Hon. Charles Robert Carington, now Lord Carington.

MONDAY, APRIL 20.

For Cockermouth, v. John Steel, Esq., deceased.

For The Parts of Kesteven and Holland, in the County of Lincoln, v. Sir John Trollope, Baronet, called up to the House of Peers.

For Kent (Eastern Division), v. Sir Brook William Bridges, Baronet, called up to the House of Peers.

For Radnorshire, v. Sir John Benn Walsh, Baronet, called up to the House of Peers.

For Leominster, v. Hon. Arthur Walsh, Manor of Northstead.

TUESDAY, APRIL 21.

For Grantham, v. William Earle Welby, Esq., Chiltern Hundreds.

NEW WRITS ISSUED—continued.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 22.

for Bristol, v. Sir Samuel Morton Peto, Baronet, Manor of Northstead.

for Stirling District of Burghs, v. Lawrence Oliphant, Esq., Chiltern Hundreds.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 29.

for Stamford, v. Viscount Cranborne, now Marquess of Salisbury.

NEW MEMBERS SWORN.

MONDAY, MARCH 23.

Widdersfield—Edward Aldam Leatham, Esq.

FRIDAY, MARCH 27.

Wentry—Samuel Carter, Esq.

MONDAY, APRIL 20.

Whipping Wycombe—Hon. William Henry Peregrine Carington.

Wunceston—Henry Charles Lopes, Esq.

TUESDAY, APRIL 28.

Wickermouth—Andrew Green Thompson, Esq.

Wominster—Viscount Mahon.

THURSDAY, APRIL 30.

Warts of Kesteven and Holland, in the County of Lincoln—William Earle Welby, Esq.

Wantham—Edmund Turnor, Esq.

Wadnorshire—Hon. Arthur Walsh.

Wristol—John William Miles, Esq.

MONDAY, MAY 4.

Wirling District of Burghs—John Ramsay, Esq.

Wamford—Viscount Ingestre.

Went (Eastern Division)—Edward Leigh Pemberton the younger, Esq.

HANSARD'S
PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES,
IN THE
THIRD SESSION OF THE NINETEENTH PARLIAMENT OF THE UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND
APPOINTED TO MEET 1 FEBRUARY, 1866, AND THENCE
CONTINUED TILL 19 NOVEMBER, 1867, IN THE THIRTY-
FIRST YEAR OF THE REIGN OF HER MAJESTY QUEEN VICTORIA.

SECOND VOLUME OF THE SESSION.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, March 23, 1868.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—Second Reading—
Bankruptcy Acts Repeal (30); Bankruptcy ***
(31); Judgment Debtors * (32); Non-Traders
Bankruptcy (Ireland) * (38).
Select Committee—Report—Promissory Oaths ***
(10-51).
Report—Promissory Oaths * (51-52).

BANKRUPTCY ACTS REPEAL BILL.
(The Lord Chancellor.)

(NO. 30.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, in moving that the Bankruptcy Acts Repeal Bill, the Bankruptcy Bill, and the Judgment Debtors Bill be now read the second time, said: My Lords, in asking your Lordships to give a second reading to these Bills, I will now venture to submit the observations which can be more conveniently made at the present stage than they could have been at the first introduction of these measures. If I found it necessary to go into a history of the legislation on bankruptcy in this country at any length, I fear that the task would be not only most wearisome to your Lordships, but highly unprofitable in itself. I think it sufficient, in the first place, to remind your Lordships that the last Consolidation Act which was passed in this country on the subject of bankruptcy was in the year 1849. From that year to the year 1859 the law as to bankruptcy, with very little alteration, stood on that footing. In the year 1859 my noble and learned Friend (Lord Campbell), who was then Lord Chancellor, introduced into your Lordships' House a Bill on the subject of Bankruptcy which was called the Debtor and Creditor Bill. That measure contained in it four important and novel elements in Bankruptcy Law. It proposed, in the first place, the abolition together of imprisonment for debt. In the next place, it put an end to the distinction for the purposes of bankruptcy which had up to that time existed between traders and non-traders. In the third place, it introduced a system which had obtained great favour in Scotland, under which creditors in a bankruptcy were left to a great measure to choose a trustee for themselves, who was to conduct the affairs arising out of the bankruptcy. And, in the fourth place, it introduced a system of composition or arrangement deeds. That proposition was based on the Report of the Royal Commission of 1854. This Bill, with these objects, received the most careful consideration at your Lordships' hands. It passed through a Select Committee, where it received suggestions and Amendments. It was afterwards amended on the Report, and it was on the point of being sent down to the other House of Parliament when the dissolution of Parliament took place. In the new Parliament my noble and learned Friend, who now sits on my left (Lord Westbury), who was then Attorney General, introduced into the other House, and succeeded in 1861 in passing through the Act, which afterwards became law, and which I will refer to as the Bankruptcy Act of 1861. That Act of Parliament contained these three conspicuous features. It abolished, as the Bill I have before referred to proposed to do, the distinction between trader and non-trader. With regard to imprisonment for debt, it did not entirely put an end to that, but it provided that any person imprisoned for debt might, in a summary and rapid way, apply for his discharge in bankruptcy; and if he did not think fit to apply of his own will, it provided that I may term a gaol delivery at very frequent intervals for liberating prisoners, and under which the Registrars in Bankruptcy attended the various prisons for debt, and liberated those confined whether they liked it or not. In the third place, the Act introduced a system of composition deeds, under which a debtor by arrangement with his creditors, and by the consent of a majority in number and three-fourths in value, might bind the minority of his creditors to a composition, or any other arrangement which the majority might agree to with regard to the estate. These were the main features of the Act of 1861. It is not surprising that, with changes of such breadth and importance introduced into the Bankruptcy Law, it was found in working that various details of difficulty and complication arose, which led to some embarrassment and dissatisfaction as the results of the measure. The difficulties that had arisen found expression in a Motion in the other House of Parliament for a Select Committee to consider the working of the Bankruptcy Law as it then stood. Committees of the House of Commons sat during 1864 and 1865 on this subject. In 1864 they were unable to make their Report, and they contented themselves with reporting the evidence taken before them to the House; but in 1865 the Report of the Committee was presented. I will ask your Lordships' permission to mention the names of those who composed that Committee, because I venture to think that a more important representation of the mercantile element could not be obtained. The names were—Mr. Moffatt, Sir Roundell Palmer (then Attorney General), Mr. Roebuck, Mr. Miller, Mr. Ayrton, Mr. Murray, Mr. Malins (now Vice Chancellor), Mr. Goschen, Mr. Crum-Ewing, Mr. Gathorne Hardy, Mr. Dunlop, Mr. Lowe, Mr. Moncreiff, Mr. Weguelin, Mr. Vance, Mr. Hodgson, and Mr. Cave. In 1865 the Committee reported their opinion to the House as to the changes necessary to be made in the Law of Bankruptcy in the shape of thirty-one Resolutions; and I think, with one or two exceptions, the whole of the recommendations of that Committee have been incorporated in the Bill which I now ask your Lordships to read a second time.

VOL. CXCI. [THIRD SERIES.]

Coming now to these Bills, I have to state in the first place that the three measures now before your Lordships will, of themselves, if they become law, form a complete and entire code of bankruptcy for the country. They are consolidation Bills. They repeal every measure of bankruptcy passed up to the present time, and if they receive the assent of Parliament, any one who holds these three Acts in his hands will be in possession of the whole Bankruptcy Law of the country. In consolidation measures of this kind a number of provisions are necessarily re-enactments. But they are re-enactments in this sense. The Bill contains between 500 and 600 clauses. About a quarter of that number are new clauses, the others are re-enactments. I am, however, in a position to say, with regard to nearly every one of these re-enactments, that the clauses have been re-considered, and in many instances re-drawn, in order to simplify, and, if possible, to abbreviate and make more plain the enactments on the subject.

My Lords, I think the most convenient course I can now take in order to make the matter more intelligible will be as briefly as possible to go through the various heads of alteration of the law which these Bills propose. In the first place, I will ask your Lordships to consider the mode in which these Bills deal with the important subject of imprisonment for debt. The present state of the law is this—that no person can be imprisoned for debt before judgment in an action has been obtained, unless it be proved that he is about to leave the country, and become what is called an absconding debtor. In that case only can an arrest take place before judgment, and then only for the purpose of obtaining payment or security from the person who is about to leave the country. After judgment has been obtained under the present law the ordinary process can be issued by the creditor, and the debtor can be taken in execution and put in prison as a debtor. When there he can apply to be made a bankrupt, and if he does not think fit to do so he would be in a short time discharged under the Act of 1861, to which I have referred. The proposal which the present Bills make, as distinguished from the present law, is this—we propose to abolish imprisonment for debt altogether; that is to say, we propose to abolish altogether the power which the creditor has of his own will to issue a process after judgment under which a debtor may be confined. Your Lordships will not expect me at this time to enter into any argument in defence of the proposition to abolish imprisonment for debt. Your Lordships have passed the Bill of 1859, which contained an enactment to that effect. The total abolition of imprisonment for debt has further been recommended by a Committee of the other House, and measures have on two occasions passed the second reading in the other House for the abolition of imprisonment for debt. But your Lordships will naturally ask—Supposing that imprisonment for debt be abolished, what means can we substitute in lieu of imprisonment for dealing with persons against whom judgment has been obtained? We have introduced provisions under this head which have always been recommended to go along with the abolition of imprisonment for debt—that is to say, we provide that, if after judgment the debtor against whom judgment is obtained is shown to be about to leave the country without paying or securing the debt, he may be arrested as an absconding debtor, and, independently of that process, there is a power given of examining him in the most stringent way under what is termed a judgment debtor summons as to any property he may possess, and of requiring the discovery of any documents which would elucidate his position, so that, if possible, payment may be obtained by the realization of such property. In case he is unable or unwilling to give security for, or make payment of the debt, resort may be had to the Court of Bankruptcy for adjudication against him in the same manner as at present. Imprisonment for debt, as a process to which the creditor may resort of his own accord, will thus be at an end; but there will remain imprisonment under an attachment for non-payment of money by a Court of Equity or by order of a Common Law Court. There will remain imprisonment such as I have described in the event of a debtor being about to leave the country and refusing to pay or give security, and there will remain, finally, imprisonment either by County Courts or by Inferior Courts, which are analagous to them.

This brings me to another part of the subject to which I will ask your Lordships' particular attention—the mode in which imprisonment for debt is at present dealt with by the County Courts. At present, in the County Courts, if judgment has been obtained for a debt, the debtor may be called before the County Court Judge and examined as to his means of payment, and if the Judge be of opinion that he has means of paying the debt, either at once or by instalments, he may make an order accordingly; after which the debtor, if he does not pay, may be imprisoned by the Judge for any period not exceeding forty days. Now, it has always appeared to me that a very strong and anomalous power is thus given to these Courts. The arguments which are commonly adduced in support of it are these:—In the first place, it is said that we have to deal with men who live by their labour, and that since there occasionally come times of want of employment or of illness, such men, unless they can get credit during these intervals, will suffer very considerably, and that they cannot of credit unless their creditors are aware that they have the power of imprisoning them in the event of not paying. In the first place, it is alleged that if credit is given, and if the person of the debtor cannot be arrested by the County Court, the creditor will immediately seize the furniture or the other contents of the debtor's house, and that it would be a greater loss to the family of a working man that his home should be thus broken than that he should undergo temporary imprisonment. It is also said that this process, as shown by its results, operates very effectively in terrorem, for that whereas a great number of warrants of arrest are issued there are comparatively few instances in which the warrants are actually executed. I may refer to statistics upon this point which appear to me to possess considerable interest. Taking the eight years from 1859 to 1866, both inclusive, there were, in round numbers, 108,000 judgment summonses issued in the County Courts. Of that number 54,000 were actually heard; but only 26,000 resulted in warrants of commitment, and of these only 7,800 were actually carried out by the consigning of the debtors to prison. Thus out of the 108,000 judgment summonses issued, only 7,800, or about 7 per cent, led to imprisonment. It further appears that a few years ago the County Court Judges were consulted as to whether this power should be retained, and I am bound to say that, with very few exceptions, their opinion was that this power was of the greatest importance, some of them even saying that were it given up the system of recovering debts in the County Courts could not possibly be continued. These are the arguments for the maintenance of this power of imprisonment. But it has always appeared to me that by this power you continue a very invidious distinction between the case of the small debtor and that of the large one. The large debtor is absolved from the irksomeness of imprisonment, while the labouring man is still liable to it. It is very singular, too, that while the hypothesis is that you are dealing with a man who has nothing but his labour wherewith to discharge the debt, you put him, in order to make him pay, in a place where it is impossible for him to exercise his power of labour. Moreover, it has always appeared to me that by holding out this liability to imprisonment, you probably engender or continue a system of credit in itself vicious and undesirable. I remember very well hearing a right hon. Friend of mine (Mr. Henley) giving in very graphic terms the results of his own observation in the rural districts. He described how the travellers of small traders go to a farmhouse or the cottage of a labouring man, and, the head of the family being away at work, a lot of finery or other goods are shown to the wife and daughters, who are easily tempted to become purchasers, and to pledge the credit of the head of the family. This practice, Mr. Henley remarked, and I believe with great truth, these travellers would not dream of pursuing if they were not perfectly sure they could afterwards take out a summons and, if the man still refused to pay, could imprison him in order to compel payment. Individually, I should be very glad to see a way of putting an end to this power of imprisonment for debt by the County Courts and Inferior Courts altogether; but I am afraid it would be difficult to do so at once. I have, however, proposed by these Bills a course which I think will considerably diminish the practice and before long will lead to its extinction. I propose in the first place, in one of these Bills, that no committal shall take place in any Inferior Court except by the Judge himself and in open Court—for I find there is too much reason to suppose that a great number of these committals are at present made by the Registrars or at Chambers. I also propose that every Court invested with this power shall make an annual Return to Parliament of the names of persons committed by it for debt, so that Parliament may be kept acquainted with the extent to which the power is enforced, and that if any suspicion of abuse arises its attention may be drawn to the subject. I further propose an alternative which I think is in itself much more sensible, and much more likely to be beneficial than the present system. It is that a power should be given to the Judge of arresting the future wages or earnings of a debtor against whom judgment has been obtained, to the extent of 25 per cent; that is to say, a power of serving an order on the debtor's employer, under which one-fourth of his wages will be paid into Court as they become due for the benefit of the person who may have obtained judgment. The machinery by which this will be carried out will, I trust, be found simple and effectual, and I hope that as in consequence it would be comparatively useless to resort to imprisonment to compel payment, it will cause that practice to fall into desuetude.

The Lord Chancellor

The next point to which I wish to call your Lordships' attention is one of great importance—I refer to the existing power of a debtor becoming bankrupt on his own petition. Under the present law any person, whether in prison or not, may present a petition to the Bankruptcy Court, stating that he cannot meet his engagements, and thereupon he becomes bankrupt on his own petition and obtains the protection of the Court. The Returns of the Court of Bankruptcy laid upon the table a few days ago show that the total number of bankruptcies last year was 8,994, or, in round numbers, 9,000. Now, of these persons no less than 6,533 were made bankrupts on their own petition. On the petition of the creditors there were only 805—that is, 6,533 on the petition of the debtor himself as compared with 805 on the petition of the creditor. My noble and learned Friend (Lord Westbury) has very properly reminded me that I should state the number of petitions in formâ pauperis, which amount to 480 and should be added to the number I have already given. There is a striking piece of information contained in this Return upon another subject. How many bankruptcies do your Lordships suppose there were in that year in which no dividend was paid? No less than 5,876; and, my Lords, I believe it will be found by those who look minutely into the matter that it is principally in those bankruptcies which take place on the petition of the debtor himself that there are no dividends. Now, some propose that a stop should be put altogether to the practice of permitting a debtor making himself bankrupt on his own petition. I doubt whether that would be a very desirable course. In the first place, one may easily conceive a case in which it is quite proper that a debtor should make himself bankrupt, and should do so without any intention of acting otherwise than would be beneficial to his creditors. But there is a still more important reason against taking away that power. If you take away the power in name, nothing in the world is easier for one who wants to make himself a bankrupt than to get a friendly creditor to present a petition to have him declared bankrupt, and so the same thing would be done in another form. I think the present measure will treat this evil in a more satisfactory way. In the first place, the abolition of imprisonment for debt will take away one of the principal motives which at present induce a debtor to petition to be made bankrupt. In the second place, the course which this Bill proposes of leaving the after-acquired property of the debtor to a great extent subject to the payment of his debts will take away another powerful motive which at present operates in the same direction—that is to say, the inducement which there is at present to the debtor to become a bankrupt in order that he may secure his future property from his creditors. And more than that, the present measure will provide a remedy by substituting another process which I will describe. Any one who wishes to make himself a bankrupt must file a declaration of insolvency, which will be published. Thereupon his property will be secured against execution and against loss. For twenty-one days it will not be competent for the debtor to take any steps towards making himself a bankrupt. For these twenty-one days his creditors will know that he professes himself a bankrupt, and it will be for them to consider whether they will put themselves in motion to prevent him from petitioning. If after twenty-one days no creditor proceeds to make him a bankrupt, then, and only then, he may become so on his own petition.

The next important alteration which this Bill proposes is to introduce to a great extent what I may term the Scotch system of trusts in bankruptcy—a system which has worked very well in Scotland, and which the mercantile community in England are anxious to try. The main characteristic of this system is that, in place of having a bankruptcy conducted with forensic proceedings through the Court of Bankruptcy, the creditors, on the first meeting after the bankruptcy, may determine for themselves the course to be pursued in winding up the affairs of the debtor. They may, if they please, have a trustee to represent them and wind up the estate. They may choose that trustee where and as they please—he may be a creditor, or he may not—and I anticipate that, as has been the case in Scotland, it will be found that many persons will be anxious to show how speedily and economically they can, as trustees, wind up the estate, and thus seek employment in a legitimate and useful way. Over the trustee the creditors will appoint one two inspectors out of their own number, who will control the trustee, and keep the general body of creditors apprised of what is being done. And, besides, the Accountant in Bankruptcy, who at present does nothing more than keep the accounts of the Bankruptcy Court, will perform the functions of a general auditor of bankrupts, and will be supervisor of the trustees. In Scotland, the fashion has been not to have even an official assignee, as we have in this country. After the most mature consideration, we have thought the best course to take is this:—The present official assignees will be continued as provisional trustees if a necessity should arise that any person should be put in possession of the property before the creditors would have an opportunity of appointing a trustee of their own. The official assignee will act as this provisional trustee, and he will step in and take possession if ordered by the Court, but not otherwise; and as soon as the creditors choose their own trustee the functions of the provisional trustee will be put an end to. Further than this, we have introduced a provision which will, I venture to think, expedite the distribution among the creditors of the estate in trust. We provide that the creditors' trustee shall not in any case be paid any remuneration until the accounts have been audited and the remuneration allowed on the audited accounts—so that there will be no retaining any sum for remuneration until the accounts have been regularly audited and passed.

I now come to what is next in order of importance—I mean the discharge of the bankrupt. My Lords, the principles upon which bankrupts in this country have been discharged have varied very materially from time to time. I will not trouble your Lordships with a history of the alterations made at different periods. The present system is this:—The discharge of the bankrupt may be altogether refused, or it may be suspended for a limited period, or it may be granted; but when it is granted it frees him from any claim upon subsequently acquired property—that is to say, it leaves the property afterwards acquired free from liability for his own debts, unless he has committed some of the offences pointed out by the present Bankruptcy Law. If he has, a condition may be attached to his discharge, making his future property liable by way of punishment for his offence. I venture to think that in any law as to the discharge of a bankrupt there are mainly three things which ought to be kept in view. In the first place, I submit that no arbitrary power whatever should be left in the Court of indefinitely postponing or refusing the discharge of the bankrupt who has surrendered his property. In the second place, if the bankrupt has committed any offence against the Bankruptcy Law—and every offence that can be committed ought to be clearly ascertained and defined—in that case you will rightly and properly suspend his discharge for a limited period by way of punishment, and you may also proceed to inflict punishment upon him in other ways if his offence amounts to a misdemeanour. And, further, I think that whatever rule is to apply to the future property of the bankrupt ought to be clearly defined, and to apply in all cases alike. I ought to state that the Committee of the House of Commons to which I have referred made this proposal—that, for the future, no bankrupt should be allowed his discharge unless his estate paid 6s. 8d. in the pound, or one-third. If his estate should not pay 6s. 8d. in the pound, they recommend that his discharge should be suspended for six years, and that he should receive it at the end of that time. My Lords, upon this point there is, as has been represented to me, a great diversity of opinion among the mercantile community. I had the pleasure of receiving a deputation from the Associated Chambers of Commerce, and they stated that different views were taken upon this question, and I think several of them said that “a hard and fast line” might operate very unjustly. For example, it would be very hard that a bankrupt whose estate paid 6s. 6d. in the pound should have to wait six years before getting his discharge because he could not pay the remaining 2d. You have these difficulties to deal with whenever you draw an arbitrary line; and, besides, they say that the amount of dividend is by no means a competent test as to the conduct of the bankrupt and his right to a discharge. We, on the contrary, propose that there should be no suspension under any circumstances of the discharge of the bankrupt for more than three years, but that for certain specified offences there should be a right to suspend the discharge for three years, or any portion of that time. We propose, further, that there should be a power to suspend the discharge for one year upon any ground the Court may think sufficient to justify such a measure over and above the grounds mentioned in the catalogue of offences. Beyond that, we propose that the after-acquired property of the bankrupt should be subject to the payment of his debts in this way. If it should appear at a subsequent period that the bankrupt has acquired property, after deducting what may be proper for the maintenance of himself and his family, and providing for debts subsequently contracted — for, of course, they must be provided for — any surplus remaining may be made liable by an order of the Court for the payment of former creditors. Now that the proposition is to abolish imprisonment for debt, there is no longer any reason why a bankrupt should do what, unfortunately, too many of them have done — that is to say, acquire large property afterwards and leave the whole of his debts under the previous bankruptcy unpaid. With regard to this after-acquired property, I should add that power is given in this Bill to a specified majority of the creditors, should they think fit, to release the debtor from his liability in this respect, and he may by their consent acquire an absolute legal discharge as to all after-acquired property.

I now desire, my Lords, to say a few words with regard to the offences for which punishment may be inflicted upon the bankrupt, either by suspension of the certificate of discharge, or by proceedings in the nature of proceedings for a misdemeanour. If your Lordships will look at the list of offences which are specified at page 35 of this Bankruptcy Bill, you will readily follow the observations which I desire to make upon it. The whole description of these offences has given me great anxiety, and the specification of them has been drawn up in a somewhat novel form. With regard to the punishment of the bankrupt we get rid of a part of the existing law which has been found in practice to give some trouble—the general introduction to the catalogue of offences declaring the intent with which a thing may be done. I will give one instance, which will illustrate what I desire to say on this point. At present the law is that a bankrupt may be punished if he has contracted his debts without a reasonable expectation of being able to pay them. In practice the way that has worked is this:—Creditors come to the Court and say—“Here is a man who owes £20,000. He never in any year made above £1,000 a year. It is quite clear, therefore, that he must have contracted this amount of debt without any reasonable expectation of being able to pay.” That sounds very plausible at the outset. But the moment you come to details you find that you are obliged, when charging a man with misdemeanour, to put your finger upon some particular debt and say, “that debt was contracted without any reasonable expectation of being able to pay it;” and experience shows that it is utterly impossible to convict any person, singling out any one debt in that way, and the affirmative being on the person objecting. Now, in order to meet that case we propose, under the sixth head of offences, that the Court may suspend the order of discharge from taking effect for any time not exceeding three years from the date of the order, if it appears to the satisfaction of the Court

“That any Debt or Liability of the Bankrupt subsisting at the Time of Adjudication was not contracted or incurred by him with a reasonable Expectation (Proof whereof shall lie on him) of his being able to pay or discharge it.”

That is to say, we put the onus upon the bankrupt to show that when his debts were contracted he had a reasonable expectation of being able to pay them. That is a mode of legislation entirely in accordance with the course taken in many cases in our criminal law, and it commends itself to our common understanding. If you find a man in a position in which a presumption arises that he has contracted debts without any reasonable expectation of paying them, and if the means of proof are in his hands to show the contrary, I submit that it is not unfair to throw the burden of that proof upon him. We take the same course with regard to offences which shall be taken to be misdemeanours; and although this inversion of the burden of proof in this way may appear a small matter in itself, I venture to think it will lead to one of the most important changes in the administration of the Bankruptcy Law of this country. Beyond this, we provide that, whereas hitherto these offences have been only triable before a Judge at assizes, there shall be a power to try these misdemeanours at Quarter Sessions and by the Recorders—Courts in which they may be easily disposed of.

Without delaying your Lordships by any complete specification of the enactments of the Bill, I may say we have deavoured in another respect to make alteration in the Law of Bankruptcy which will be advantageous. At present serious questions may arise under bankruptcy which cannot be decided by the Bankruptcy Court itself. Thus the validity of an adjudication being in dispute may fall to be decided by higher Courts than the Court of Bankruptcy; and questions may arise which are now determined by the Courts of Common Law. I think it would be desirable to make the Bankruptcy Court on this head—to use an expression from Scotland—“self containing;” to give it the power of deciding once for all whether an adjudication is valid or invalid; and powers of that kind are included in this Bill.

I now come to one of the most important questions for consideration in connection with the Bankruptcy Law—that of deeds of composition and arrangement. Deeds of this kind have been a feature in our Bankruptcy Law certainly since the year 1449; but they received a very great extension by the provisions of the Act of 1861. Upon this point I will not trouble your Lordships by any lengthened statistics; but there are one or two figures very interesting in themselves, and bearing materially upon the legislation now proposed. I want to show the way in which these deeds of composition and arrangement have grown since 1861. In 1862-3 there were 635 of these deeds registered; in 1863-4 there were 1,176; in 1864-5 there were 5,204; in 1865-6 there were 5,588; and in 1866-7 a Return laid upon the table a few days ago shows that there were no less than 6,912. Upon these 7,000 deeds the stamp duty alone amounts to £21,842. The gross value—and I draw your Lordships' attention to these colossal figures—the gross value of the estates and effects included in the composition deeds was £8,737,100. But what do your Lordships suppose was the amount of secured debt thus compounded for? No less than £29,642,628. So that nearly £30,000,000 of debt was dealt with and compounded for through the medium of these deeds of composition and arrangement. Now, these being the sort of figures with which we have to deal, and it being the amount of interest at stake, your Lordships will readily understand that the mode of dealing with deeds of this kind must be a matter of extreme importance. I will tell your Lordships the general nature of the complaints which are made—and they are loud and strong—as to these deeds, which have thus grown and multiplied. In the first place, it is a strong measure at the least to say that the minority of creditors shall be bound by the resolution of the majority to accept a sum for their debt far less than the sum really due to them. But that is not the only difficulty. By the present arrangement, what are called the secured creditors—that is, the creditors who hold security to the full amount or to a large amount of their debt—are entitled to vote, and do vote, in the majority; so that the result may be that that majority is obtained by means of the secured creditors, who bind the minority of unsecured creditors to accept less than is due to them. The next complaint is that there are no means of ascertaining that the array of creditors set out as assenting to the arrangement are really creditors at all. It is said that such things as this happens:—A man puts forward a list of alleged creditors and shows that a majority accept the composition which he tenders. But the complaint is that a number of these may be sham creditors, who have no real existence at all, and that the minority has to find out whether they are bond fide creditors or not. Further complaint is made that under the present system there is no mode by which a competent judicial determination can be obtained whether one of these deeds is a valid and binding deed, which shall regulate the rights of creditors without controversy. These are the main objections to the present system with regard to deeds. We have dealt with these objections in the present measure, and I will state the five leading features in the clauses we propose, which, if adopted, will provide a complete system of law respecting these deeds. First, we require a declaration from the Bankruptcy Court in the nature of a judicial act that the deed is a complete and perfect deed, thereby stamping it with authority and with conclusiveness, and making it a deed which, when it has received the judicial stamp and approbation, is not to be disputed elsewhere. Next, we provide that no person is entitled to rank as a creditor for the purpose of making a majority until he has proved his debt, just in the same way as a debt is proved in bankruptcy. Thirdly, we provide that secured creditors, if they wish to vote, must deduct the value of their securities. Fourthly, we provide as to deeds what I may term a chapter of misdemeanours, applicable to deeds just in the same way that similar offences are dealt with in bankruptcy. The result will be that, whereas at present the debtor thinks that by resorting to a deed containing a majority of his creditors he can escape the law for any offence of which he may have been guilty with regard to his estate, he will now find that, notwithstanding that deed, he will be liable to be punished for any of these offences, just in the same way as if he became a bankrupt. A false claim for a debt under a deed is also made punishable as a false proof under bankruptcy.

The Lord Chancellor

It only remains that I should state our proposals with regard to Courts of Bankruptcy. We propose no new Courts, no additions to our present Courts and Judges. On the contrary, we propose that the district Courts of Bankruptcy shall be gradually absorbed, as each Commissioner dies or retires, and that the district Courts shall be closed. There is at present concurrent jurisdiction in the County Courts, and they will become the Courts of bankruptcy for the country districts. We shall use the district Courts while they remain ; in the meantime the County Courts will be gradually familiarizing themselves with the administration of bankruptcy, the whole of which they will ultimately dispose of. There are large powers of transfer from one Court to another, or from a County Court to London, if it should be deemed desirable by the creditors. The metropolitan district will be twenty miles round the Post Office, and there will be three London Commissioners, who will be primary Judges along with the Judges of the County Courts in the districts. The three London Judges will also compose an appellate tribunal from the County Courts ; and any two of the Judges may hear appeals. If an appeal relates to an estate in respect of which the debts are under £300, the judgment of the London Court will be final ; but in other cases there will be an appeal to the Court of Chancery. The provision for appeals will be ample, for the appellate business in the Court of Chancery has been for some years easily disposed of in one day a week.

Certain financial causes of the Bill are not supposed to be visible to your Lordships until they come back again from the other House ; but we hope that arrangements will be made by which establishment expenses of the Bankruptcy Courts will be charged upon the Consolidated Fund, the Treasury taking the income from the fees which are at present applied to the payment of the Bankruptcy Courts expenses.

These are the leading features of the measures to the first of which I ask your Lordships to give a second reading ; and, if they receive your approbation, I think they will effect a very important reform in the Bankruptcy Law. No point has been urged by the mercantile community which has not been attended to, and, I think, effectually met by the provisions of these Bills. I have sometimes heard it said that great desire has been manifested for a thoroughly satisfactory measure of bankruptcy reform ; but I do not believe that there ever can be a thoroughly satisfactory measure, because bankruptcy itself is not a satisfactory thing. It is not satisfactory to the debtor, and it certainly is not satisfactory to the creditor, in whose mind it is generally associated with loss and disappointment, and often with fraud and imposition. Under these circumstances, it is not surprising that there always is, as there always will be, a disposition to throw upon the law something of that blame and of that discontent which arises not so much out of the law as out of the subject-matter with which the law has to deal. However, I believe that these measures will really do the best that can be done at present with the law upon the subject. I regret that, owing to circumstances beyond my control, the print of these Bills has not been longer in your Lordships' hands. I have been very anxious to ask you to hear the statement I had to make, because I think that statement will enable your Lordships to find your way, so to speak, through the great mass of paper which the Bills occupy. As to the further progress of these measures, I am desirous to consult your Lordships' convenience ; but I am anxious that the measures should as soon as possible receive your Lordships' approval, and go down to the other House of Parliament. At the same time, if it be your Lordships' opinion that these Bills should pass through a Select Committee of this House, I know so well your Lordships' energy and assiduity, that I shall not be disposed to offer any opposition to that proposal. The only drawback will be that the judicial business of the House, which is considerably in arrear, may be interfered with for a few days. However, I am in your Lordships' hands, and I now ask you to give the first of these Bills a second reading.

Moved, "That the Bankruptcy Acts Repeal Bill be now read 2<sup>a</sup>."—(The Lord Chancellor.)

LORD WESTBURY said, he would not now go into the details of these Bills; but a more important subject than the law of bankrupt debtor and creditor could hardly be taken into consideration. The past year had been heavily marked by commercial disaster, which, he was sorry to say, had largely affected the honour and integrity of the commercial community. A great part of this had arisen from bad law, for our Law of Bankruptcy was a reproach to us, as were our laws for the winding up of insolvent companies, the whole being in such a state as to excite the surprise of intelligent foreigners. We seemed to have been very deficient in discovering the principles which should guide us in legislating upon these matters, or the rules which might be founded on a wise expediency. He would ask their Lordships' attention while he pointed out some general principles upon which these measures had been founded, in order that their Lordships might determine whether they were right in themselves, and whether they were correctly and wisely applied. He concurred in the melancholy reflection that those who looked back at the history of the question might despair of satisfactory legislation upon it. Lord Eldon, sixty-seven years ago, said that the Law of Bankruptcy as administered in England was in itself accessory to as great a nuisance as any law of the land; and what had we done to alter that in sixty-seven years? A Consolidation Act passed in 1825 turned out a failure, and another in 1826, believed to be very complete, required a supplementary measure. Subsequent legislation took place, he believed, in the years 1836 and 1839; and at last, in 1849, the whole system was entirely swept away and a new one introduced. The new system, however, lived for a short time only, and it fell to his lot in 1860 to bring in a consolidation measure. That failed; and in 1861 another measure was introduced. Unfortunately it passed in an imperfect form, some of its most material provisions having been struck out or altered during its progress through Parliament, so that when it came to be put in operation, it was like a watch from which the main spring had been left out. This measure had likewise been condemned, although he might remark it had been the parent of a

The Lord Chancellor

mode of administration which had been received with considerable favour. The measure introduced subsequently, in the year 1866, proved equally unsuccessful. That measure was followed by the Bill now under their Lordships' consideration. Now, in almost all these Bills there had been a wandering up and down, and none of the propositions had given satisfaction. Sometimes the complaint had been that the creditors had too much control, and that there was not sufficient superintending power; at another time, the complaint had been that there was too much official influence, and that the creditors ought to possess greater powers. But all through there was a consciousness of a defect existing in the law. It was thus obvious that though the existing system was generally regarded as imperfect and unsatisfactory, people were utterly at variance as to what ought to be substituted for it. He trusted, therefore, that their Lordships would agree with him that they ought to endeavour to find out the true principles, even though in so doing they might be led into paths which had been hitherto untrodden. The great object of a Bankruptcy Law should be to make an equal and just distribution of the property of the bankrupt among his creditors. The Legislature had no right or title whatever to consider the bankrupt, or to benefit him in any way which did not tend directly or indirectly to the benefit of the creditors. The business of Parliament ought to be to devise the simplest process of taking, realizing, and distributing the bankrupt's property. Of course, a tribunal must be provided for inquiring into the justice of the cases brought before it; but when this had been done, the Legislature had no further duty to discharge. Under the existing system it was impossible to arrive at the simple end in view without the employment of a number of officers, and without calling in at every turn the aid of the attorney, the consequence being that the estate was eaten up entirely by the expense of the machinery which had been introduced for the purpose of collecting and converting the bankrupt's property. He would now direct their Lordships' attention to the constitution of the tribunal which was at present intrusted with the duty of superintending and distributing the bankrupt's estate. Was there any security that that duty would be discharged efficiently and in a manner calculated to command respect for the tribunal on the part of those who resorted to it? His noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack proposed to leave the chief tribunal precisely in the condition in which he found it. There were three Commissioners, two of whom were very aged men, and had, he believed, held office above thirty years, and therefore they could hardly be supposed to be much alive to the necessity of adopting an entirely new system. He wished, of course, to speak of them with all the respect due to persons who had been long employed as servants of the community; but, at the same time, he must be permitted to say that they were by no means fitting representatives of this important branch of the law.* They acted wholly independently of one another, and were not governed by any one mode of procedure. Sometimes they differed among themselves, and there was no presiding or controlling power. Above all, the besetting vice in the present constitution of the Court was that administrative and judicial duties were mixed up and blended together. At one time a Commissioner would sit as a tribunal to determine questions which might be brought before him. At another time he would proceed to hold a noisy and multitudinous meeting, and would bring into his Court a rabble, who acted without any considerations of decorum or decency. Indeed, in the evidence taken before the Committee of the House of Commons in 1864, the existing tribunal was spoken of in the most disparaging terms. It was not fair that this important branch of the law should be administered in a hole-and-corner court in Basinghall Street, in a building thronged by persons who flocked together for the purpose of being present at meetings which had no connection with the judicial business of the Court. In his opinion the law of debtor and creditor should be represented by a Judge, sitting side by side with the other Judges of the superior Courts, and whose attention should be confined entirely to judicial business. There would then necessarily be a proper distinction drawn between administrative and judicial duties, and at the same time uniformity in the administration of the law would be secured. He earnestly protested, therefore, against continuing the present mode of administering the Law of Bankruptcy. Although he was only repeating an old story, he must urge on their Lordships the necessity and propriety of providing for the administration of that part of the law of debtor and creditor in a manner correspondent with its importance and its value to the country at large. If they did so, they might effect real improvement; if they did not, they would always have, if he might so speak, the dregs and fœces only of insolvency flowing into court, and all the rest seeking other channels and other modes of arrangement. What they had to look to first of all was not so much any defect in the principle of the law as in the system of administering it with reference to the collection and distribution of the bankrupt's property. On examination of a great number of cases he found that in many of them the expenses of administration were frightful. He had received many letters from the creditors of bankrupts informing him of the amount of their claims and the extent of the bankrupts' estates, and telling him that the dividend they obtained was only a few pence, the great bulk of the estate going to the benefit of the attorneys, the accountants, the messengers, the auctioneers, and other persons. He would give one case as an illustration, the correctness of which he had ascertained. The gross proceeds of the estate were £777 19s. 6d. The solicitor's bill amounted to £366, or nearly one-half of the whole estate, the accountant's charges to £60 14s. 9d., the official assignee's to £33, the manager's to £37 11s. Altogether £523 went to the various officials, and only £254 was left to be divided among the creditors. All that waste of the estate took place secundum legem in the process of administration, the creditors receiving only about one-third of that to which they were entitled. In another case the gross proceeds of the estate were £250. The solicitor's bill amounted to £143, the manager's bill to £45 19s. 10d., the official assignee's to £12 17s., and after various minor other charges, the balance divisible among the creditors was only £34. Before such a state of things could be effectually corrected they must establish some office by which all bankrupt estates could be collected and distributed at a total expense not exceeding 10 per cent of the gross value. Taking a number of bankrupt estates which had been administered of late years with, perhaps, exceptional economy, he found that the expenses amounted to 33½ per cent of the gross value. The remedy for such evils was to be sought by creating a species of tribunal charged with the duty of collecting bankrupt estates, or which would be far better, more in accordance with our practice, and equally effective—by attaching the duty of collecting such estates to the chamber of a Judge, and requiring the estates to be realized and administered under his immediate superintendence. With what facility and economy estates could be collected and administered in the chambers of Judge his noble and learned Friend (the Master of the Rolls) could testify. He had the pleasure of examining some of the Returns connected with the estates of deceased persons, and found that such estates could be administered in the Master of the Rolls' Chambers at less expense than that incurred by executors who did the work through a solicitor in the ordinary manner. Then, why should they not let a Judge in Bankruptcy do that duty in the same way? Why not let him follow in the footsteps of his noble and learned Friend? If the assets of a deceased person could be collected in that manner so could the estate of a bankrupt—the work in the two cases was of precisely the same character. He entreated their Lordships, therefore, to have recourse to that mode of procedure, and not any longer to allow the realization of bankrupt estates to be committed to a commissioner who had not the same responsibility or authority as one of the eminent Judges of the land. Let there be a Judge in Bankruptcy charged with the duty of administering the law, and having under him a great court or chamber to realize and administer the property under his judicial superintendence; and thus they would get rid of the swarm of auctioneers, accountants, messengers, and other creatures who now crawled and fed upon the body of bankrupt estates. At present, no sooner had there been an adjudication of bankruptcy than some solicitor, or firm of solicitors, received a copy of a statement, probably from some inferior officer of the Court, and then communication was immediately sent and to every creditor offering to undertake the business of the bankruptcy, and to do all that was necessary in the most expeditious and economical manner. The creditor was also requested to sign a paper annexed to that communication, and when that had been done the solicitor went before the Court, and said he had authority to act for the creditors. He accordingly chose an assignee, a creature of his own, and then the estate was wound up in the wasteful manner he had already described. He rejoiced that the time had come when the necessity of the abolition of imprisonment for debt was generally acknowledged. Seven years ago, earnest as he was on this subject, he was obliged to qualify the measure he brought in. But while their Lordships were asked to abolish imprisonment for debt under the present Bill, he trusted they would consider the condition in which the poor man now stood, of being imprisoned under the operation of the County Courts. He had before described the hardship of the situation of the humbler classes in this respect. He had given instances to prove that the poor man always had to buy his commodities at an expense of 10 or 20 per cent more than if he possessed greater means. He had asked their Lordships to strike at the present system, under which the poor were liable to be sent to prison for forty days unless they were able to pay their former debts, as well as to find the means of present subsistence out of their earnings. Under this Bill there would be bankrupts who had contracted debts to a large amount, and the Court was not, except in certain cases, to consider whether they had been contracted fraudulently or not. But, if so, how could they allow so unjust a law as this power of committal by the County Courts to remain in operation against the poor man? He trusted that their Lordships would approve the measure which he brought forward in 1864. The Government of that day were not quite prepared to accept it, although he was glad that some of its provisions had since become law. Another question was, how far they would allow recourse to be had to the Bankruptcy Law where the debtor had no assets? The Law of Bankruptcy had grown, in a great degree, out of imprisonment for debt, and had properly been described as an execution for the benefit of all the creditors. Equal distribution was the object, and if there were no property bankruptcy was useless. It was proposed by his noble and learned Friend that the bankrupt should give a certain notice of his condition before he applied to the Court, but the notice would be disregarded, for no one would attend to it. In fraudulent cases, the common course of proceeding was that when a man in trade found himself involved in debt, he generally made a bill of sale in favour of some creditor—perhaps his father or his brother—and then he went into the Bankruptcy Court to whitewash himself. He was whitewashed; he came out a new man; and he entered into possession of the property which had been kept for him during his bankruptcy, and this course he frequently pursued four or five times over. But he (Lord Westbury) said do not let the debtor be adjudged a bankrupt unless there was something for the Bankruptcy Law to do. The object of a Bankruptcy Law was to take the estate of the debtor and to divide it equally, speedily, and economically among the creditors. Why should a debtor be permitted to go into the Bankruptcy Court, and to put the country to expense, when he had not, perhaps, a shilling to give up? He entreated his noble and learned Friend (the Lord Chancellor) to put a limit, and not put the Act in operation unless there was a certain amount of property to be divided. It was said in the House of Commons that such a provision would only act as an inducement to a debtor to get a quantity of goods into his hands upon the eve of his bankruptcy so that he might have something to surrender; but surely the law would discover and punish a fraud of that kind, and it certainly could be no reason why the general principle of not opening the doors of the Court except to those who honestly required its aid should not be carried out. Then arose the question whether the future property of the bankrupt should be liable to his creditors. A man came to the Bankruptcy Court to be relieved from the contract into which he had entered to pay his creditors in full. He was relieved accordingly; but was he to be absolutely and for ever relieved, or only relieved under certain conditions? This matter was much discussed in the other House, and the question was whether the debtor was to be discharged if he paid a certain dividend, or whether they would make his future estate liable? He begged to call his noble and learned Friend's attention to the very imperfect manner in which this clause of the Bill was worded, and the impossibility of giving effect to it. There was another difficulty in giving effect to a Bankruptcy Act. If a creditor thought he could get anything out of the debtor he employed a solicitor. By doing so, and by incurring an expense of £40, he might get a certain sum for himself, which, if divided equally among the creditors, would only increase his dividend, perhaps, about 1s. in the pound. The evil to be redressed was that there was no prosecutor, no provisions which could be put in motion by the Judge, no mode by which that could be done which justice demanded. There was a clause by which the debtor was to be summoned, and then inquiry would be made whether he was able to pay any sum towards the discharge of the debt. The cost and difficulty, and the necessity of employing a solicitor, would deter creditors from availing themselves of the process proposed in the Bill. In framing his Bill of 1861 he acted in deference to the opinion of a large meeting of Members of Parliament and delegates of Chambers of Commerce at which it was insisted that everything ought to be given to the creditors, who had a right to do what they chose with a bankrupt's estate. He endeavoured to correct the evils to which this system would have given rise by the introduction of a Chief Judge; but that proposal was rejected by their Lordships. The consequence had been that the Bill had not worked satisfactorily, and the present and any future measures would prove equally unsatisfactory unless a remedy were provided for creditors who were utterly defenceless, supine, or apprehensive of incurring cost. Were a competent tribunal erected to collect and administer the bankrupt's assets, the frauds and plunder now complained of would be prevented, and confidence in the administration of bankruptcy would be restored, for creditors would feel some assurance of receiving what an estate was capable of producing, without being subject to the present enormous deductions.

LORD CHELMSFORD said, it was a striking proof of the inherent difficulty of this subject that the measure of 1861, though framed by the noble and learned Lord who had just spoken (Lord Westbury), after having directed his acute and intelligent mind to the question, proved so unsatisfactory that within three years fresh legislation was generally called for. That demand led to an inquiry by a Committee of the other House, and a Report was presented in 1865, upon which, as had been stated by his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack, the present Bill was founded. The noble and learned Lord opposite (Lord Westbury) had attributed the entire failure of the Act of 1861 to an alteration made by their Lordships, which he had compared to taking the mainspring out of the works of a watch. That mainspring was the appointment of a Chief Judge in Bankruptcy, grafted on the existing system—for the Commissioners were not to be superseded. That the functions or utility of that Chief Judge were to be it was impossible for those who were conversant with the subject to understand, and his noble and learned Friend (Lord Cranworth) and himself were unable to obtain any satisfactory explanation on that head; all his noble and learned Friend (Lord Westbury) could say was that the Chief Judge was the keystone of the arch. Had it been proposed to remove the Commissioners their Lordships would, no doubt, have acquiesced in the appointment of a Chief Judge, but such a proposal would not have differed materially from the present proposition in which the three Commissioners were to be Judges of the Court. If it had been proposed to abolish the Commissioners, he (Lord Chelmsford) for his own part would have seen no objection to the appointment of a Judge; but he could not see any reason for the creation of a new Judge if the existing Commissioners were to be retained. As to the miserable dividend which had been derived in many cases, his noble and learned Friend had entirely forgotten that this had arisen under his measure of 1861; and he made no reference to the alteration now proposed, which would reduce the expenses to a very small amount, and would leave creditors, he believed, in every case a considerable dividend. For many years he (Lord Chelmsford) had thought that the only mode of dealing with bankruptcy was to encourage in every way an arrangement between the debtor and his creditors, and that if they could not agree and the matter were brought into the Court it should be left entirely in its hands. Upon consideration, however, and ascertaining the opinion of the commercial world, he was satisfied that the plan now proposed and which was based on the Scotch system, was the only one which would prove efficient and satisfactory. His noble and learned Friend (Lord Westbury) had fallen into some misapprehensions with reference to the Bills introduced in 1866 and 1867. The former, brought in by Sir Roundell Palmer, then Attorney General, was mainly founded on the Scotch system; it did not prove a failure, for circumstances prevented its passing. In 1867 a very similar Bill was introduced, but, the Reform Bill occupying the whole attention of Parliament, it did not pass. Now, the present Bill was founded altogether on the Scotch system. It would get rid of the solicitor, the accountants, and the trade assignee, who he feared had generally been a mere tool in the hands of the solicitor and accountants: it would give creditors what the commercial world had long desired—control over the bankrupt's affairs, not only by a preliminary arrangement among themselves, but even when the matter had been brought into Court, for the Court would only decide questions of law which might arise. The creditors would appoint their trustee and inspectors, and the latter would probably be creditors themselves, while the former might or might not be so. The trustee would be checked by the inspectors, and they in turn would be checked by the accounts being audited by the Accountant in Bankruptcy. His noble and learned Friend near him (Lord Colonsay) would correct him if he was wrong in saying that this system in Scotland had worked in the most satisfactory manner; and he was told that upon an average the creditors obtained 88 per cent upon the gross assets, the expenses being no more than 12 per cent. He hoped, therefore, though his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack did not anticipate that an entirely satisfactory Law of Bankruptcy would ever be passed, that the measure, which had adopted in some of its details the system which had proved so successful in Scotland, would be found equally successful by the commercial community of this country. The measure was so important and so complicated that its details could not be satisfactorily discussed in that House; he therefore agreed with his noble and learned Friend that it was desirable that it should be referred to a Select Committee, where it might receive the attention of noble and learned Lords who had devoted special attention to the subject, and who might put the measure in the best possible shape. Under these circumstances, he would not think himself justified in trespassing any further on their Lordships.

Lord Chelmsford

LORD ROMILLY regretted that their Lordships should be called upon to read the Bill a second time so soon after it had been placed in their Lordships' hands. Through the courtesy of his noble and learned Friend he got a copy of it on Wednesday last; but in the case of a Bill of 504 clauses it was impossible to satisfy himself thoroughly about it. The measure seemed to go in the right direction, but to do so timidly. He agreed in all that had been said with respect to the defects in our Bankruptcy Law ; but the great defect of all he believed to be the complicated machinery and the enormous number of officers created for the purpose of its administration. It was unquestionable that much larger dividends were received under the old system of commissions directed by the Lord Chancellor than under the system of Bankruptcy Commissioners and official assignees. The Bill ought, in his opinion, to put an end to the whole system of judicial establishments, of course giving proper compensation in the case of existing interests. In 1854 a Commission, composed of very eminent persons, was appointed to inquire into the Law of Bankruptcy ; and a solicitor of great experience gave evidence to the effect that he had administered an estate in bankruptcy in which the dividends amounted to £32,000 and the expenses to £880, and another in the Court of Chancery the assets of which were £17,000 and the expenses only £55. There might be some little difference from the one being an insolvent estate and the other not ; but the great difference arose from the circumstances to which he had referred. There were two branches of every Bill on this subject—the one which dealt with the voluntary system under which creditors wound up estates for themselves, and the other with the compulsory system. If the creditors wished to wind up an estate for themselves under deed of arrangement, or under the trustee system of Scotland, it was quite proper that they should be allowed to do so. But for that purpose it was not necessary to give the powers of a judicial establishment. He could not help thinking there was too much in the shape of trustees and officials in the Bill. There were very many clauses of the Bill which would require great consideration in the Select Committee, and it would be necessary also to go through the Bill in that House after it had come from the Committee. One great cause of expense, and a great evil in itself, was the attempt to induce creditors to make personal attacks on the bankrupt for the purpose of punishing him because they had lost their money. But punishment was quite distinct from the collection of debts, and the two things should be kept entirely separate. He was not at all sanguine about the success of this measure, and he could not help thinking that his noble and learned Friend was right when he said that it would probably be found not satisfactory—it would probably add one more to the list of failures which had characterized all attempts at legislation on this subject. If the Bill should come before their Lordships from the Select Committee, he would propose several Amendments which, in his opinion, would be required for putting the measure on a better footing.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, in reply, said, there were one or two points which had been adverted to on which he wished to avoid misunderstanding. In the first place, he wished to observe that it should not be supposed that the Bill had been prepared in any haste, for it had occupied the attention of the draftsmen for nearly two years, and had derived the advantage of the considerable amount of criticism which had been passed on the subject in the House of Commons. His noble and learned Friend near him (Lord Westbury) had referred to the manner in which the administration of the bankrupt's estate was clogged by officials, and the expense thereby engendered. With every word that had been said on that subject he agreed. These things were the scandals of the Bankruptcy Court—the question was how they were to be removed ? Before the Act of 1861, his noble and learned Friend had made much the same observations as he had done to-night, and they had been frequently made by the whole commercial community. But what were the remedies which the commercial community proposed, and had his noble and learned Friend sufficiently weighed those remedies ? Why, seventy delegates, representing thirty-six Chambers of Commerce, had said that a thorough reform in the Law of Bankruptcy was needed, with a view to a speedy distribution of the estate and the suppression of fraud, that the provisions of the Scotch Law had proved eminently satisfactory in accomplishing those objects, and that in any measure for the reform of the Law of Bankruptcy those provisions should be copied as closely as possible. This is what the Bill proposed to do : all the creditors would have to do would be to bid the officials of the court “farewell,” to appoint their own trustee, and make their own bargain for the collection of the estate, and over that trustee they would have their own inspectors. The expenses now so much complained of might, he thought, be reduced to the level of those in Scotland. By a very accurate Return it appeared that the total ordinary penses were about 14½ per cent, and if the occasional and extraordinary expenses were added the amount would be ¼ per cent, which was the highest under any circumstances. The commercial community said — “We desire nothing better than to collect the debts of our debtors on those terms;” and the Bill proposed to arm creditors with those powers. But his noble and learned Friend said “that will require very little judicial machinery.” So said he; and he hoped that in a short time the judicial machinery would be much less indeed than it was at present. It would therefore be very unwise, in the expectation of that result, to keep away the existing judicial machinery for the purpose of restoring it in another form. Well, then, with regard to the suggestion of a Chief Judge in Bankruptcy, I thought that nothing could be more convenient than to multiply special Courts for special purposes. If a first-class Judge were set up to deal with the law of debtor and creditor alone, you could not find sufficient work for him, unless you concentrated all the bankruptcy business in London. Such a Judge must be occupied, not with administrative, but judicial business. You would not set him to do the work of an accountant; he must deal with grave and solemn questions of law, which alone would not employ the services of a superior Judge. Again, nothing could be more delusive than to compare, as his noble and learned Friend (the Master of the Rolls) had compared, the expense of administering estates in Chancery with that of administering insolvent estates in Bankruptcy. In Chancery there was little or no controversy about debts or about the conduct of a trader; no questions arose respecting a trader’s discharge; and to set up a sort of Vice Chancellor in Bankruptcy with an army of chief clerks, who would employ some Judges themselves in a short time, would be, instead of an improvement, a great evil. The chief evils of the existing system of bankruptcy were the evils of too much official interference and too great expense. In that sentence all the defects of the Law of Bankruptcy were comprised; and the best way was to make the creditors themselves the masters of the estate, without the intervention of a trustee appointed by themselves to administer it. Motion agreed to: Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on the First Sitting Day after the Recess at Easter.

The Lord Chancellor

BANKRUPTCY BILL (No. 31), and JUDGMENT DEBTORS BILL (No. 32), read 2<sup>a</sup> (according to Order), and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on the First Sitting Day after the Recess at Easter.

House adjourned at a quarter before Eight o’clock, till To-morrow, half past Ten o’clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, March 23, 1868.

MINUTES.] — NEW MEMBER SWORN — Edward Aldam Leatham, esquire, for Huddersfield.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee—ARMY ESTIMATES.

Resolutions [March 20] reported.

WAYS AND MEANS—considered in Committee—Consolidated Fund (£6,000,000).

PUBLIC BILLS — Ordered — Perth and Brechin Provisional Orders Confirmation*; Petty Sessions and Lock-up Houses, &c.*

First Reading—Perth and Brechin Provisional Orders Confirmation* [74]; Petty Sessions and Lock-up Houses, &c.* [75].

Second Reading—Land Writs Registration (Scotland)* [56]; Indian Railway Companies* [55]; Inclosure* [73]; Marine Mutiny; Registration of Writs (Scotland) [62].

Committee—Oyster and Mussel Fisheries* [54].

Report—Oyster and Mussel Fisheries* [54].

Third Reading—(£362,398 19s. 9d.) Consolidated Fund.*

THE IRISH CHURCH ESTABLISHMENT.

NOTICE.

MR. GLADSTONE: The Motion, Sir, that I propose to make on the subject of the Irish Church will be in the form of three Resolutions to be moved in Committee on Acts relating to the Established Church in Ireland, and the terms of the three Resolutions will be these—

“Resolved,—

“1. That, in the opinion of this House, it is necessary that the Established Church of Ireland should cease to exist as an Establishment, due regard being had to all personal interests and to all individual rights of property.”

“2. That, subject to the foregoing considerations, it is expedient to prevent the creation of new personal interests by the exercise of any public patronage, and to confine the operations of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners of Ireland to objects of immediate necessity, or involving individual rights, pending the final decision of Parliament.”

“3. That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, humbly to pray that, with a view to the purposes aforesaid, Her Majesty would be graciously pleased to place at the disposal of Parliament, Her interest in the temporalities of the Archbishoprics, Bishoprics, and other Ecclesiastical Dignities and Benefices in Ireland, and in the custody thereof."

I give notice that I will take the liberty of asking the Government, either to-day or to-morrow, as may best suit them, Whether it would be compatible with their view of the state of Public Business to afford any assistance for the discussion of this Motion, and, possibly, the right hon. Gentleman the First Minister of the Crown will now be pleased to say what view he takes of that matter? In case it should not be in the power of the right hon. Gentleman to afford such assistance, I should then feel it my duty to endeavour to bring it on the first day on which I could regularly propose it, and I believe that would be Friday next, and I should further give notice of it as an Amendment on going into Committee of Supply.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, I do not know that it is quite regular that I should give the required information to the House; but I apprehend that it is for their convenience that I should do so, and, with their indulgence, I will do so at once. I require no time at all to consider the course which we ought to take; and I need not tell the House that where Notices of this character are given by one's opponents, one's natural feeling is to meet them as soon as we are permitted by the state of the Public Business and other considerations respecting the convenience of the House. I have no hesitation in saying that the state of Public Business, as is well known to the House, is not very satisfactory at present; but I will take the House into counsel. I feel that with their assistance we might be able to do all that is necessary and yet meet the wishes and convenience of the right hon. Gentleman. It is of primary importance that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War should take a Vote for men to-night. If the House will grant them he will be able to bring in the Mutiny Bill, and then there would be fair time, without interfering with the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman, to carry it through; and Gentlemen who wished to enter into any discussion upon the Mutiny Bill would have a fair opportunity when it goes into Committee. I hope, therefore, that the House will give my right hon. Friend the Vote to-night; and in that case I think I shall be able to make a fair and reasonable arrangement with the right hon. Gentleman. The day that I should propose would be this day week. But on this day week the Irish Reform Bill is placed for a second reading. Now, it has been to me an object of great importance that the second reading should take place, and that the question should be advanced with a view of ensuring—with other arrangements in respect of other Bills—the dissolution of Parliament at the beginning of the next year. Any great delay with the Irish Reform Bill would be an obstacle to that result. The Government, however, have considered the subject, and though, if the Irish Reform Bill be not read a second time on Monday, it cannot be proceeded with before the holidays, still we should be able to obtain that result in this manner. I assume that the House has consented to the principle of Commissioners examining the boundaries of boroughs in Ireland. I apprehend that principle was virtually acceded to by the passing of the Bill of last year; and in that case I would follow the example of 1831 and 1832, and at once appoint a Royal Commission to examine the boundaries of the Irish boroughs. They would proceed with their labours, and by that means we should obtain such progress that the dissolution would not be interfered with. Although I propose a Royal Commission for the boundaries of the Irish boroughs, I should still not issue it without previously bringing before the House the names of the three Commissioners I propose, and without their sanction I certainly should not advise Her Majesty to insert their names. At the same time, the names will be such as I have no doubt would recommend themselves to the unanimous approval of the House. Well then, Sir, if we can only get this Vote to-night, and come to this arrangement about the Boundary Commissioners, we shall be able to give Monday to the right hon. Gentleman, without so far interfering with the progress of business as to prevent those arrangements for the dissolution which we have had in contemplation. Well then, Sir, there is only one other consideration that we must not lose sight of, and that is—that fair notice shall be given to the House on a subject which I have no hesitation in saying is one of paramount importance; a longer notice, under ordinary circumstances, should be given in order that the House should have an opportunity of considering it, and the country should be made acquainted with it. But looking at the convenience of the House, which I think ought always to be considered, I shall give Monday to the right hon. Gentleman, and, if the debate terminates on the following Friday, I shall propose then that we adjourn for the holidays; because after a struggle of that kind there would, I think, be no use entering upon the next week for business. But, of course, I reserve to myself the right of taking such a course as the state of business may render necessary; and with this explanation, which I hope will prove satisfactory, we shall be prepared to meet the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman on Monday.

MR. GLADSTONE: As far as I am concerned, I thank the right hon. Gentleman. The arrangement that he proposes is perfectly satisfactory. I presume that he gets the Vote for the men to-night, and will go forward with the Mutiny Bill at once, so as to dispose of the Committee on the Bill during the present week.

MR. DISRAELI: That is my present intention.

MR. GLADSTONE: With regard to what has been said on the question of the Irish Borough Boundaries, we cannot expect that every gentleman will surrender every opinion he may entertain on that subject; but I confess it appears to me that the right hon. Gentleman is acting quite within the discretion in his province and that of the Government if he thinks fit to appoint a Commission upon the authority of the Executive, and presents it as part of his plan. I do not conceive that any practical objection can arise to the course that he proposes.

REVISION OF RAILWAYS.—QUESTION.

MR. BAZLEY said, he would beg to ask the right hon. Baronet the Member for Louth, If he will delay any further proceeding with the Bill for the revision of Railways till after Easter?

SIR WILLIAM HUTT was understood to say, that he was anxious to proceed with the Bill as rapidly as possible, but it was in the hands of the House.

NAVY—FLOGGING ON BOARD THE "FAVOURITE."—QUESTION.

MR. SERJEANT GASELEE said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether it is true that a seaman on board the Favourite died under the operation of flogging; and, whether it was known to the surgeon of the ship that he was at the time labouring under a disease of the heart?

Mr. Disraeli

MR. CORRY: Sir, in answering the Question of the hon. and learned Gentleman, perhaps the House will allow me, as it has reference to a case which has excited a very painful interest, to read some extracts from documents which the Admiralty have received on the subject. The Senior Lieutenant of Her Majesty's ship Favourite says in his Official Report—

"In compliance with your memorandum of the 19th of October, regarding the circumstances with which I am acquainted of the death of George Addison, I have the honour to report that on the evening of the 18th of October, about 6.30 p.m., George Addison was reported to me drunk, and on seeing him on the quarter-deck, in the presence of the officer of the watch and the master-at-arms, I ordered him under the sentry's charge on the starboard side of the steerage abreast the mainmast. His manner was so violent and noisy that I considered it necessary that he should be gagged (which was done about 6.55 p.m.) to prevent him making a disturbance in the ship. . . . The time that elapsed between the gag being applied and removed was, to the best of my belief, about a quarter of an hour. I then reported the case to you, and you ordered me to send the master-at-arms on shore to search for a man breaking his leave. The sergeant had charge during the absence of the master-at-arms, and visited the prisoner in the steerage several times. At about 8.30 p.m. the Assistant-Surgeon was called away from the ward room."

At nine o'clock, when the Assistant-Surgeon visited the unfortunate man, he found that life was extinct. The Surgeon of the ship reported as follows:—

"I have the honour to inform you that the man mentioned (George Addison) was brought on board at 6.30 p.m. on the 18th of October, 1867, in a violent state of excitement from drink. As this man was observed by the sergeant of Marines to be unusually quiet the medical officer on board was called to see him at 8.30 p.m., when he found that life was extinct. From a reference to the Sick Journal I find that this man has been nine times on the sick list for periods varying from two days to sixty-two days, and that he had suffered from scrofula, and from lung and heart disease. . . . I am of opinion that this man's death resulted from disease of the heart, accelerated by the use of the alcoholic poison; and probably, also, by the use of the gag employed to quiet him."

On the circumstances being reported to Vice Admiral Sir G. R. Mundy a Court of Inquiry was ordered to be held by Captain Hamilton, of Her Majesty's ship Sphinx, and Captain Heysham, of Her Majesty's ship Fawn, who made the following Report:—

"First, That there appears to have been nothing unusual, according to the custom of the service, in giving the order to gag the late George Addison; second, that the medical evidence points directly at the impropriety of the form of the gag which was used, in which we fully concur, believing also that the gag was too tightly drawn. Third, That there is no reason to attribute intentional cruelty or want of consideration to George Addison on the part of William Dawtry, the master-at-arms, who applied the gag. Fourth, That no precautionary measures appear to have been neglected as regards the visitation of the prisoner by the police. Fifth, That there is no evidence to show that anyone on board suspected that the prisoner was dead until the sergeant sent for the Assistant Surgeon. Sixth, That the medical officers appointed to assist us in this investigation concur in these opinions."

Dr. Kaye, the coroner for the island, who attended the inquiry on board the Favourite, by express invitation, expressed himself satisfied that the evidence adduced, and especially that given by the two medical officers, proved that the man having died while under restraint was a perfectly accidental, although untoward, event. Under these circumstances, Vice Admiral Sir G. R. Mundy, in reporting the case to the Secretary of the Admiralty, said—

"I beg to state that Captain Shortt has informed me that the ship's company have been satisfied with the inquiry which has been instituted, and trust their Lordships will consider that the whole case has been dealt with by me in a manner suitable to its requirements."

But it appeared to us that this very painful case required further investigation, and, accordingly, a Court martial was directed to be held on the First Lieutenant and upon the master-at-arms for the manslaughter of Addison. The result of that Court martial, which was held in January, was that both prisoners were fully acquitted. I was entirely ignorant of the fact that "gagging" was practised in the navy, and on my attention being drawn to the subject, an Admiralty Order was issued prohibiting the practice for the future, and ordering that men when noisy and violent should be confined in cells.

ARMY—MORTALITY IN THE 86TH REGIMENT.—QUESTION.

MR. OTWAY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether he has received further information respecting the mortality in the 86th Regiment, lately landed in the Mauritius, and, whether he has taken, or intends to take, any steps for the removal of the Regiment during the epidemic in that island?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he had hoped to have received the Official Despatches from the Mauritius that morning; but up to the hour at which he had come down to the House they had not arrived. The question was one entirely for the decision of the Commander-in-Chief, but doubtless a very strict inquiry would be made into the whole of the circumstances connected with the case. He could not, however, conceal his apprehension that in allowing the troops to land when they did, a very serious error had been committed.

IRELAND—DUTY ON SPIRIT LICENSES. QUESTION.

GENERAL DUNNE said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether a large increase has not been made to the Duty on Spirit Licenses in Ireland; and, if so, by what authority, and under what Act of Parliament?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, in reply, that the Excise License Act required that the Duty should be charged according to the rent or annual value of the house. Great complaints having been made by applicants for new licenses, that they were charged on a higher basis than the holders of old licenses, inquiry was made, and it was found that publicans and spirit grocers of old standing had not in many cases been charged additional Duty from time to time in proportion to the increased value of property. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue accordingly gave orders that from October last all holders of licenses should be assessed on what was known as Griffiths' valuation, with an addition of one-fourth. Complaints of over-assessment were in consequence made, amounting to 587, but in 342 cases the new assessment had been confirmed; in thirty-six cases it had been reduced; and in 209 it had been still further increased—the rents actually paid having been found to exceed the new valuation.

ARMY—MILITARY PRISONS. QUESTION.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether the Resolution passed by the Justices assembled at the last Michaelmas Quarter Sessions of the county of Berks has been taken into consideration, according to promise, by the Secretary of State for War, as follows:—

"Resolved, That it is the opinion of this Court that it is unjust that Military prisoners be sent to Reading Gaol as long as there is room for them in the Military prisons of the country."

d, whether, in any case, if the War Office resorts to such a practice, they might not at least to pay to the county the same proportion of expense for the maintenance and establishment of the gaol as is paid by the borough making use of the county gaol in the same way?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON, in reply, said, the rule of the Army was that soldiers sentenced to imprisonment only were confined in the Military prisons, but when the sentence was imprisonment and dismissal from the army at the end of the term, offenders in those cases were always sent to the county gaols. With respect to the amount paid for their maintenance, it was settled by the Act of 1863. It was not in his power to authorize any departure from those rules.

GARTER KING AT ARMS.—QUESTION.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, If he has any objection to explain to the House—seeing that the Government last session obtained a Vote (Class 5, Vote 20) for the expenses of Garter King at Arms and to account Sydney, in investing the King of the Belgians with the Order of the Garter, £2,020 11s. 6d. Expenses investing Kings of Portugal and Denmark and Grand Duke of Hesse with the Order of the Garter, £1,537 3s. 10d.: total, £3,557 15s. 4d.—that he asked, on Monday, the 17th instant, for, and obtained, a Vote under the head of Civil Service Excesses (Item 12, Special Missions, £10,224 17s. 5d.), described as—

Chiefly due to the expenses of Mr. Rassam's mission to Abyssinia, and of investing the Kings of Belgium, Portugal, and Denmark, and the Grand Duke of Hesse, with the Order of the Garter?"

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, in reply, that the hon. Gentleman was mistaken in supposing that a Vote for these items was given in the Estimates last year. An account comprising those and other items of the previous year's expenditure was appended to the Estimate of last year for the purpose of showing the data on which that Estimate was based. The Vote taken on Monday, the 17th, was for excesses of the year ending March 31, 1867—the expenditure under Vote 20, Class 5, having exceeded the Estimate in that year.

COMPULSORY CHURCH RATES ABOLITION BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he desired to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, If he would fix a time after which he would not bring on the third reading of the Compulsory Church Rates Abolition Bill? Since its second reading it had undergone considerable alteration.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he was anxious that the Bill should proceed to the House of Lords at a period when that assembly was not much occupied with other business. The discussion of the Estimates would take some time, and he could not hope to be able to bring it on before midnight. He would promise in any case not to proceed with it after half-past twelve o'clock. If any desire was exhibited for general discussion of the principle of the Bill he could not, of course, proceed with it at that hour; but he trusted that the House would permit him to go on with it that evening.

SALE OF LIQUORS ON SUNDAY BILL. QUESTION.

MR. ROEBUCK said, he wished to know, Whether his hon. Friend the Member for Chichester would, after what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, propose the appointment of the Select Committee on this Bill, notice of which stood on the Paper for that evening?

MR. J. A. SMITH said, he was anxious to consult the hon. and learned Gentleman's convenience and the convenience of other hon. Members as far as he possibly could; but his hon. and learned Friend knew as well as he did the difficulty which attended the proposal of such a Motion at an early period of the evening. He would, however, promise not to bring it on after one o'clock.

SUPPLY—ARMY ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

"That the number of Land Forces, not exceeding 138,691 Men (including 9,880, all Ranks, to be employed with the Depôts in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland of Regiments Serving in Her Majesty's Indian Possessions), be maintained for the Service of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, from the 1st day of April 1868 to the 31st day of March 1869, inclusive."

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he was sure he should not ask in vain for the kind consideration and forbearance of the Committee whilst he proceeded to fulfil the somewhat complicated duty of offering some explanation to the Committee on the subject of the Army Estimates. In the first place he wished to remove an impression, which he believed was very general both in the House and out of doors, that the cost of the army of England for the ensuing year would amount to £15,455,450. There was not a newspaper in London that had not, in the last three weeks, contained remarks upon the Army Estimates for the ensuing year, in which remarks it was assumed that the cost would amount to the sum which he had mentioned. Only a few nights ago the hon. Member for Truro (Captain Vivian) asked him a question as to bringing forward these Estimates, and said that the army expenditure would involve a sum of £15,500,000. He (Sir John Pakington) could not wonder at the extent to which this belief had been prevalent; and he attached no blame to the public Press of London, or to any hon. Member who had been led into that belief. The amount put in the first column, showing the aggregate amount of the year's Vote, was £15,500,000; and this was quite enough to have led to the general impression. He thought that members of the Press and Members of the House could not be blamed for having abstained from plunging into somewhat complicated accounts to see whether there was any set-off to the amount so charged. Further search into the Papers before the House would, however, show that there was a deduction to be made to the extent of £1,568,000. As an illustration of the nature of these details he might mention the fact that the Capitation Grant for the forces which were supplied to India alone accounted for upwards of £850,000 of that sum. He would venture to suggest that it was hardly fair that the public should be led to suppose that the finances of this country were burdened to such a large extent, when in fact the sum should be reduced by a very large amount. The repayments into the Exchequer would reduce the charge of the army to considerably below £14,000,000. Without complaining at all of the general way in which these Estimates were prepared, he must say that he thought it a subject of regret that, in summing up the total of the first column, the £1,568,000 should not have been deducted from it. But this was not all. For many years it had been the practice, of the advisability of which he had much doubt, to include in the Army Estimates the cost of certain stores for the use of the navy, while the cost of certain transports for the army was charged in the Navy Estimates. This practice, which had been much discussed during the greater part of the present century, deprived the Admiralty of any control over the charge for the naval stores, and the Minister for War of any control over the cost of transport. His right hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon (General Peel) in his Statement last year said, if he recollected right, that the balance between the cost of these transports and stores amounted to £270,000. This year the difference was less. The cost of naval stores provided for in the Army Estimates was £494,138, the cost of army transport included in the Navy Estimates £424,791, so that the difference was this year only £69,347. Still, the difference was very nearly £70,000, and that, he was bound to say, was a very large amount, and the system of which it was the result was certainly open to very serious objection. He had been struck with the anomaly, while preparing the Navy Estimates of last year, and also while preparing the Army Estimates this year. He had received a certain account of the transport of the army; but had no means of checking it and no means of controlling it. The matter had been long discussed; but it appeared to him that the better course would be to include the stores for the navy in the Navy Estimates, and the transport charges in the Army Estimates. But the Army Estimates had also to bear nearly £120,000 for the cost of the Ordnance Survey by four companies of Royal Engineers; and when all items not properly chargeable against the army were deducted from the gross total, the result was a net demand on the country of £13,699,455, an enormous figure, but still greatly below the supposed expenditure of £15,500,000; it might be regarded as £1,750,000 less than the sum which the House and the country had supposed to be the real cost of the army. Still, the expenditure was certainly enormous, and imposed upon those who were responsible for the administration of the army a necessity of conducting it with the utmost possible economy, consistent with an efficient service. He hoped, before concluding, to convince the House that it had been his sincere desire to reduce the expenditure of the army within the nar-

Mr. Darby Griffith

west limits. Whether the re-payments which he had alluded were deducted or not, the Estimates for the current year were not very much larger than those of last year. They exceeded the Estimates of last year in gross by £203,200. That was accounted for by the increase of the Contingent Grant to the Volunteer force, the increase in the number of the Militia, and the increase in the Survey Department. The cost of Survey for the current year would be £30,000 over the expenditure of the last year. The number of men was very slightly increased. The number of men voted last year for the army was 7,245, which included a certain force for the Straits Settlements. The intention to raise that regiment had been abandoned, and instead of it they proposed this year to borrow from the Indian government 10 men, a portion of whom would go in to our forces at Hong Kong. The number of men he would ask the Committee to vote this year was 137,530, being only 285 more than last year. In Vote 3 the Committee would notice a decrease of £73,100, mainly in consequence of the large amount of goods in store; but he would mention incidentally that the expenses of the clothing establishments were being curtailed. The amount of the Vote last year was £496,900, and this year £570,000. In Vote 4, relating to Barrack establishments, the Committee would notice an increase of £60,300, caused by the Fenian alarm of last year. In Vote 7, the Vote for Hospital establishments, amounted to £380,771—an increase on last year of £105,200. This, however, was merely an apparent increase caused by the transfer of certain charges from Vote 1 to Vote 7. These seven Votes immediately arose out of the number of men in the army, and having disposed of that, he would proceed to a subject of very great interest to all branches of the service—the subject of retirement. The Committee, which was ably presided over by an hon. Member opposite (Mr. Childers), and which had dealt with this question as it affected the Artillery and Engineers, had made certain recommendations in their Report which he did not feel justified in endorsing. He objected to them for three reasons. If they were carried out the expense would be very great; the result would be to withdraw from the service of the Artillery and Engineers a great number of the best officers just in their prime, when most likely to be of service to the country; and a feeling of dissatisfaction would be engendered among the officers of the Line. In fact, officers in the Artillery and Engineers would be offered a pecuniary inducement to retire; and officers in other departments of the service would feel aggrieved that they were not similarly situated. It was evident that the recommendations of the Committee could not be carried out unless they were accompanied by very extensive changes in the whole system of remunerating the army, and he, therefore, did not see his way clear to approve them. On the other hand, it was most desirable that we should, as soon as possible arrange some system of retirement for the scientific corps, by which they would be spared that stagnation in promotion which from time to time was inevitable, from which they had suffered before, and to which, as matters stood at present, they were liable again. More it was at present impossible for him to say, until he had received the opinion of the actuary to whom he had submitted the whole of this matter. He hoped to receive his calculations at an early period, and should then be ready to bring the matter before the House, and to ask them to come to a decision. Another point involved in the Report of this Committee was the mode of recruiting for the army. And here he must offer congratulations to his right hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Huntingdon (General Peel) on the success which had attended the changes that he introduced last year. Out of the thirty-nine recommendations made in the valuable Report of the Recruiting Commission, he was in a position to state that no less than twenty-four had been carried into effect. Of those recommendations, one of the most important was that the recruiting should be carried on under the superintendence of an Inspector General, specially charged with the control of that Department. The effect of the changes which had been introduced would be apparent from a comparison between the establishment voted and the actual number of men recruited in different years. In the year 1861 we were only 129 below the establishment; in 1861-2 we were 929 below the proper number; in 1862-3, 3,724; in 1863-4, 5,606; in 1864-5, 5,946; in 1865-6, 6,884; and in 1866-7, 1,358. In the present year, on the 1st of March, we were only 911 men below the establishment, and such had been the progress of recruiting during the present month that not only was there reason to believe that this deficit of 900 might be very considerably reduced; but he felt considerable doubt whether the number would not be above rather than below the Estimate. Another still more striking proof of the effect of the changes introduced by his right hon. and gallant Friend was afforded by the number of men re-engaged. In the year 1860-1 the re-engagements were 2,189 in number; in 1861-2, 2,285; in 1862-3, 2,750; in 1863-4, 2,866; in 1864-5, 3,970; in 1865-6, 6,120; in 1866-7, 3,462; and for the year 1867-8, up to the 31st of December, 1867, the re-engagements had swollen to the unprecedented number of 26,590. In a national point of view, it might, perhaps, be a question, whether it was desirable to have a great number of re-engagements; whether young men might not be better for the State than men who had already served some years. But that had not been the policy of this country. Beyond all doubt, the policy of this country and the desire of commanding officers of regiments had been to obtain re-engagements; and that being so, from the extraordinary figures which he had quoted, there could be no doubt of the signal success of the plan which his right hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Huntingdon proposed. Again, the recruits enlisted in the last quarter of 1866 were 3,951, while the recruits enlisted in the last quarter of 1867 were 5,179, showing an amount of increased activity and success in recruiting which was not to be measured merely by the number of men, as the Estimates showed that the amount expended by way of bounty was £22,000 less in the present than in the former year. A Report upon the subject of Recruiting had just been presented to His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief, and forwarded to him as Secretary of State for War, which was in all respects a most satisfactory document. One of the recommendations contained in that Report, which he trusted would soon be carried out, had reference to the somewhat discreditable circumstances under which of late years many of our recruits had been engaged, especially to those scenes at public-houses, which were far from creditable to the service, and which every friend of the army must desire to put an end to. General Edwards, of the Recruiting Department, entered warmly into this subject, and recommended the establishment of recruiting officers or depôts in most of the large towns in England. Two were already established—one in London and one in Bristol; and he was happy to be able to add that, as far as experience hitherto had extended, the recruits now being engaged were not only more abundant in number, but belonged to a class of society greatly in advance of the recruits obtained in former times. His hon. Friend the Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread) had very much at heart the carrying out of one of the recommendations of the Royal Commission upon Recruiting—that schools should be established in which young men might be trained and reared for the service of the army. The Commissioners dwelt in their Report upon the very great success which had attended the establishment of schools with a kindred object for the navy. But his own opinion had always been that a comparison could not well be drawn in this respect between the two services. It was part of the system of the navy that the crew of every man-of-war should consist partly of boys; and consequently boys at a very early age were admitted on board training-ships, passed from thence to men-of-war, and, after a short period of service as boys, entered upon the books as regular sailors. In the army, however, the number of boys who could enter was exceedingly limited, being confined to drummer-boys, or to those otherwise engaged as members of the band; and if a school for training boys in any numbers were founded, the difficulty would be to know what to do with them until they were of an age to be admitted into the ranks. The Report to which he had referred mentioned two well-known establishments—the Royal Military School at Chelsea and the Royal Hibernian School at Dublin—and expressed regret that from their constitution these schools could not be made instrumental in training boys for the army. He ventured so far to differ from the Royal Commissioners as to think that it well deserved consideration, whether it was not possible to render these establishments available in training a class of young men for the army, who would make most valuable non-commissioned officers, adding very much to the character, strength, and efficiency of the service. No doubt, the Commissioners were quite right in stating, that in these two establishments, as now constituted, it would not be feasible to train such a class of young men; and that the boys, moreover, who were trained were frequently branched off into various pursuits in civil life. But he should certainly take into serious consideration, whether, by changing the character of these schools, it might not be possible to meet the recommendations of the Royal Commissioners, by rendering these useful auxiliaries in the supply of trained young men for the army? He now came to touch upon another portion of the subject—that which had reference to the auxiliary and reserved forces, which consisted of the old Militia, the Yeomanry Cavalry, the Volunteers, and the Enrolled Pensioners—the Army of Reserve. The whole strength of the Militia, assuming it to be up to its full quota, was 128,921; that of the Yeomanry Cavalry 15,823. The number of Volunteers now enrolled—he did not speak of the whole establishment—was 187,864; and the Enrolled Pensioners, including what was called the Army of Reserve, established by Lord Herbert's Act, numbered 6,658, which would make the number 30,000. The aggregate of all these forces was 350,658. In the Vote for the Militia there was an increase of £81,931 on the sum taken last year. This increase arose from two causes—first of all, following the suggestion made by his right hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Huntingdon (General Peel) last year, the Government had decided that the Militia should be raised to its full quota. They had deemed it expedient to spread the addition over two years. They had found the same facilities in recruiting for the Militia as they have experienced in the case of the army, and nearly the required number of men had come forward to raise the force to the number at which the Government had fixed it for the present year; the second cause of the addition to the vote was that he had determined that lodging money should be given to every officer in the Militia. There had been a well-founded complaint that some of those officers received lodging money while others did not; and that the apartments in which officers were billeted were not fit places to send them to. He was sorry that the old force was not so strongly officered as he should wish, especially as regarded the lower ranks; but he hoped that granting lodging money to all the officers would have a good effect in the way of filling up vacancies. The case of the Quarter-master had been much pressed upon him from various directions, and in a manner which made him feel that the matter was one

Sir John Pakington

Sir John Pakington

deserving of his attention. He had arrived at the conclusion that those officers were not in the position which, considering their military rank, they ought to be, and accordingly he had increased their lodging money allowance from 10s., the sum which they now received, to 14s. That being extended to them throughout the year would put them on a footing with the subaltern officers of the Line. The additional expense incurred by these changes raises the amount of the Vote by the sum of £81,931. There was another subject with reference to which he had received deputations. Representations had been made from the counties of York and Lancaster as to a state of things in those counties, but which he believed were equally true in respect of the rest of England. He referred to representations as to the unsatisfactory, injurious, and demoralizing results which followed from the present unsatisfactory manner in which the Militia were billeted in country towns. He could not imagine that there could be any serious difficulty in the way of arranging that one regiment should succeed another in such a way that accommodation could be secured for the men without recourse to that very objectionable system. On this subject it only remained for him to notice the proposals made by his right hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Huntingdon last year, that 30,000 men of the Militia should stand apart and in a different organization from the rest, with the view of their joining the Line whenever it might be necessary for them to do so. He begged to assure his right hon. and gallant Friend that he had not lost sight of the proposal. It was his full intention to carry it out, and the regulations on the matter had been drawn out. Under the Act of last year it was necessary that those regulations should be laid upon the table. He was not able to produce them yet, and for this reason—the whole of the auxiliary forces were about to be placed under the command of one officer—his hon. and gallant Friend Colonel Lindsay; and he thought it desirable that before those regulations were laid upon the table, and before his hon. and gallant Friend commenced his new duties next month, he should have an opportunity of seeing and reading them. The regulations would be laid upon the table as soon as possible. As to the Yeomanry force, he need not detain the Committee by any reference to that branch of the service. The next subject to which he had to advert was the condition of the Volunteer force. The Vote for this force was £385,150, which was an increase of £24,150 on the Vote of last year. The Capitation Grants for the Volunteers amounted in 1867-8 to £205,500; in the current year 1868-9 they had risen to £228,050. The efficientes in 1867-8 were 115,427; in the current year they were 124,605. The extra efficientes last year were 78,285; this year they were 90,587. Last year there had been repeated applications for an increase in the amount of the Capitation Grant received by each Volunteer entitled to it; and this year again he had been pressed to make a proposition on the subject. No man felt more highly than he did the great value of the force, or estimated at a higher value the patriotic spirit which had called the Volunteers into existence, and had since maintained them at so high a standard. A number of Volunteer officers had drawn up a Paper last year, in which they expressed their opinion that if the Capitation Grant were not increased it would be impossible for the force to be maintained, so heavy were the expenses thrown on the officers. He had promised a consideration of these representations; but a few days ago he had been obliged to express to a large deputation his deep regret, after a full consideration of the question, the Government felt that, consistently with their duty, they could not concede the request that had been made to them. There were circumstances which made it impossible for him to come down to the House and apply, on the ground of Imperial necessity, for an increase of the Capitation Grant. In 1863 the number of the Volunteers was 113,520, in 1864 it had increased to 123,707, in 1867, 133,848, in 1866 to 142,849, and in 1865 to 155,216. Again, he found that 1863 there were 17 new corps formed and 28 dissolved; in 1864, 6 formed and 29 dissolved; in 1865, 14 formed and 18 dissolved; in 1866, there were 12 new corps formed and 9 corps dissolved; and in 1867, there were 27 new corps formed and only 9 corps dissolved. The only inference he could draw from these figures was that the spirit which laid the foundation of the Volunteer force was still as strong as ever. Within the last fortnight he had been applied to for his sanction to the formation of several new corps. Therefore, while the amount received by the Volunteer force was sufficient to enable them to maintain their efficiency and carry on their noble work with vigour, and while the members of the force were also increased, he felt that he should be hardly justified in coming down to the House and asking it to increase a Vote which at present appeared to be sufficient for the purpose intended. Under these circumstances he had been unable to increase the Capitation allowance to the Volunteer force. With regard to the administration of the Reserve force he made an alteration, which he trusted would receive the approbation of the House. When he came to consider the position of that force he found that it consisted of four different bodies, and was divided under three distinct commands. The Volunteer force was under the Secretary of State for the War Department, and subject to the superintendence of one officer holding the rank of colonel or lieutenant colonel. The Militia was under the superintendence and command of another officer of the same position and rank, and the Enrolled Pensioners and Army of Reserve were under the command of another officer of the army. Thus there were three distinct commands for the Reserve force. It appeared to him to be impossible for this force to carry out properly and legitimately the duties entrusted to them in this divided and unsatisfactory state of control. It seemed that undivided action was desirable, and that some greater and better facilities for organization were indispensable; and that it would very much tend to increase the real value and efficiency of these local forces if they were placed under the command of some one officer of high rank and known military station, able to regulate and control the whole. He received quite lately, after having determined on the change he had mentioned, a letter forwarded from the Horse Guards strongly confirming the views he had adopted. This letter came from a distinguished officer, in command of the forces in the northern districts of England—Sir John Garvock—and was dated at Manchester, the 22nd of February—

“Since I assumed command of the northern district, and have become aware of the large number of irregular troops, Yeomanry, Militia, and Volunteers, which it contains, it has seemed to me very desirable that some plan should be devised for making them more readily available than they now are in case of emergency. . . . The numbers approximately of the troops in question in the northern district are as follows:—Yeomanry, 8,000; Militia, 25,000; Volunteers,

3,000; total 86,000. . . . Over these forces, however, I exercise no control, and it is not necessary, and probably not desirable, that in ordinary times I should do so. Assuming, however, that when called on to act with the regular army they would be placed under my command, that of some other selected officer, I should be glad to feel myself in a position, if suddenly directed to avail myself of the general resources of the district, to do so with rapidity and effect. As matters stand at present I cannot say that I should feel myself in that position; I do not think that these scattered troops could be brought together in a manageable form without very considerable delay."

The circumstance of a general officer having the control of all those local forces, and being fully able to organize and place them, when necessary, in districts where they might be made most available for the public service, would very much tend to increase the value of the forces on which the people of this country depended for some protection. The next Vote was one of the most important in the Army Estimates. It was the Vote for the Manufacturing Departments and the supply of Military and Warlike Stores. The amount proposed to be voted under this head was £1,491,370. The Vote had not, in fact, changed in amount—there was an apparent decrease of £64,000; but it was only apparent, for it arose from the transfer of certain charges for building to another vote in the Estimates. The question respecting the supply of small arms was one which the right hon. and gallant Member for Huntingdon explained last year, and in which he took a very vigorous and decided part, expending a large sum of money in converting the Enfield rifle into a breech-loader on the Snider principle. Last year the sum taken for conversion at Enfield was £90,000, and the sum expended for the same object on the trade was £120,638. This year there would be asked for, £99,604 for conversion at Enfield, and £60,000 for conversion by the trade. The general result was that last year his right hon. and gallant Friend proposed the conversion of 221,500 rifles at a cost of £210,638, and this year it was proposed that 160,000 rifles should be converted at a cost of £159,604; that would exhaust the whole number of small arms that we had capable of conversion. This led him to mention that an important sub-Committee sat last year, under the presidency of Colonel Fletcher, assisted by Earl Spencer. The business of the Committee was to decide to what maker should be awarded the prize for the best arm. Their Report would be laid on the table of the House in a few days, when it would appear that a large number of the arms sent in did not comply with the conditions, and consequently the prize had not been awarded, and the question, which was of the greatest importance to the country, the best rifle, had not been decided. The Committee had, however, consented to renew its labours, which would not be confined to the original conditions of selection; but they would be free to consider and select a more valuable rifle, if possible, than the Snider, which, however, he believed to be at present the best arm possessed by any country in Europe, and which he hoped in a short time to be able to supply to all the forces. From small arms he now came to artillery. The Vote for next year in these Estimates was £271,144, including guns, projectiles, and targets. For the navy the Vote was £494,138. He would now ask the attention of the Committee to a question of which they had heard very little for some years—the wonderful advance which science had been able to make in the construction of heavy guns. Until last year no attempt had been made to provide a new armament for those forts and defences in different parts of the world which it had been the policy of the House to adopt. The Committee would recollect that when the Government of Lord Palmerston in 1860 determined to adopt the system of fortifications which was now so frequently under discussion, it was resolved that the home forts and fortifications should be erected by funds raised by loan, but that the armament of those forts should be defrayed from the Revenue of the year. The result was that the Revenue of the year was never asked for those armaments; and he believed that the Estimate of his right hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Huntingdon (General Peel) last year was the first in which an attempt was made to provide an armament for the fortifications in Bermuda, Halifax, and elsewhere, which had been so many years in construction. This did not apply only to fortifications in this country. Simultaneously we had been erecting large works in various parts of the world; and both Malta and Gibraltar stood in need of very considerable strength in their armaments. Last year the Estimate proposed by his right hon. Friend provided ninety-six guns for armament purposes, and in the Estimates he had now the honour to submit to the House about the same provision was made. The number provided this year was ninety-seven guns of different calibre. But it was his duty to state to the House that if we were to provide adequate armaments for the fortifications we had created in this country, and in various parts of the world, we must incur a very heavy expenditure—an expenditure not yet provided for, an expenditure not yet contemplated. It would be idle to pretend that the Vote he had to submit to the House to-night to provide artillery for the defence of this country was even intended to provide for the requirements before them. He must frankly state that he believed it would be absolutely necessary at no distant day that the armaments for the fortifications should be made the subject of a distinct Estimate to the House of Commons. He would only now advert for a few moments to a subject on which his hon. and gallant Friend opposite (Major Anson) intended to found a distinct Motion. He was so confident of the good object his hon. and gallant Friend wished to accomplish by that Motion that he would be ready to meet him in the fairest spirit he could; but he did think that those immense manufacturing establishments at Woolwich ought to be a subject of considerable anxiety with the House. They were enormous establishments, and involved an annual expenditure one year with another of very little less than £1,000,000. These establishments were divided into four parts—the Gun Factory, the Laboratory, the Carriage Department, and the Store Department. The Laboratory alone involved an annual expenditure of very little less than £500,000. At the head of these four establishments were four men of high scientific acquirements and very high character. He did not speak of any one of them except in terms of the highest respect, both for scientific acquirements and personal character; but from the time when he undertook his present office, he must confess he had not felt satisfied that those four establishments were subject to a sufficient check and control—looking to the immense expenditure with which they were intrusted—a check such as the interests of the country appeared to require. He believed the public interest would be very much promoted if one officer of knowledge, ability, and high character were placed as the commandant over the whole four establishments. He did not say they were now altogether without check; but they were not subject to such an amount of effectual check as in the interest of the country or even the interest of the officers themselves they ought to be subject to. He should, therefore, very seriously consider whether the interests of the country would not be promoted by appointing a commandant to exercise control and authority over the whole of the immense establishments at Woolwich. With respect to the cadastral Survey, which really had nothing to do with the Army Estimates, and concerned rather the general interests of the country, a considerable increase was made in this year's Estimates. It was the intention of the Government to make that survey proceed a little more rapidly than it had done during the last few years, and with that view they had decided to add £30,000 to the former Estimate, making it in all £118,000. He begged now to reply to a question put by an hon. Member some time since, relative to the extension of the provision of the Contagious Diseases Act. The Act had been found to work beneficially, and the Government intended to take a Vote in these Estimates for £20,650 for the erection of a hospital.

Sir John Pakington

He now came to the last head to which he intended to call the attention of the Committee, which was Vote 18, for the Administration of the Army. The remaining Votes related only to the Non-effective Service, which did not call for any observation. The Vote for the Administration of the Army was £224,000, being an increase of £6,000. A portion of that increase arose from the salaries of Sir Henry Storks, £2,000, and General Balfour, £1,000, the officers lately added to the War Office, with a view to carry out the Report of Lord Strathnairn. He thought he might say that Reform in administering the Departments of the army had been more or less a subject of public attention and anxiety ever since the Crimean War. It was during that war that the defects in our transport service and the supply Department of the War Office became manifest, and they must all remember the anxiety caused in consequence of those defects. The first occasion on which a desire was shown to alter the arrangements of the War Department was when Lord Herbert, then Mr. Sidney Herbert, laid before the Organization Commission of 1860 a scheme for the appointment of an officer to be called the Director of Supply. It was clearly the intention of Lord Herbert, in proposing the appointment of such an officer, that the supply Department of the Army should be placed under the control of one responsible officer. In 1864 a Committee was appointed to consider the system of supply in the army, and before the close of 1865 Lord De Grey addressed a very able letter to the Treasury, recommending a considerable change being effected in this portion of the administration of the army. In that letter Lord De Grey said—

“The theory of the present arrangement is that at each local head of a Department is in direct communication with the general officer commanding; but it would obviously work far better, and produce far more unity of action, both in peace and in war, if the general officer commanding communicated with one head only, who was acquainted with the organization of the several Departments, and accustomed to control them. For these reasons, both on account of economy in peace and efficiency in war, it appears to Lord De Grey to be necessary that the several administrative Departments should be brought to a focus, both locally and in this office.”

Before Lord De Grey could take any action for the purpose of carrying out these views he was succeeded in his office by the noble Lord opposite (the Marquess of Hartington), who in proposing the Army Estimates in 1866 made the following remarks:—

“I am anxious to state to the Committee that we have been for some time convinced that the charges of some of those establishments are no doubt greater than they ought to be; but the only way by which a more economical system can be introduced is to bring them more directly under the control of one head. The Committee will understand that the head of a Department, such as the commissariat, or the purveyor's Department, at any particular station, although he is subordinate to the General Officer, corresponds upon matters connected with the Department with the head of his Department at home. The General Officer at the station has many other important and arduous duties to perform, and consequently is not able to exercise any very minute supervision. This is not all; under the present circumstances it is necessary that each station should have an officer, or several officers, of considerable rank. We have, therefore, made a proposal that a superior class of officers should be appointed at each station, to be called comptrollers, or by some similar name, who shall be placed at the head of the administrative Departments. Each comptroller will be subordinate to the General Officer, and responsible to him for the proper and efficient administration of the Departments; and it will be his duty to advise the Secretary of State upon the organization of each Department, and to point out where economy can be exercised.”—[3 Hansard, clxxxi, 1541-2.]

From this extract it was clear that the

Sir John Pakington

noble Lord opposite concurred generally in the views which had been indicated by Lord De Grey. No direct steps, however, were taken in order to carry those views into effect; but in June, 1866, the noble Lord opposite appointed a Committee, which had since been known by the name of “Lord Strathnairn's Committee,” to inquire into the subject of army transport. That Committee soon found that it would be impossible for them to discharge their duties properly if their inquiries were limited to the question of army transport, and they therefore asked and obtained permission to extend their inquiries into the whole subject of army supply. He would read extracts from the Report of that Committee, which was laid upon the table of the House in the course of last summer. The Committee recommended as the leading measures required—

“That a Department should be organized to be responsible for, and to control, the working of all Departments of supply—namely, 1st, commissariat, including store accountants for provisions, forage, fuel, and light, military accountants and treasurers; 2nd, purveyors; 3rd, military store, as regards clothing and stores generally, but not arms, ammunition, or warlike stores, herein subsequently defined; 4th, barrack, as regards fuel and light and straw, at home as well as abroad, and in camp; and also as regards cash and barrack and miscellaneous stores, now administered by barrack-masters; 5th, army transport.”

The Committee then proceeded—

“Setting aside considerations of economy to be effected by the abolition of the superior officers of the different branches, it is difficult to over-rate the advantages which it may be calculated will arise from the united action and harmony which will be produced by making the several supply Departments of the army act under one impulse, and subordinate to one chief.”

The Committee further said—

“The practical result of these and other recommendations in the same sense will be that the Secretary of State for War at home, and general officers commanding abroad, will have to deal, in all matters relative to the administration of the army, with one responsible department—that of control—instead of, as at present, with five separate departments. General officers commanding will be relieved of the details, duty, and correspondence connected with the supply Departments of the army, as they at present exist; affording them more time for consideration of purely military and strategical duties of command; and both Minister for War and general officers will be able to intrust greater powers, and give more confidence, to an officer in the position of controller than they can under the present system to the several heads of Departments, each naturally anxious to secure the utmost advantage and influence for his own Department.”

It was apparent that the intention of the Committee was to get rid of the present system of divided responsibility in this branch of the army administration, and to place that Department under the control of a single officer. In accordance with the statements he had made in answer to the numerous questions which had been put to him in the course of last Session upon the subject, he had devoted a large portion of the time at his disposal during the Recess to the consideration of the recommendations of the Committee, and he had arrived at the conclusion that it was his duty to carry those recommendations into effect. As it would have been scarcely just to the gentlemen engaged in the War Office, who were already fully employed and whose position might possibly be affected by the proposed changes, to request them to assist him in drawing out a scheme in accordance with the recommendations of the Committee, he had had recourse to the assistance of those who had been engaged in similar work in connection with the Indian Army. He applied also to Sir Bartle Frere with a view to obtaining the advice of an officer of such high character and recognized ability, one who, moreover, had given so much attention to the economical reforms which had taken place in the Indian Army, and it was to a great extent, through the assistance of Sir Bartle Frere and Sir Henry Storks, whose experience in connection with the War Office at home had been very large, and to whom he had preferred a similar request, that he was enabled to carry out some of the recommendations of Lord Strathnairn's Committee. Those two distinguished officers recommended, with a view to carrying out the suggestions of Lord Strathnairn's Committee—suggestions in which they cordially concurred—that an officer of known ability should be appointed to the post of Controller-in-Chief, and be entrusted with the organization of a Department. He had then to consider who should be appointed to this new office, and, bearing in mind the recommendation of the Committee that the Controller-in-Chief ought, at all events at first, to be an officer of high rank in the army and of known administrative ability, he arrived, after careful consideration, at the conclusion that he could not in the interests of the public make a better suggestion than Sir Henry Storks himself. At his earnest request Sir Henry Storks acquiesced in the appointment, and, with the consent and approval of that officer, he appointed General Balfour, whose experience in India would, he thought, enable him greatly to assist Sir Henry Storks in effecting changes which concerned, not only the administrative Department of the army, but which would prospectively affect the constitution of the War Office itself. The next question which arose was, in what manner they should proceed to carry out their scheme. Was Sir Henry Storks to be placed at the head of a Department? He (Sir John Pakington) decided that this would be a most undesirable mode of proceeding; and that the best course which he could adopt was to place Sir Henry Storks on the Board entirely free from all entanglements. He requested him thoroughly to investigate the state of the War Office itself, and see what changes were necessary in connection with the supply Departments, and make his report from time to time as to what changes he might deem to be necessary. He (Sir John Pakington) had reason, day by day, to rejoice at this appointment. The task had no doubt been very laborious, and one attended with much anxiety; but every day had given him fresh cause to congratulate himself, not only upon the appointment of Sir Henry Storks and General Balfour, but upon the fact that the former officer was not embarrassed by the consideration of departmental details. Although the appointment was but a recent one, these officers had addressed their attention to the system of audit now in operation, to the question of stores, to the changes which might be necessary with respect to transport, and to the mode of arranging the Department of control. The consideration of the question of barracks, though one that was the subject of recommendations by Lord Strathnairn's Committee, was for the present postponed. An able and elaborate Report on the subject of audit had already been drawn up and presented, and the tendency of that Report was, not only to promote economy, but to make the system more complete and efficient than it was at present. It suggested many practical improvements—improvements in which he fully concurred; indeed, he had already made arrangements for the duty of auditing being turned over to the particular Secretary of State, instead of continuing the present somewhat anomalous system of placing the accounts and the audit under the same Department. He had also received an able Report from the auditor. It would, he thought, be advisable to lay the Reports, which would successively received, on the table of the House, although, in his opinion, it would be better not to do so immediately on their reception, but to wait until the intended changes had been considered as a whole. The suggestions with regard to the Department of control were now under the consideration of the Treasury, and on the assent of that Department being received he should at once proceed to act on them. Those suggestions would not result in any very great saving of expenditure, but the House would, he trusted, either regard them as indicating the general tendency of the changes proposed—lessened expenditure combined with increased efficiency. If the plan now suggested were adopted a saving of £25,000 would, he believed, be ultimately effected on an annual expenditure of £175,000, while the decrease would be attended with the best possible results as far as the efficiency of the work was concerned. The next point to which he would allude was the Department of Transport. A plan had been drawn up for some time. That plan he was not able to carry out; but he confidently hoped and believed that, when a plan was decided on, a transport system could be established which might be beneficially employed in times of peace, and be capable of extension in time of war. They remembered the complaints that were made of the transport service at the time of the Crimean War; and what was it they heard now from Abyssinia? Everything there, they were told, went on well at the transport. But it was obvious that if the transport were inefficient the army could not advance, and it was therefore most essential that they should endeavour, if possible, to organize a transport system on a satisfactory footing. He was truly thankful to say that when the transport plans that were under consideration should have been fully matured they would have a system of transport that would be really worthy of the name—a system that would be not more than adequate to the requirements of peace, but that would be capable of indefinite expansion in time of war. Another important duty of the Controller-in-Chief related to stores, a Department which was considerably larger than hon. Gentlemen were aware. He had received no report as yet on the subject of any new arrangement regarding the store Department, but he was prepared to say that, after mature consideration, the Government did not intend to carry out the recommendations of Lord Strathnairn's Committee. The Government, however, hoped greatly to improve the transport service, and at the same time to reduce the expenditure of that Department. The Committee would be struck with the increase in the stock of military stores. On the 31st of March, 1858, the value of our military stores was £9,420,000; on the 31st of March, 1867, the stores at home and abroad were valued at £14,601,000. This increase arose from a great variety of causes, which at present engaged the serious attention of the Government; and, although he was not able to state the decision at which the War Office would arrive, he could assure the Committee that it would not only endeavour to insure economy but also improved arrangements. He believed that the stores had very unwisely been distributed in a great variety of places; that the great object which ought to be kept in view was their concentration, and to avoid that great deterioration in value which arises from their frequent removal from place to place. In concluding his statement he thanked the Committee for the attention with which his remarks had been listened to; he had been obliged to deal with a great variety of subjects, and had endeavoured to do so as clearly and as frankly as possible. He trusted the Committee would remember that, although great changes had been initiated, a sufficient time had not yet elapsed to mature them, and that it was impossible yet to estimate how far they would tend to a reduction of expenditure. He said this in order that the efforts of those distinguished men who had given him their cordial and constant assistance might not be hastily judged. For himself, he assured the Committee the whole subject had received his anxious attention, and he firmly believed that when the plans to which he had alluded were fully carried out they would result in solid improvement, both as regards efficiency of the army and a decided reduction in the expenditure.

1. Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the number of Land Forces, not exceeding 138,691 Men (including 9,880, all Ranks, to be employed with the Depôts in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland of Regiments Serving in Her Majesty's Indian Possessions), be maintained for the Service of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, from the 1st day of April 1868 to the 31st day of March 1869, inclusive."

Sir John Pakington

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, it was not his intention to follow the right hon. Baronet (Sir John Pakington) through his long and very able statement; but he wished to make an observation or two on some points that provoked criticism and required explanation. The right hon. Baronet had informed the Committee that the sum asked for was to all practicable purposes the same as that asked for last year; but the Committee would remember with regret that, although the Estimate for the current year was only slightly in excess of the year 1867-8, that year's Estimate largely exceeded the Estimate which it was his (the Marquess of Hartington's) duty to submit of the year before. The right hon. Baronet wished the Committee to pass an Estimate which exceeded by £1,500,000 the last Estimate of Lord Russell's Government. Of course, it was easy, as he had said last year, to find very excellent reasons for an increase of expenditure, and he was not prepared to place his finger on any item where a proposed increase should be refused, or where a Vote might be diminished; but although a good case might, in many instances, be made out for a proposed increase of expenditure, it was very certain that nothing but the most constant supervision by the Secretary of State, coupled with a strong determination on his part that the Estimate should not be increased, could insure economy and produce reduction in the annual charge. The Committee should not forget that during the last three or four years of the Administration which preceded the present one the Estimates for the Army showed a decrease year by year, while the Estimates of the present Government showed year by year an increasing sum. However, he joined with the right hon. Baronet in congratulating the right hon. and gallant Member for Huntingdon on the success of his measures for recruiting and re-enlistment. It might not be an unmixed benefit that that should re-enlist a large number of men; but it was an unmixed benefit that they should have the offer of them. He was sorry he could not extend his congratulations to the Government on the result of their plan for creating a Reserve force. Apparently the Government did not expect any very great result from those measures, which had been introduced to the House with some little appearance of importance. This was at least the case as regards the current year. As far as he could make out, the only money asked for on account of the Reserve forces created last year was £20,000 in the Militia fund, and £7,000 in the Enrolled Pensioners' fund, making £27,000, the extent of the sum to be taken on account of the Reserve forces. It therefore appeared to him that the proposed plan was not producing any very great effect. Perhaps, the right hon. Baronet would state, in his reply, what numbers he anticipated would join the Militia and Army Reserves during the year. The Committee would cordially agree in approving the appointment of General Lindsay to be Inspector General of the Reserve force, announced by the right hon. Baronet. It had, he knew, been the intention of successive Secretaries of State for a considerable period that the offices of Inspector General of Militia and Inspector General of Volunteers should, when opportunity offered, be merged into one. At the same time he considered it very doubtful whether any great progress could be made in the way of amalgamating the Reserve forces, the Volunteers, and the Militia. They were bodies raised and organized on entirely different principles, and a certain amount of feeling—he would not say jealousy—had always existed between them. Even since the appointment of General Lindsay he had heard apprehensions expressed by Militia officers of designs supposed to be entertained for altering the constitution of that force, or for assimilating them in any way to the Volunteers. He therefore wished to warn the right hon. Baronet that it would be necessary to proceed with very great caution in any scheme which he might have before him for assimilating or amalgamating the Militia or Volunteer forces. It was quite true, as stated by the right hon. Baronet, that the Vote for Army Stores and Manufacturing Department showed a slight decrease, but the Committee, he thought, would feel disappointed that the decrease was not more considerable. Very large additions were made to the Estimates last year and the year before for the conversion of army rifles; but his impression had been that the process of conversion was to have been completed during the present financial year, and it would cause some disappointment to the Committee to find that the conversion was to be continued during a large part of next year. The right hon. Baronet had stated that last year was the first in which any provision had been made for supplying the armament.

of rifled guns suitable for the fortifications in process of erection. He would find, however, upon inquiry at the War Office, that attention had been steadily pointed in that direction for many years past. Changes were being made so rapidly in the patterns of heavy guns that it would have been most imprudent to provide these until the works were ready to receive them. Up to the time that he left the War Office, the patterns of heavy guns were being continually altered, and the largest patterns, in fact, had hardly been decided on. Rapid provision of the armament, however, was not nearly as pressing as the completion of the fortifications; and, as far as he knew, the armament had been provided in every case as soon as the works were in a state sufficiently forward for the purpose. The right hon. Baronet would find that for years past a large sum had been annually taken for heavy guns for land service; and all those made in the Arsenal which were not for the purposes of the navy must, of course, have been for the purposes of fortifications. A point, which he was not prepared to discuss at present, but which would demand careful consideration by the Committee, was the statement of the right hon. Baronet that he intended to act upon the recommendation he had received, and appoint a head of the Arsenal at Woolwich. That point had been considered over and over again, and was warmly debated before a Committee of that House, presided over by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Limerick (Mr. Monsell), and the subject was one on which eminent authorities held very different opinions. He admitted that there might be many advantages in the plan contemplated by the right hon. Baronet. At the same time he felt strongly that the appointment of a head of the establishment at Woolwich must weaken the feeling of responsibility on the part of the heads of the different manufacturing Departments, thereby tending to lessen their efficiency. There was the Vote showing a very considerable increase—Vote 14, for Works—upon which the right hon. Baronet had not entered into any explanation, probably by accident [Sir JOHN PAKINGTON: Hear!] —and he could doubtless take an opportunity in reply of supplying the omission. It was hardly possible to discuss satisfactorily, and without some special opportunity, the views which had been put before them with respect to army and War Office reorganization; and he accordingly suggested that the discussion upon the point should be taken either upon a separate Notice on going into Supply, or else should be postponed till they came to Vote 18, the Vote for Administration of the Army. The right hon. Baronet, he must admit, had made a very full and frank statement of his intentions; but some little time was necessary for considering the plan which he had submitted, before its discussion could be usefully approached. Without pledging himself to adopt the principles recommended by Lord Strathnairn's Committee, he (the Marquess of Hartington) admitted that the intentions both of Lord de Grey and himself had pointed in the same direction. And he wished to explain that the reason why nothing had been done in the matter, before he himself left office was that the Treasury recommended that the scheme should not be actually set to work till the details had been thoroughly examined, and, among other matters, till the financial bearings of the scheme had been carefully investigated. He was not surprised that the Committee, presided over by Lord Strathnairn, should have found it necessary, at the very threshold of their labours, to come to a decision upon the larger question of amalgamation. He was of opinion that although the Committee was one admirably adapted for considering the question of transport, he did not think its constitution was that which would have been adopted if it had been intended to refer to the Committee the subject of army organization generally, or even that of the organization of the Civil Department. The composition of the Committee was too purely military to render its conclusions such as the House would be willing to accept without hesitation. The only civilian upon it was Sir William Power, the Commissary General. He is a man of very large experience; but he (the Marquess of Hartington) thought the House, while agreeing that there should be a considerable military element in the Committee, would be of opinion that in a matter of finance and public credit there should have been much more of the civilian element than was possessed by this Committee. The right hon. Gentleman had told them that the new Department would lead to economy. He hoped it would, and possibly it might; but he was not without some apprehensions that ultimately it might be the cause of increased expenditure. On this point, however, he had a strong opinion—that in any scheme of army organization the House ought not to lose any portion of the control which, through the Secretary of State, it at present possessed. For that reason, he should prefer to have had the civilian element more largely represented in the Commission. He knew that on the Army Estimates it was competent to hon. Members to discuss any of those subjects at length; but, as a matter of convenience, he thought it would be better not to go into details on the organization of the army till this question came before the House in a more direct form.

The Marquess of Hartington

GENERAL PEEL said, that the noble Marquess had commenced by drawing a comparison between the present Estimates and those for the last year during which he (the Marquess of Hartington) had been in office as Minister for War. The noble Marquess was perfectly correct in saying that the estimated military expenditure for the current year was greater than the actual expenditure of 1865-6 by £1,340,667; but the practical question for the House was what had been the cause of that increase. With the expenditure of 1865-6, the War Department of that day was not able to fill up the ordinary casualties in the army; they had not a breech-loading rifle in the service. There is a great increase in the Estimates on Votes 12 and 13; but during the time the noble Marquess was at the head of the Department it had not fixed upon a pattern. In fact, it was at a stand-still. Had the increase in the Estimates produced the desired effects? The increased pay of the army raised the Votes by the amount of between £300,000 and £400,000, but that increase had put an end to what he confessed to have felt to be a source of great anxiety during two years. Last year was an exceptional year. No fewer than 32,000 men were entitled to their discharge, and their places must be filled up. But there was no longer any anxiety about that, though it had been said that the 2*d.* and 3*d.* additional pay which he proposed last year would not prove a sufficient inducement to men to continue in the service. He hoped that the readiness with which the ten years' men had re-entered the service would be regarded as an answer to much that was said about the treatment of men in the army. They found that the persons now offering themselves were not men taken into a public-house and there made to enlist, but men who had already served their ten years in the army. Within two years 350,000 breech-loaders had been got ready. He believed that the 100,000 provided at Enfield had been turned out by the very day named, and 50,000 had been provided at Birmingham. He should like his right hon. Friend (Sir John Pakington) to explain where the remaining breech-loaders had come from, because there had been only 300,000 new rifles in store. With reference to what the noble Marquess had said on the subject of the great guns, he thought it fortunate that he (the Marquess of Hartington) had made no considerable provision for them, because the pattern had since been altered, and because the expense would not now be so great. The original arrangement was that the money for the building of the fortifications should be raised by loan, and that the armaments were to be provided out of the annual Estimates. The approximate Estimate of the total cost for guns, projectiles, gun carriages and waggons for works under Defence Act of 1860 was £1,885,000, of which sum, the amount provided during the first seven years was only £85,000. If they went on at that rate they would not have the necessary armaments provided before seventeen years. It struck him that if they could afford to do without them for seventeen years they might as well do without them altogether. On the point of the increased expenditure he must remind the noble Marquess that the Royal Commission had been appointed by the Government of which he was a Member, and in their Report the Commissioners stated that a natural consequence of carrying out what they recommended would be to increase the cost of the army. There were several points in the speech of his right hon. Friend to which he did not think it necessary to advert; but he wished to observe that he did not exactly understand how or to what extent the recommendations which he himself had made on the subject of the Army of Reserve were to be carried out by his right hon. Friend. He thought it would be advisable to allow men who had served two-thirds of their existing engagements in the army to commute for the rest of their military service by joining the Army of Reserve; and that, on similar conditions, men purchasing their discharge might be allowed to commute for a portion of what they had to pay. With respect to the manufacturing establishments he did not see how it was possible to improve them. He should attach more importance to the indivi-ual selection that might be made of a controller than he should do to the scheme itself. He had every confidence in the controller and other officers of the new departments.

LORD ELCHO said, he desired to express the pleasure he felt at the statement of his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War—that his object was to introduce unity of action into the administrative Departments of the army. He concurred, too, in what had been said in favour of Sir Henry Storks and General Malfour; but, whatever the satisfaction at that his right hon. Friend had been doing to improve the administration of the army, he confessed that with reference to the other part of his statement—that bearing on the amount of our force—he did not think that our present position or the proposed changes could be looked on with any great satisfaction. His right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War proposed a change with reference to the Reserves; but even his right hon. and gallant Friend (General Peel) who proposed the change last year did not seem to understand in what manner the change was to be carried out. The House had, however, to deal with this broad fact—that the Army Estimates were increasing, steadily increasing. His right hon. and gallant Friend had just accounted for some part of the increase; but we had this increase in the votes without any great available increase in the number of men. The Estimates amount to £13,500,000, and after this enormous expenditure the utmost force we could put in line for the defence of the country—he spoke, of course, of regular troops—was 40,000. He ventured to say that this was a result wholly disproportionate to that enormous expenditure; and he believed that the country would not go on paying such sums without a more satisfactory result. He had placed in the paper a Motion for to-morrow evening, with the object of obtaining a Commission on an Army of Reserve. The Recruiting Commission did not go into that question. That had been distinctly stated in “another place” by a noble Lord who was a Member of the Commission, and who stated that the Commissioners had not touched on that branch of the subject, because it was too vast a one. He should postpone his Motion till after Easter, when he proposed to bring under the notice of the House the question of military organization, and the means we possessed, under the present system, of providing, by an economical arrangement, an efficient Army of Reserve. He believed that the more these matters were discussed the stronger would become the opinion of the country that things were not in a satisfactory condition, and that we had not that strength at home which ought to be maintained here for the purposes of defence.

General Peel

MR. WYLD said, he would wish to call the right hon. Gentleman's attention to the conduct of the Ordnance Survey, which was very unsatisfactory. There was great difficulty in obtaining copies of the surveys, and the object of the heads of the Department appeared to be chiefly to amuse themselves with photographic pursuits. He thought the people of Scotland had the greatest possible reason to complain of the manner in which their interests had been neglected, and the backward state of the survey as regarded that country.

COLONEL GILPIN said, he was glad that his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War had adopted the suggestion of his right hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Huntingdon (General Peel), which would prevent the War Department from calling on the Militia to furnish recruits to the army during a time of peace. He did not, however, understand, what advantage would be derived from placing under one command the forces which the right hon. Baronet proposed to place under that able and courteous officer, General Lindsay. Was the hon. and gallant General's command to be an actual one? The Militia were, under the Mutiny Act, to be in time of war taken up for home service; but during the last war they did more—they not only filled up gaps in the ranks of the regular army on foreign service, but sent out a larger force than had been in the first instance embarked for the Crimea. The Yeomanry were under the Mutiny Act; but he did not suppose his right hon. Friend proposed to put the Volunteers under it, because they appeared to dislike very much the control of the Horse Guards. He thought the proposed amalgamation of reserved forces required some further information.

MAJOR WALKER, in allusion to the deficiency of officers in the Militia force, quoted from a Return stating the deficiency in this respect in various ranks. It appeared that the deficiencies in the rank of lieutenant were 756, and in the rank of ensign and second lieutenant 1,219. With regard to the last figures, he felt bound to explain that the deficiency was caused by an Order issued some years ago for the cessation of the rank of ensign and second lieutenant; but it was notorious that that Order was issued solely on the ground that it was utterly impossible to fill up vacancies in that rank. This did not represent the full amount of the deficiency; for it was well known that the first result of the permanent embodiment of the Militia would be that a very large number of gentlemen would find it impossible for them to serve, and probably from 300 to 400 would at once retire. Those gentlemen held their commissions when the duties were confined to a short annual training, but the other calls upon their time were incompatible with permanent embodiment. The subject was no doubt a difficult one, and he agreed that they could offer no pecuniary reward that would attract young men of good families into the Militia as officers. They might, however, find other ways to attract them. At present a Militia officer's duty was one course of drudgery, and if the country took no interest in the service they could not expect that young men of family should do so. He believed that if they associated the Militia regiments with each other—had regiments of the Line brigaded with them—adopted a system of inspection—and treated the Militia as an honourable branch of Her Majesty's service, instead of, as a necessary evil, they would be able to obtain a better class of young men for officers. He was glad to hear that the billeting system was to be changed, for it was almost impossible to preserve discipline under the billeting system. Until the scheme for the amalgamation of the Reserves was produced, he thought that it would be premature to discuss it at any length; but holding the Militia to be the younger brother of the Line, he must say that if, by drawing the Militia closer to the Volunteers, the relations between the Militia and the Line should be rendered less close he should regard it as a great evil. He should have liked to hear that the Government proposed to place breech-loading rifles in the hands of the Militia; especially as the number of converted rifles now in store must be so considerable that there could be no difficulty at least in sending a sufficient number of the new arm to each Militia regiment to enable instruction in the new drill to be given this year, so that another year's training might not be wasted on a useless arm. He felt bound to express his gratitude for what the Government had already done for the service. They had increased the numbers and efficiency of the Militia, and he trusted that they would now address themselves to the task of increasing the popularity of the service among the class which commanded the force.

SIR HARRY VERNEY expressed the pleasure with which he had heard the announcement that 30,000 of the Militia force were to be brigaded with the Regular army, the result of which would, he hoped, be advantageous to both branches of the service. It was a serious consideration that there were only 40,000 men of the Regular army disposable in these islands, for the defence of the country in case of invasion, while the enormous sum of £13,000,000 or £14,000,000 was expended on the Army Estimates. There was one thing which he should like to see decided upon in the army—namely, a shorter time of service. He thought that four or five years was a sufficiently long time in which to make a good infantry soldier; and he should like to see some such length of time fixed upon for the duration of military service. By this means a more intelligent class of men would be obtained as recruits. He believed that if men could become soldiers for four or five years only, there would be hardly a family in the country who would not like to have one of its members in the army. He wanted to see more military training for the whole population introduced into our schools. He would suggest that in each of the schools which were under the Privy Council there should be some sort of military training afforded, by the engagement of a sergeant from the army to drill the boys. With regard to the Reserved force, it was not a satisfactory state of things that the Staff should be drawn from the Line, and he should like to see the Volunteer force and the Militia supplied with a Staff of their own.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, he considered that civilians had a right to indulge in military criticism on the ground that they paid the Estimates, which were increasing year by year, so much so that one branch of the defensive service cost as much now as both did in the time of the Duke of Wellington, and, in fact, our army was the most expensive in the world. He would not begrudge the expense if we had a satisfactory army; but it appeared there were only 40,000 men we could depend upon in case of need. Little and dear as the army was, there was much internal dissatisfaction; for scarcely a night passed but a military grievance was ventilated in the House, and there were many blunders of administration, such as those which had been recently exposed in connection with the removal of troops—mistakes of a character that could not, as a rule, be committed by business men, whose success depended upon their own efforts. There was a want of a responsible head. The fact appeared to be that there were several heads, and it was most difficult to fix responsibility when anything wrong occurred. The best places in the army, instead of being bought and sold, ought to be thrown open to the best men, who should rise by their merits, as the leaders of parties in the House of Commons did. With an open army and an open navy we should give a chance of advancement to men who might become future Wellingtons and Nelsons. He was sorry the right hon. Baronet did not look with a little more complacency on the Volunteers. It was very hard that they should give their time and energies and still have to pay in money for the liberty of serving their country. They ought to receive a little more from the State to save them from being out of pocket. It was most unhandsome of the country to allow that, especially as we trusted so much to the Volunteer force, and its requirements could be amply met by a tenth of the money which was now as good as thrown into the sea.

GENERAL DUNNE said, the hon. Member, who had just addressed the House, had brought forward a number of grievances upon which hon. Members were accustomed to descant, but they might be easily disposed of. The expense of the army was to be in a great measure accounted for by the high price of wages in England; the comparatively small number of men retained in this country was owing to the large numbers drafted for service abroad; the disasters, which had happened in reference to the supply of the army when on active service, were chiefly owing to the failure of contractors to fulfil their contracts; while the reason why the purchase system had been retained was that the country would not sufficiently pay those officers who retired, worn out. Taking the statement of the right hon. Baronet as a whole, he thought it impossible not to be gratified with it. The right hon.

Mr. Alderman Lusk

Baronet had stated the whole case with a candour seldom displayed by Secretaries of State for War, and had clearly set forth the numerous defects in our system and the modes by which he was about to redress them. This would be most satisfactory to the country. The subject had been treated so ably by those who had preceded him that it was not necessary for him to go at all into detail. He only wished to say that the right hon. Baronet had shown them how necessary it was to retrace the steps taken by former Secretaries of War, for his opinion was that from 1848 down to the time when the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Huntingdon (General Peel) took office we had not had a Minister in this Department of the public service worthy to be called a Secretary at War. The right hon. Baronet who was now in office was going back to the old system, and much good would be the result. The right hon. Baronet now proposed to appoint an officer over all the manufacturing Departments of the army, and this would in his (General Dunne's) opinion be found most advantageous; but it was only going back to the system of the Duke of Wellington. He must, however, object to the amalgamation of the Militia and the Volunteers; it would be impossible to weld two forces that were entirely different in construction, training, and discipline. The Militia were under martial law; while the Volunteers were only under the discipline of their own will. He could not speak too highly of the patriotism of the Volunteers; but he could not call them soldiers or a Reserve army. Volunteers might be very well called an auxiliary force; but, technically and truly, they were not a Reserve, and he hoped, before it was too late, the Government would see the error they were about to commit in the amalgamation. It would not be good for the Volunteers—they did not wish it; it would certainly be injurious to the Militia, and it could never be carried out.

MR. PUGH said, he hoped a fair trial would be given to the experiment of amalgamating the Militia with the Volunteers. He thought that many of the grievances of the two forces would be done away by that judicious step. There should be no jealousy whatever between them. The Militia were drawn from the same classes as the army, which had done so much for the glory of the country. The Volunteers were drawn from the middle classes, who by no fault of their own had had no opportunity of distinguishing themselves; but he hoped if ever they were called upon they would do their duty. It was said they were not under the Mutiny Act, but if ever their services were required for the defence of the country they would be placed under the Mutiny Act; and he should like to see them assimilated to the Militia, not by making the Militia more civilian, but by making the Volunteers more military. This question of a Reserve was a great question; it was that of the defence of the country; it engaged the attention of the Continental Powers, of France and Prussia especially. In favour of the Volunteers it might be said that the triumphant army of the latter Power was composed, in a great measure, of those classes from which the Volunteers derived their strength, from men engaged in trade, in professions, and in the arts and sciences. He remembered hearing that a distinguished statuary at Berlin had left his studio and shouldered his rifle to engage the Austrians. He hoped the Volunteers would not be disheartened because the Government was not able to comply with their request at present. They would remember they had a costly affair on hand at present—the Abyssinian war, which he hoped would soon terminate to the satisfaction of the country, and then the claims of the Volunteers might be considered. At present he thought a step had been taken in the right direction to unite them more closely with the Militia, and he hoped the only rivalry that would ever exist between them would be which of them should best serve their country.

MR. O'REILLY said, there was one subject to which he had called attention for several years, when the fact was indeed denied—namely, how very inefficient the recruiting system was, and how far we were below the establishment at the end of each year. It was satisfactory, however, to find that the recommendations of the Royal Commission on this subject had been well and efficiently carried out by the Department. They had been successful in a double degree, providing a large increase and a superior supply of first recruits—an increase of from 5,000 to 7,000. They had given not only a large supply of re-enlisted men, but enabled them to take or reject whom they pleased. The re-engagements last year were 26,000; the number we might have re-engaged had not been mentioned, but it must have been nearly equal to the whole number of men whose terms of service had expired. The hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Huntingdon (General Peel) had stated the number wanted to be 32,000; but it was satisfactory to know that the average number required to keep up the army would not be much more than 18,000—certainly not more than 20,000—so that they had now a source of supply that would enable them effectually to keep up the army. He hoped that every means would be adopted to maintain and increase the standard of good conduct among the men; and he would venture to express a hope that, now the pay of the soldier had been increased, it would no longer be given to him in dribblets—as if the only way to keep a man sober was to give him his pay in such small sums that he could not get drunk upon it. When they were getting a better class of men they should treat them with more confidence. He had heard with great satisfaction that the Report of the Inspector General of Recruiting would be produced so as to enable them to form a judgment on the whole matter. There were several matters deserving serious consideration which were to be reserved. One was the subject of the retirement from the non-purchase corps of the army. That subject was to be brought before them for separate consideration. When it was brought forward he should be prepared to support the recommendation of the Committee of which he had been a member. There was another point that had been reserved—namely, the combination of the different manufacturing Departments of the army under one head. He expressed no opinion on that subject. It was also unnecessary for him to refer at present to the recommendations of Lord Strathnairn's Committee, since they would be brought forward on a future occasion in greater detail. He, however, thought that the change proposed by the right hon. Gentleman in the administration of the army supply would lead to greater economy. He did not feel called upon to express any opinion with respect to the question of the Army Reserve which had been brought forward by the right hon. Member for Huntingdon last year, as that subject would also come under discussion on a future occasion. With reference to the question that had been raised by the hon. Member for Queen's County (General Dunne), he saw no reason why the Militia and the Volunteers should not be under the inspection of the same general officer. There were five different species of military forces in this country—the Regular Army, Militia, the Yeomanry, the Embodied Pensioners, and the Volunteers, which were at present entirely separate, and in some instances antagonistic, in their organization, and, in his opinion, it would be far better if all the different elements of the Army of Reserve were brought under the control of one head. He wished to direct the attention of the right hon. Baronet (Sir John Pakington) to two minor points connected with the subject. In the first place, it would be advisable to place the members of the survey Department upon a permanent, instead of leaving them upon their present temporary, footing. It would also be well if some arrangement were come to by which the sums to which those cavalry officers, who had purchased their commissions before the change in the regulations, were entitled on leaving the service were paid them at once, or were rendered available towards purchasing their future steps.

MR. AYRTON said, he understood the Secretary of State for War to say that it was contemplated to put both the Militia and the Volunteers under generals of districts. [Sir JOHN PAKINGTON made a gesture of dissent.] He was anxious that the right hon. Baronet should explain whether he proposed to retain the great principle of the civil administration of the army—the principle that everything connected with the expenditure of public money—everything, in short, unconnected with the discipline of the troops and the use of arms, should remain in the hands of civil administrators. He could well understand how a contrary principle might find favour in the eyes of military men; but he trusted that, before introducing any change in this respect, the right hon. Baronet would submit his proposal in a distinct form, so that the House might express an opinion upon what, in his opinion, would tend to withdraw the expenditure of public money from the control of the representatives of the British taxpayers.

COLONEL NORTH said, he should be glad to receive from his right hon. Friend some explanation with respect to the boys whom he proposed to introduce into the army. His right hon. Friend said he thought the boys educated at Chelsea might be advantageously employed in the army as non-commissioned officers. But did his right hon. Friend mean to say that they should at once be invested with the rank, and placed over the heads of all the other members of the force? If that were his intention, he (Colonel North) could assure him that the measure would create great dissatisfaction throughout the service. The hon. Alderman (Mr. Alderman Lusk) who had addressed some remarks to the Committee upon the subject of the army, and had immediately afterwards left the House, gave the Committee to understand that this country was paying a great number of millions for the support of 40,000 men; but the fact was, that although we had only about 40,000 at home, about £13,000,000 covered the expenses of something like 136,000 men. It was true, as the hon. Alderman complained, that the troops were scattered all over the world; but our soldiers were stationed in the West Indies and other unhealthy and pestilential places, not in consequence of their own inclination, for they would much rather remain in this country, but for objects of which the hon. Alderman himself would probably strongly approve. The hon. Member for Carmarthenshire (Mr. Pugh), in talking of the advantages which had accrued from volunteering in the Prussian service, should have remembered that volunteering was unknown in that country, and that every one was bound to serve for a certain length of time. He did not believe that such a system would be tolerated for a moment by the people of this country. The Volunteers ought and wished to be regarded as auxiliary to the military and the Militia, with whom they did not desire in any way to interfere.

Mr. O'Reilly

MR. AYTOUN wished to know, whether all the troops at home had been supplied with Snider rifles; whether they had been furnished to our troops in India and the colonies; and, whether it was intended to place them in the hands of our native troops in India and of our Volunteers? He understood that already about 300,000 weapons had been converted—enough, it might be thought, to arm the whole of our regular force. With respect to the Volunteers, the right hon. Baronet appeared to argue that, because the number of efficient riflemen was increasing, the Capitation Grant ought to receive no addition. He denied the justness of the inference. It was a fact that, owing to the smallness of the Grant, the selection of officers was confined to within very narrow limits, only rich men being able to accept the higher appointments.

MR. CHILDERS said, he had to congratulate the right hon. Baronet on the very lucid statement in which he had brought these Estimates under the consideration of the House. The explanations which the right hon. Baronet had made had been none the more easy from the fact that the right hon. Baronet had to show that an apparent expenditure of about £15,500,000 represented a real outlay of less than £14,000,000. But there were some points involved in that statement on which he (Mr. Childers) was anxious to take that opportunity of making a few observations. He, like his right hon. Friend, noticed in the form of the Estimates some changes which, although about to be considered by them, had not been approved by the Committee on Public Accounts, and which, undoubtedly, tended to swell the Estimates. He would not, however, discuss this question of extra receipts, as it would come before the Committee to which he belonged. But the Secretary of State had suggested more questionable changes. His right hon. Friend had referred to the fact that all the transport expenditure was borne on the Navy Votes, and all the cost of the guns for the navy on the Army Votes; and had told them that he should like to see the cost of the army transports inserted in the Army Estimates, and the cost of guns for the navy in the Navy Estimates. Now, it seemed to him (Mr. Childers) that it would be very difficult to carry out that arrangement. The rule should be that the Department which had the spending of the money ought to be accountable for it on the face of the Estimates. If the military Departments had the manufacturing establishments under their charge, then, however much of the out-turn of those establishments went to the navy, it was impossible that the navy could be properly made accountable for them. If again the transport department were under the control of the military authorities, then it ought to come under the military Votes; but as long as the charge of the transport service rested on the Admiralty, its cost should not be placed in the Army Estimates. The cost of the transport service was not all comprised in Vote 17 of the Navy Estimates; but included the charge for men, provisions, and items in several other Votes, and, therefore, if the army took those charges upon its Votes, it would take upon them provision for a certain number of sailors, the cost of victualling the vessels, &c., and the only result will be confusion worse confounded. With the exception of cases of that kind, however, he entirely agreed in the general tone of his right hon. Friend's remarks, and admitted the desirableness of the Army Estimates showing army expenditure and the Navy Estimates showing navy expenditure. He thought it ought to go out to the country that they were not spending £15,500,000, but really less than £14,000,000, on the army. This, indeed, was a far too great expense for this country. But he could not but admit that the last Estimates of an expiring Parliament ought not to deal largely in important changes, which, whatever might be their direction or their extent, would have to come before the next Parliament, chosen by the new constituencies. The next House of Commons would most probably seek to render the army more national than it had hitherto been with respect both to officers and men; and those questions would have to be handled in a careful manner, lest they should destroy the existing machinery without constructing a better machinery in its place. But meanwhile one of the preparatory steps should be to get the control of the civil Departments of the army into a thoroughly efficient condition before they attempted to make more extensive changes. He was glad, therefore that his right hon. Friend had, during the Recess, taken up as his own peculiar question the subject treated by Lord Strathnairn's Committee, and although his right hon. Friend had not yet gone far in the matter, they had every reason to hope that, in the course of the present Session, an efficient control over those Departments would be brought about prior to the consideration of the further changes to which he had alluded. But coming to the recommendations of Lord Strathnairn's Committee, he wished to say at once that he thought it would not be expedient for Parliament to deal with them, as far as sanctioning or disapproving them went, until the whole scheme was fully before it. The matter was too large and too important to be treated piecemeal. We had a very peculiar system of army management. Without, then, discussing whether the relations between the War Office and the Horse Guards were the best that could exist, must be admitted that those relations were of a peculiar and delicate character, and a danger he foresaw in dealing with the recommendations of Lord Strathnairn's Committee was that, unless the greatest care was taken, they might intensify the existing duality of the army administration, the result of which would be the most complete financial confusion and the utter destruction of anything like uniform action. The right hon. Baronet was of opinion that it would be desirable to place the Controller's Department under the management of an officer of high rank, who would bring to the War Office the experience which he had acquired in the service.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON explained, that what he had said was, that the recommendations of Lord Strathnairn's Committee was that the system of control should be commenced under an officer of high rank.

MR. CHILDERS was not at all disputing the fitness of the two gallant officers selected, but desirous of pointing out to his right hon. Friend that unless the greatest caution was observed the defect produced might be to minimize that civil control to which the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Tyrton) had referred; and one of two things would probably happen—either the entire management of the army would be thrown into military hands, the Secretary of State being practically powerless, or they would have two military Departments acting as rivals to each other, and creating an infinitely worse dualism and anarchy than was produced by the antagonism between a civil and a military administration. He would next take the question of audit. For an efficient check on expenditure three things were necessary. First, they ought to have the means of knowing what expenditure was really going on; next, they wanted a proper controlling authority; and, thirdly, they required to have a Department engaged in auditing the expenditure which had been incurred, to ensure that the accounts were correct, both as to authority and as to voucher. It was important that there should be no confusion between these several distinct branches of financial administration. The right hon. Baronet had spoken of prompt audit; but the whole theory of audit rested on the hypothesis that the auditor should not be hurried, and should not feel that he was obliged to exercise his functions with rapidity in order to keep up with the requirements of the service. For this reason he had heard with regret, rumours that the auditors of army accounts were to be subordinate to some high War Office official. He especially insisted that the auditing Department should be more directly under the control of Parliament, as is the Auditor-General. It should not be under departmental control. [SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said it was not.] He admitted that the right hon. Baronet had not yet committed himself to the error he wished to guard against; but he feared that the tendency of his arrangements was in that direction. The Audit Office, properly so called, or the War Office, should be more under the control of the Auditor General than under that either of the Controller or of the Under Secretary of State. With regard again to transport, so far as conveyance of troops by water was concerned, he thought the right hon. Baronet would act somewhat rashly if he attempted to run counter to the recommendations of the Committee which considered the subject, and to bring back that service under the control of the War Office. Allusion had been made to the scheme of retirement from the non-purchase corps which had emanated from the Committee which sat last year, and of which he was Chairman. Three objections had been urged against it, according to his right hon. Friend; first, the expense; secondly, that it would have a tendency to withdraw efficient officers from the army; and, thirdly, the dissatisfaction among the other branches of the service that would arise in the event of its being applied to the officers of the Artillery and Engineers. The Report had received, however, the unanimous sanction of a Committee composed of civilians and military men. But the real fault found with the plan had not been mentioned. The objectors to the scheme really felt that the system proposed was too economical for them. It had been urged by the senior officers of Artillery that under it they would lose prospects which, by the unequal character of the present system, had fortunately and accidentally been held out to them. Most probably the discovery of the three other objections alluded to by the right hon. Baronet was due to this cause. [SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: I never heard of that.] If the right hon. Baronet had not heard of what had been in every newspaper during the last six months, it showed how industrious those had been whose interest it was to keep him in ignorance. He (Mr. Childers) honestly believed the objections came from a very few persons, and that the facts were as he had stated them. He concluded by thanking the right hon. Baronet for his clear statement.

Mr. Childers

MR. WHITBREAD said he would beg to recall the attention of the Committee to the question of the supply of men for the army. The right hon. and gallant Member for Huntingdon (General Peel) was to be congratulated on the success of his measures for supplying recruits and securing the services of the time-expired men. Not to detract from the measure; but in order to dispel any idea that they had already done sufficient, he must remind the Committee that the scheme came into operation at a favourable time. The years 1866-7 and 1867-8, in which the greatest number of men might have claimed discharge, were also years in which employment out of the army had been extremely scarce; and, consequently, there had been more men willing to enter the army and fewer desirous of leaving it. This was an element that must not be omitted from the calculation. It was a moot point whether it was right or wrong to continue the services of the time-expired men; and the right hon. Baronet had hit the nail upon the head when he said that the Government should be in a position to accept or not, as they chose, the services of such men. The right hon. Baronet said he thought the number of men re-engaging was a sufficient answer to the attacks made on the way in which the soldiers were treated. All he (Mr. Whitbread) had ever said, on this point, was that the measures formerly adopted had the effect of checking the disposition of men to re-enlist; and no man felt greater satisfaction than himself at the successful results of the improvements which had been made in the condition of our soldiers. With regard to the proposed system of training recruits for the army, he admitted that a fatal mistake had been made by the Committee, of which he had the honour to be a Member, in using the phrase "training boys." Those whom the Committee wished to train would be like the boys who enter the naval service. The boys of the navy were young men of nearly seventeen years of age when they entered the service. The Committee contemplated taking these young men a year older than the boys in the navy, and keeping them a year longer in training as soldiers. To make an effective soldier a man had a great deal to learn, and all he (Mr. Whitbread) asked was that he should be taught before and not after he was eighteen years of age. Let the boys be taught during the most teachable time of life, as boys intended for trades were taught. Were the training schools open to young men at the age of sixteen, they would not enter the army from sheer want of employment, or be driven to it because of their worthlessness; but would assuredly seek it with a determination to rise in the profession. Much fault had been found with the statement of the Government that these youths should go in as non-commissioned officers. [Sir JOHN PAKINGTON said, he had never intended it.] He was glad to hear it; for nothing could be more fatal to the plan he had at heart than that these boys should enter in any other capacity than ordinary privates. If the right hon. Baronet would give those boys a certain amount of general education and as much professional instruction as possible, and then take them straight from the school to the army, commanding officers would be only too glad to avail themselves of their services. Finding the value of these boys, they would not leave it to civilians to press this matter upon the War Office; but would themselves ask the right hon. Baronet to increase the number of these training schools for the army.

MR. OTWAY in rising to move that the Vote be reduced by the number of 2,758 men said, the speech of the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for War was rather inconsistent. The right hon. Baronet had indicated a desire for economy; but, at the same time, the only economy which he seemed to have any hope of effecting was insignificant and hardly worth mentioning in an expenditure so vast. It was strange to hear the Secretary for War admit that these military accounts were no accounts at all—that they contained inaccuracies of such a character that it was impossible to determine from them what our military expenditure was. The expense occasioned in transport by the invaliding of soldiers was, for instance, charged to the navy, although it properly arose in the army. But it was evident that, in such a case, all that was necessary to prevent confusion was that a debtor and creditor account should be kept between the army and navy with regard to the transport of troops, and every expense occasioned to the navy by transporting troops should be charged on account to the army. One important point in connection with the accounts before them was the question of audit. The hon. Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) said it was the theory that it should not be hurried. To that might be added another theory, that it should be independent. It was hardly credible that these accounts amounting to £15,500,000 was submitted to no independent audit whatever. What protection was there for the public? The system adopted was one of the worst that could be conceived; for the gentleman who audited the accounts had at the same time the payment of the money, and he would be a most disinterested gentleman if he were in a hurry to expose any error which he might discover he had made. There was one thing very noticeable, too, in reference to the audit, and that was, that whatever errors might be discovered, it very rarely happened that the money which had been improperly expended was recovered. In a year of profound peace Parliament was called upon to vote £15,500,000 for military purposes, and in return for that sum we had the smallest army maintained by any country in the world which professed to exercise any power. If the House would accept the proposition he was about to submit—namely, that the troops in the colonies should be withdrawn, we might very largely reduce our military expenditure. The right hon. and gallant Member for Huntingdon (General Peel) had said that no comparison could be instituted between the cost of maintaining our army and that of maintaining foreign armies, especially those of France and Prussia, because we maintained troops in the colonies. But as to France that was incorrect. France maintained in Algeria as large an army as we had in India. He admitted that the soldier was better paid here than in any other country in the world, and he believed that he was as well clothed and as well fed. He did not think that any economy could be introduced into our army with regard to the pay, clothing, or food of a soldier. As to the officers, considering the outlay they had to make, through the pernicious system of purchase, they were the worst-paid officers in the world. In 1835, a year of profound peace, our military expenditure was £5,626,713, including the Effective and Non-effective services. In 1855, when we were engaged in a war with one of the great powers of Europe, and maintained a large body of contingent troops, our military expenditure was £13,721,158. Of course, the accounts then did not include certain things which were included now. [Colonel HERBERT: Did they include the Ordnance charges?] They did not. Again, in 1815, at the close of the great war, when we had 246,000 men under arms, the military expenditure of the country was £19,869,000. These figures showed how the Army Estimates grew. This year—a year of peace—the military expenditure was put down at £15,500,000. As the Estimates increased, however, the number of men employed grew smaller. That had been the case since the present Government came into office. In 1866, the Army Estimates were £14,340,000, and the number of men was 138,117. In 1867, the Estimates were £15,252,200, and the number of men 139,163. This year the Estimates were £15,455,400, and the number of men 138,691. The amount for the general staff of officers was also increasing. The sum voted for the general staff last year was £98,291; this year, with fewer men, it was £101,815. But these were only small matters. That which lay at the bottom of our military expenditure, was what might be called the double government of the army. He did not think that that was a subject to be discussed on a question of military Estimates. He had given notice that he should take an occasion of submitting that subject to the House; because it involved, not merely matters of great constitutional importance, but questions of essential importance as regarded economy in the army. There was a double staff of officials to do work which could be well done by one Department. When we compared the expense of these two Departments with that of the one Department in France or Prussia, we saw the cost which the double government of our army entailed. The charge for the War Department was £224,578. There were 621 employés in the War Department, and 156 in the Commander-in-Chief's Department, making a total of 777 persons employed in the administration of the army. France, which had an army three times as numerous as ours, had only 480 clerks to administer her army, and the total cost of administration was 1,920,528*f.*, or £76,838. The French standing army amounted generally to between 500,000 and 600,000 men, while ours was only 138,000. He had recently had an opportunity of inspecting the War Department at Berlin. Anyone who was acquainted with the arrangements in Pall Mall would be astonished on seeing the contrast exhibited by the Berlin Department. During the late war the Prussian army consisted of between 400,000 and 500,000 men, and it was administered in a way which commanded the admiration of all who watched its proceedings. The whole cost of the Prussian War Department was 326,000 thalers, or £48,900 a year. With these facts before them, he thought it was clearly time to make some reforms in our War Department. The right hon. Baronet was, like most Ministers of State, very hopeful, and if his hope was to be realized it would be by the employment of Sir Henry Storks and General Balfour, than whom two more competent gentlemen could with difficulty be found. He (Mr. Otway) was strongly of opinion that no real economy would be obtained in this direction until the Horse Guards were brought under the same roof with the War Department, and an end was put to the ridiculous and overdone system of correspondence between the two offices. He remembered a recent instance. An hon. Member put a question to the Secretary of State for War as to the landing of the 86th Regiment upon an island in which an epidemic was raging. He was asked to postpone his question until communication could be made with the Horse Guards. He would give an instance of the circumlocution which existed. A communication was sent the other day to the office by an Adjutant General of Artillery. It was the custom for every letter to pass through the hands of several clerks, each of whom made his sentiments known by a memorandum on the back of the letter. On the occasion in question the letter was returned to the writer with fifteen endorsements by clerks, the last of which was—"This letter should be referred to the Adjutant General of Artillery"—the very person by whom the letter had been written. This was a specimen of the "confusion worse confounded" which now prevailed. He knew a gentleman, too, who had assured him that his employment in the War Department consisted entirely in stamping and copying letters—work which could be done equally well by a non-commissioned officer at 1s.

Mr. Otway

or 2s. a day in addition to his pension. He hoped Sir Henry Storks would soon see his way to a sensible reduction in the number of clerks. One of the items on which he desired to comment was that of £48,000 for agency. This sum the public were called upon to pay to certain gentlemen who acted as bankers for the army; but whose most important occupation was the conducting of illicit arrangements between officers for the sale and purchase of commissions. It was one of the most pernicious military systems that had ever existed, and the sooner this item disappeared from the Estimates the better it would be for the credit of everybody concerned. He hoped, indeed, his hon. Friend (Mr. Trevelyan) would succeed in carrying a Motion of which he had given notice, and with it the disappearance of this charge. With regard to recruiting, a considerable saving might be accomplished; for only those who had investigated the matter could have any idea of the unnecessary trouble which a recruit had to undergo, or of the expense which attended his being bandied backwards and forwards, and subjected to different examinations. When a recruit was brought up by the Marines, he was examined by a medical man, and if he was rejected there was no expense to the country; and this plan, if generally adopted, would be serviceable to the country with regard to general recruiting. He now approached the most important point in which a substantial saving might be effected. It had been asked, seeing that we had only 45,000 troops for the defence of the country in case of attack, where were the remainder of the 136,000 men the Committee were asked to vote, and the answer had been that 48,000 were distributed over our colonies. One would think that if soldiers were enlisted and sent to the colonies, the colonies would pay for their own defence. The people of Australia, man for man, were richer than the people of this country. But the colonies did not contribute their share. There was only one exception, and that was the unfortunate island of Ceylon, which was called upon to pay for more men than were in fact sent there. At least, so it was stated. The cost was £146,000 a year; the contribution, £160,000. The whole cost of our troops stationed in the colonies was £3,388,023, of which they returned to us £365,700, leaving a balance against us upon this head of £3,022,323. Expense, however, was not the only rawback attendant upon the present disposition of our troops; there was also danger. Would any man in possession of his senses contend that by any possible amount of valour or arrangement 2,000 British troops could successfully defend Canada from invasion? With such an immense frontier, America, at any moment she chose to march into Canada, could swallow the British force at a mouthful, and the very presence there of a small British force was provocative of such an expedition. Malta cost us a large sum yearly. Besides being a great military station, Malta was a great naval entrepôt; and there were naval and military hospitals, naval and military prisons, a naval and military baking establishment—in fact, all the establishments were in double. The place was not large enough to admit of the manœuvring of troops, and, as a consequence, the soldiers were suffering from lassitude and sickness in the warm seasons. It should be made essentially a naval station, and the military expense could at once be got rid of. The island should be garrisoned by marines, who could be changed about with the marines of the Mediterranean fleet. Great good would accrue and much less expense could be incurred than at present; 6,500 men would be set free for duty elsewhere. As for the guns at Malta, the Marine Artillery, the finest force in existence, could take care of them. He commended this idea to the Secretary of State; but he supposed it would not have much effect upon him. With regard to the particular Vote upon which he intended to test the opinion of the House by a Motion, the hon. Member proceeded to quote the opinions of officers, civilians, and military men, who were either heard orally or to whom interrogations had been addressed by the Committee moved for by the hon. and gallant Member for Lichfield (Major Anson), as to the possibility of dispersing, or supplementing, British troops in the colonies by the employment of native troops. They sent British regiments to the West Indies, at a very considerable expense, to be decimated, when their places might be filled by troops belonging to a different race—for instance, Malays or Indian troops—having no affinity with the natives, and therefore not dangerous in case of disaffection amongst them. With regard to the Mauritius, it was questionable whether it was necessary to maintain a garrison there, but according to the statement of the right hon. Baronet himself, one-half of the force there might be dispensed with. Matters had changed very much since the days of Paul and Virginia, and sometimes the climate was little short of pestilential. He protested against our sending several thousands of European troops every year to climates of the most unhealthy character, and believed that to be one of the greatest impediments to recruiting. If it were necessary to send European troops there at all, such troops should be specially raised for the service. Never were soldiers more satisfied than the European troops that had served under the East India Company. The defence of all the West India islands must be a maritime defence, and garrisons as a means of defence were but of little use. What happened with regard to Hong Kong? Dr. Dick, the principal medical officer there, made a Report of the sanitary state of the island, and recommended the withdrawal of an European regiment, with a view to the preservation, as far as possible, of the health and efficiency of the British soldiers, and to a diminution of the great expenditure arising from casualties in a European regiment stationed in such a climate, and his recommendation was supported by the General in command. That Report was never acted upon, and six months after it was followed by another, in which Dr. Dick said that it was now his duty to show to what an extent the fears he then ventured to express had been realized. He then proceeded to state that within little more than three months deaths and invaliding among the men to the amount of 66 per cent per annum had taken place; that 81 out of 101 women and 71 out of 171 children had died, and that 11 officers had died or were invalided within the quarter. The West India command furnished an illustration of the way military affairs were managed by the War Department. The West India command consisted of 4,919 men, the cost of which was £282,172, and he now asked the Committee to listen to what followed. The staff employed in commanding those 4,919 men—about as large as a brigade or a major-general's command—consisted, among others, of two general officers, two deputy-assistant-adjudants-general, two assistant-quarter-masters-general, two military secretaries, two aides-de-camp, four fort-adjudants, four commandants, and nineteen clerks, and their pay amounted to £10,750. At the Mauritius 2,000 men were stationed, and the cost was £132,700, and the staff consisted of one major-general, one deputy-quarter-master-general, one military secretary, one aide-de-camp, one fort-major, and eight clerks. Their pay amounted to £8,880. Such a state of things was enough to excite the attention of the country; and people would say that there was an absurd, lavish, and improper expenditure, two or three general officers being employed to do what would be the work of one colonel in the French or Prussian armies. The authorities at the Horse Guards would say that they must find employment for our general officers, and the general officers when abroad must have European troops, the consequence of which was that the country was saddled with a vast expenditure for purposes so small and useless. He did not venture to ask that in this year's Estimates any large reduction should be made; but he would ask the Committee to do that which could be done without in any way affecting the public service. He proposed to withdraw half the garrison in the Mauritius, amounting to 958 men, and half the garrison in the West India, Windward, and Leeward Islands, amounting to three battalions, or 1,800 men. He would move that the number of men be diminished by 2,758.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That the number of Land Forces, not exceeding 135,933 Men (including 9,880, all Ranks, to be employed with the Depôts in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland of Regiments Serving in Her Majesty's Indian Possessions), be maintained for the Service of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, from the 1st day of April 1868 to the 31st day of March 1869, inclusive.”—(Mr. Otway.)

SIR CHARLES RUSSELL said, he would not at that hour attempt to follow in detail the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down (Mr. Otway) through his various statements; but would merely remark that every friend and foe of the army were agreed that the expenditure was too much, and would be exceedingly glad to see it reduced. The hon. Member said we had the smallest standing army of any nation that professed to keep one, and the hon. Gentleman now proposed to increase its efficiency by reducing it by 2,758 men. The hon. Gentleman had enlarged upon the intricacies of the double command, and, in fact, had entered into the question of the re-organization of the War Department—a matter which was now actually taken in hand, and which they expected to see dealt with in a manner which would lead to very beneficial results. The hon. Gentleman had alluded to 700 employés in that Department who, he said, had to do with only 136,000 men. But he omitted to mention the Militia and Volunteers, with which the Department had also to deal, making in all a force of 500,000 men. The hon. Gentleman had referred to the agency system, which he had discovered was maintained at great expense for the purchase and sale of commissions. He was surprised the hon. Gentleman had forgotten that the sum paid to Messrs. Cox and Co. and other army agents was paid for their services in distributing pay, and acting as very useful and efficient bankers to the army in general. Though under the admirable arrangements of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Huntingdon (General Peel) the standard of the army had been raised an inch, which meant reducing the available sources of the supply of recruits by a very large number, the fact was that the strength of the army had been greatly increased. An advantage of the present system was that now, for the first time, commanding officers had the power of rejecting men that offered themselves for re-engagement. The hon. Member for Chatham (Mr. Otway) had complained that our troops were so scattered in the colonies that we could only put 40,000 men in line. He supposed the hon. Member must include Ireland among the colonies, for he had made no allusion to the 20,000 troops stationed there. He agreed with the hon. Gentleman that the defence of the long line of Canadian frontier was difficult; but how could we with any dignity withdraw our troops from Canada? As to the extraordinary arrangement suggested by the hon. Member at Malta, he was at a loss to know why marines should not suffer as much from lassitude there as Line soldiers. The hon. Member seemed to think there was no drill ground in Malta; but he could assure him that there was an excellent drill ground there, and that he had often been drilled on it till he was very tired indeed. With regard to the mortality at the Mauritius, he had passed fourteen months there, and a more beautiful and, at ordinary times, a healthier island he had never seen. The fever there was, of course, much to be deplored; but the island could not be defended by naval means, for it was surrounded by coral reefs, and ships of war could not lie off the island. Moreover, the Isle of Bourbon, close at hand, was garrisoned by a French force, which might at any moment make a descent upon the Mauritius. The substitution of black troops there and elsewhere would be no economy; for the cost of a regiment was within a few pounds that of an English regiment, and the black troops died off as rapidly as white troops. The proposal of the hon. Gentleman would effect an inconsiderable saving, and, as it would reduce the strength of the army by 2,700 men, he hoped the hon. Member would not put the Committee to the trouble of dividing.

CAPTAIN VIVIAN said, the right hon. Gentleman had referred to him in the course of his speech as if he had stated that the British army cost £15,000,000. He was aware, however, that there was a sum of £2,000,000 under the head of repayments, which the Government would be recouped, and which reduced the army expenditure to £13,000,000. He believed that the public were led into error by these figures, and that they thought our army cost the extravagant sum of £130 per man. Many items were not fairly chargeable upon the army. For instance, as had been pointed out, there was the item of warlike stores for the navy, though this was, perhaps, balanced by the transport furnished for the army by the sister service. On this point he suggested whether it would not be a good plan to set up a system of army transport for the army alone, quite independent of the navy. Deducting all the items which were not fairly chargeable against the regular forces, there only remained £11,750,000, or £86 per man; and this comprised food, clothing, arms, equipment, horses, and the pay of every single person connected with the army, from the right hon. Baronet downwards. He was glad to hear the improvements proposed in the Militia, which was the real constitutional force of Reserve to which we must look. It would be well that this force should be brought into closer relations with the regular army; and if it were placed in barracks when called out, that would be a great advantage, for discipline and morality could never be maintained under the system of billeting. Militia officers ought to receive greater encouragement, and he was much gratified at hearing that something was about to be done for that ill-used class of Militia officers, the Quartermasters. He congratulated the right hon. and gallant Member (General Peel) on the great success of the extra 2d. per day in procuring men for the army. It appeared from the statement of the right hon. Baronet that more men had re-engaged last year than in the preceding five years. It had been stated, with truth, that not more than 40,000 men could be set in line in this country; and his hon. Friend (Mr. Otway), looking at the number of troops employed in the colonies, wished to reduce the Vote for that service. Such a proposal opened up a grave question, which was probably of too much importance to be dealt with incidentally in Committee. If we were to increase our effective force it must be done by making the colonies pay for their own troops. It was an extraordinary thing that some colonies paid so largely for the number they had in comparison with the payments made by other colonies. He did not see how our interests could be served by our maintaining 12,000 men in Canada. The military courage of the Canadians would be more readily developed if we did not allow it to remain dormant by quartering our troops in the colony.

COLONEL PERCY HERBERT said, that from his own knowledge and experience he should strongly deprecate the transfer from the navy to a military department of the transport of troops. In time of war it would be impossible to secure troops a proper safeguard during passage unless the arrangements were in the hands of the officer in charge of the naval force on the station. He was glad that notice had been taken of the remarks made about military agents; for it would be unjust to let it go forth that the very respectable firms and gentlemen who acted as agents for the different regiments did nothing for the £48,000 except carry on a traffic in commissions. They had responsible duties, and discharged them efficiently, and, although that might be done by a public Department, as it had been proposed they should, it had generally been considered that it was more economical to leave them to the agents. With regard to the force in the Mauritius, it was one thing to have it reduced by sickness in time of peace, and another to reduce it permanently by one-half. The French had much the same garrison at Bourbon that we had at the Mauritius, which island was assailable at two points, where it could be defended by 2,000 men. There were only two harbours in the island; the smaller could be defended by 300 or 400 men, and the main harbour could be equally well defended by 1,500 men, with suitable fortifications. Therefore, granted that it was expedient to defend the Mauritius, the garrison was not altogether useless nor insufficient. It might require to be increased in time of war, but it was strong enough in time of peace. If it were not held by such a garrison, and were consequently lost, it would require a considerable number of troops and ships to re-take it. He had heard it stated that during the old wars with France £15,000,000 worth of property was captured by cruizers and privateers issuing from the Mauritius. Our commerce had enormously increased since then; and where would be the economy of saving £200,000 a year, and then re-taking the island, with a diversion of force which might be inconvenient, and at a very considerable expense, in order to prevent far greater loss being inflicted on our commerce?

MR. BARCLAY said, that having resided two years in the Mauritius, he was able to affirm that the reduction of the garrison to 1,000 men would be most pleasing to the colonists, and would be a most acceptable relief to them. Personally, he thought the reduction might be made with safety, if the health of the remaining regiment were promoted by removing it from the town of Port Louis to a site already selected in a district of the island that was more salubrious. When privateers issued from the Mauritius, the island was self-supporting; but now, owing to the great cultivation of sugar, and increased population, the inhabitants depended for their subsistence upon the importation of rice from India; and, therefore the possession of the island depended entirely on maritime supremacy. The insalubrity of the island had been greatly exaggerated. A British regiment might be kept there with safety, and alone, or with a Sikh regiment, it would be sufficient for defence.

MR. CARDWELL said, that an important question had been raised—the employment of British troops in our distant colonial possessions, which absorbed 50,000 men. It was satisfactory that, since the Report of the Committee of 1862, continuous and considerable progress had been made in giving effect to the policy which the House meant to pursue on this subject. He had heard with pleasure the other evening the statement of his right hon. Friend the Under Secretary for the Colonies, that the last remaining regiment was to be withdrawn from New Zealand. It happened to be his duty to propose to the House the arrangements which led to this; and he was glad the Ministers and Assembly of New Zealand had not elected the alternative offered to them of paying for the troops, but had decided upon their withdrawal. He was glad that the present Government were following the policy of their predecessors in this respect. In the course of last Session they were told the same view was being carried into effect by the present Government in regard to the Cape of Good Hope, and he cheerfully supported the policy, although no doubt at the Cape it must be pursued with caution and prudence. At the same time he hoped that the policy which had been firmly commenced, would be steadily and continuously adhered to. The question had been raised, whether we could not dispense with white troops in some colonies by substituting troops of a different race, not, he hoped, as a charge upon the Estimates of this country. He agreed with the hon. and gallant Officer opposite that if you wanted a service to be performed you would get it in the main performed more efficiently and cheaply by the employment of British troops; but the principle for which he wished to contend was that we should steadily go forward, declaring to the colonies that it is beyond our intention, as it is beyond our power, to furnish the men by whom they are to be defended. He said this on other than merely pecuniary grounds. Much was said about sanitary reforms and moral reforms that were to accompany our new system of recruiting, and to attract a higher class of men to the service; but if these things were to be done we must put an end to the plan of maintaining at one time 50,000 men in our colonial dependencies. For these reasons we must pursue, steadily and without check, the policy upon which we had entered. He felt convinced that the object of his hon. Friend the Member for Chatham (Mr. Otway) was not to diminish the British Army, but to bring it up to a higher point of efficiency, and he hoped that the reply of the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for War would render it unnecessary for his hon. Friend to go to a division.

MAJOR ANSON cordially concurred in what had fallen from the hon. Member for Chatham with regard to the military expenditure for the colonies, and thought that the House should insist upon having a clear statement of the money which the colonists cost the mother country. The accounts were at present not worth the paper they were written on. There was also an absence of information as to the money value of our stores both at home and in the colonies. *

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON, in reply, said, he must express his thanks and his satisfaction at the general tone of the remarks with which his Statement had been received. In reference to some observations made by the noble Marquess the Member for North Lancashire (the Marquess of Hartington), he begged to assure the noble Marquess that when he stated that no guns were provided for the fortifications earlier than last year he had no intention to impute blame to the late Government. Indeed, he agreed with the right hon. and gallant Member for Huntingdon (General Peel) that, considering the progress which had been made in the manufacture of artillery, it was fortunate that a large expenditure had not been previously incurred in furnishing guns for the fortifications. In reply to the question which had been asked as to the intentions of the Government with regard to the two branches of the new Army of Reserve, as proposed by the right hon. and gallant Member for Huntingdon last year, he observed that he thought he had made it clear that he fully intended to adopt the plan proposed by that right hon. Gentleman of forming an Army of Reserve out of the Line by giving an increased amount of bounty to the Militia, and raising the Militia to a full quota. He had also intended to say that the scheme contemplated leaving it open to soldiers to commute the latter part of their service in the Line for a certain amount of service in the Army of Reserve. He did not anticipate that any large number of men would be derived in that way; but in order to carry out the plan it was necessary that regulations should be drawn up, which, after General Lindsay was consulted with respect to them, would be laid on the table of the House. Surprise had been expressed that so few small arms had been converted. He had to state that it was intended to convert 160,000 in the course of the year. The conversion would cost 3s. each, and when these had been converted their whole stock would be exhausted and they would have to rely on new manufactures. With regard to the armament of the Militia, he had to observe that there were not sufficient breech-loading arms in store to provide the Militia with weapons of that description. A certain number of Militia regiments would be sent this year, as during last year, to Aldershot, and all those would be provided with breech-loading arms, but a greater number could not be furnished this year with breech-loaders. In fact, all the regiments of the Line were not at present armed with them. The regiments sent of late to India were provided with the new arms, but the regiments previously quartered in India were not yet furnished with them. In reference to what had fallen from the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton), he repeated that the four branches of the reserved force, instead of being as now under the superintendence of three officers of inferior rank, would be placed under one officer of much higher rank. His hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Oxfordshire (Colonel North) had fallen into a serious mistake as to what he had said on the subject of training boys or young men for the army in any schools which might be established. It seemed to be the impression of the hon. and gallant Member that these boys would be at once turned out as non-commissioned officers. He had no intention of conveying such an idea, although he had alluded to a recommendation on that subject contained in the Report of the Commissioners. He entertained a sanguine hope, however, that by altering the constitution of Chelsea School and of the Hibernian School in Ireland, those two great establishments would be enabled to contribute well-educated and well-trained boys and young men to the army. All he had intended to say was that if a number of these well-trained young men joined the army every year, they would form a valuable class from whom non-commissioned officers might be selected. The hon. Member for Chatham had made some remarks respecting the unnecessary extent of the War Office establishment. That was one of the points which were now being investigated, and he was ready to confess that in his opinion the establishment might be beneficially reduced, both in regard to numbers and expense. He therefore did not feel disposed to express dissent from the remarks of the hon. Gentleman. Great complaints had also been made respecting the extent of the Staff in some of our colonial establishments, and here again he was not disposed to defend the existing state of things; for he believed that, in some cases, the Staff was larger than was necessary. He would now turn for a moment to the Motion of the hon. Gentleman, which he trusted would not be pressed to a division. The number of men in the West Indies and the Mauritius was smaller than it had been for several years, and the Government would not feel themselves justified in proposing any reduction. The hon. Member had represented him as saying that the establishment in the Mauritius had undergone a considerable reduction, but this was not the correct way of stating the case. What he said was that last year, owing to the pressure of a great calamity and to a dreadful amount of sickness prevailing in the island, discretionary powers to remove a portion of the troops were given to the commanding officer there. He did not think, however, that as a matter of public policy it was desirable to reduce the number of battalions in that island. The policy of the present—as of the last—Government is to endeavour to make the colonies bear a fair share of the expenses of the military establishments kept up in them. In conclusion, he appealed to the hon. Gentleman not to press his Motion to a division.

COLONEL STUART KNOX said, he wished to ask the right hon. Baronet, Whether he had taken into consideration the subject of granting pensions to the Quartermasters in the Militia in Ireland? There were, he believed, two quartermasters in Ireland who had been between fifty and sixty years in the service, and who could not retire because they would not be entitled to pensions. Thus the service was burdened with men who could not efficiently discharge their duty. In justice to them something ought to be done. He might add that their actual income was only £115 a year, including lodging money.

LORD ELCHO said, he would beg to ask the right hon. Baronet, Whether he could state to the Committee the exact number of arms which had been converted up to the present date; and, also, what the cost of each of the boys to whom the right hon. Baronet alluded was to be?

MR. H. E. SURTEES said, he was not sure whether the hon. Member for Chatham (Mr. Otway) wished that the troops should be removed from the West Indies, or merely that the cost of maintaining them should devolve on the local authorities. In the latter event a fresh burden would be imposed on those islands, which had suffered so immensely for years past; and to show the inexpediency of withdrawing the troops it was only necessary to refer to what occurred in Jamaica two years and a half ago.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, that with reference to the Question of the hon. and gallant Member for Dungannon (Colonel Stuart Knox), at present he had no intention of proposing any change with regard to quartermasters' pensions in Ireland. He was not able at that moment to reply to the Question of the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho) as to the number of arms that had been converted. With reference to the supply of trained boys, he was sanguine enough to believe that he should be able to procure them without great expense.

MR. OTWAY concurred in the desirableness of withdrawing the Amendment; but nothing that he had heard had at all altered his opinion as to the propriety of withdrawing our troops from the colonial out-stations, which now absorbed so great a number of them. It seemed to be a singularly difficult thing to make any reduction in the Estimates. At first he attempted to reduce the amount of expenditure, and to-night he attempted to reduce the number of men. But he could see the force of his right hon. Friend the Member for Oxfordshire's objection to a reduction of the number of men, and under these circumstances he did not think it would be right to put the Committee to the trouble of dividing.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

2. 880 Native Indian Troops.
3. £4,249,200, Pay and Allowances, Land Forces, at Home and Abroad.
4. £892,500, Commissariat Establishment, &c.

MR. OTWAY hoped the right hon. Baronet would now report Progress, as he believed the hon. and gallant Member for Lichfield (Major Anson) had something to say on this Vote.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK moved, that the Chairman report Progress.

House resumed.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow; Committee to sit again upon Wednesday.

E

MARINE MUTINY BILL

(Mr. Dodson, Mr. Corry, Lord Henry Lennox.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
That the Bill be now read a second time.—(Mr. Corry.)

MR. OTWAY said, he believed the Bill had not yet been printed, and he thought it was too late to discuss it on this occasion. He intended to raise a very important question—namely, the infliction of corporal punishment. He believed the Bill contained a clause enacting an application of corporal punishment, and he therefore asked the House to pause before reading the Bill a second time. He appealed to the right hon. Gentleman, on the grounds of the rights of Members not to discuss the second reading of a Bill which Members had not read.

MR. CORRY said, it was not usual to print the Marine Mutiny Bill previous to its being read a second time and considered in Committee. Any objection which the hon. Member might have to the Bill could be brought forward in Committee if he could now assent to its being read a second time.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH objected to the principle of putting off opposition to measures until they got into Committee. It was part of the vicious system of which he had before complained. He also objected to the Bill being read a second time until Members had been furnished with copies of it.

COLONEL W. STUART said, he held in his hand two copies of the Bill.

Motion agreed to; Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE (SCOTLAND) BILL.—[Bill 29].

(The Lord Advocate, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir James Fergusson.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

MR. KINNAIRD said, that this was probably the last opportunity which the Scotch Members would have of learning from the Government whether they intended to go into Committee upon the Bill before Easter. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had, in his Irish Reform Bill, departed from one of its cardinal principles—that of no disfranchisement; and it would save the Scotch representatives a great deal of trouble if the right hon. Gentleman would state whether he would carry out this principle of no disfranchisement in the case of the Scotch measure, and give Scotland increased representation in the manner specified in the Instruction of the hon. Member for Montrose. He should like to hear the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman upon the subject.

COLONEL STUART KNOX said, it was the factious opposition of hon. Gentlemen opposite which had prevented the right hon. Gentleman bringing forward the Scotch and Irish Reform Bills. On this occasion, however, the hon. Member had been justly rewarded by seeing the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone) postponed, it being now later than half-past twelve, after which time the right hon. Member had said that he would not propose its third reading.

Committee deferred till Monday, 20th April.

REGISTRATION OF WRITS (SCOTLAND)

BILL. (Lords.) [Bill 62.]

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
That the Bill be now read a second time.—(The Lord Advocate.)

MR. KINNAIRD thought the House was entitled to some explanation of the Bill, which had been often proposed in previous Sessions and as often successfully resisted. He believed that it was now sought, by a great addition to the expenses of the country, in the shape of a wholesale pensioning of existing officials, to carry a measure which was regarded as unnecessary by the majority of his countrymen.

THE LORD ADVOCATE assured the hon. Gentleman that he must have made a mistake with regard to this Bill. It had passed the House of Lords, but had never as yet been the subject of discussion in the House of Commons. It simply abolished the privilege which some persons now possessed of taking documents out of the Registry House—a privilege the continuance of which was deemed inadvisable; but it did not propose the appointment of any new officials, or provide for the pensioning of any members of the existing staff.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday, 23rd April.

COMPULSORY CHURCH RATES ABOLITION BILL.—[BILL 72].

(Mr. Gladstone, Sir George Grey, Sir R. Palmer.)

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

MR. GLADSTONE said, that an engagement had been entered into not to press the Motion after half-past twelve. The hon. Gentleman the Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate), who was in his place, would, he presumed, object to its being proceeded with, in which case he would fix it for to-morrow.

MR. NEWDEGATE objected to the Bill being pressed, as it had only been delivered that morning.

Third Reading deferred till To-morrow.

GRAND JURY PRESENTMENTS (IRELAND).

NOMINATION OF SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. VANCE moved the addition of the names of Mr. Agar-Ellis and Captain Archdall to the Committee of seventeen already nominated upon the above question. He did so on the ground that Ulster had not been properly represented on it.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Select Committee on Grand Jury Presentments do consist of Nineteen Members."—(Mr. Vance.)

COLONEL STUART KNOX, as an Amendment, moved to substitute the name of Mr. Vance for Sir John Gray, on the ground that the North of Ireland was not sufficiently represented on the Committee.

THE O'CONOR DON opposed the enlargement of the Committee to nineteen Members, believing that it was already inconveniently large. He had selected the names of the Committee with great care, and they had met the approval of the noble Earl the Chief Secretary for Ireland and the Members for the County of Dublin.

MR. VANCE hoped, that one of the names, at all events, he proposed would be assented to by the hon. Gentleman.

SIR JOHN GRAY moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Sir John Gray.)

The House divided:—Ayes 17; Noes 18: Majority 1.

Original Question again proposed.

THE O'CONOR DON then moved the adjournment of the House.

Whereupon Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—(The O'Conor Don.)

MR. VANCE said, he would not put the House to the trouble of another division; but would postpone his Motion until to-morrow.

Motion and Original Question, by leave, withdrawn.

PERTH AND BRECHIN PROVISIONAL ORDERS CONFIRMATION BILL.

On Motion of The LORD ADVOCATE, Bill to confirm certain Provisional Orders under "The General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862," relating to the burghs of Perth and Brechin, ordered to be brought in by The LORD ADVOCATE, Mr. Secretary GATHORNE HARDY, and Sir JAMES FERGUSSON.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 74.]

PETTY SESSIONS AND LOCK-UP HOUSES, &c. BILL.

On Motion of Sir JAMES FERGUSSON, Bill to amend the Law relating to places for holding Petty Sessions and Lock-up Houses, &c., ordered to be brought in by Sir JAMES FERGUSSON, and Mr. Secretary GATHORNE HARDY.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 75.]

House adjourned at One o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, March 24, 1868.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading— (£362,898 19s. 9d.) Consolidated Fund; Education (53).

Second Reading—Fairs (Ireland)* (47); Poor Relief (39).

THE NEW PUBLIC OFFICES.

QUESTION.

LORD REDESDALE wished to ask, Whether any Arrangements have been made for proceeding in the present Year with the Buildings for Public Offices on the vacant Ground adjoining Downing Street; and, whether Plans have been prepared for the Occupation of the Ground in Parliament and King Streets (for the Purchase of which Powers have been obtained from Parliament) by Buildings in connection with those already proposed or otherwise, or for the Completion of the

Downing Street Front of the Council Office? Their Lordships and the inhabitants of the metropolis must regret to see these buildings and the piece of ground adjoining Downing Street unoccupied for so long a period. The ground having been purchased between King Street and Parliament Street, so as to get a new frontage and widen that part of Parliament Street; he believed that no plans had yet been prepared for the occupation of that ground. With regard to the arrangement of public offices, very large sums were being paid in rent for highly inconvenient places, while these large vacant spaces remained unbuild upon. He wished also to direct attention to the state of the buildings and arrangements between the offices facing Whitehall and those in connection with the buildings of the Foreign Office and India Office. He believed there would be extreme difficulty in making those buildings complete, unless Downing Street were stopped up, and unless a passage were carried through an archway. Under these circumstances, he wished to know whether any plans had been prepared for the erection of these buildings, and also how those offices were to be appropriated? He was told that it was intended to pull down the Colonial Office before any new offices were built for the transaction of the business. Now that the Foreign Office had got a new building the other office was to be transferred to the place which had been occupied by the Foreign Office. He thought this was very bad economy, and objectionable in many respects. According to the present arrangements, if they widened Parliament Street they would only widen the north end, leaving the other half nearest the bridge without any widening at all. This would not be creditable to the Government, and would be inconvenient in many ways to the public.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, that if we had the advantage of possessing in London a Prefect like Baron Haussmann he would no doubt beautify this town in the same way that he had done the city of Paris. Under the rules of our Constitution this, however, was quite impossible, and one of the first virtues we must exercise was that of patience. The only information he could give his noble Friend was that the vacant space between the new Foreign Office and Parliament Street was to be built upon for the Colonial Office, and that Mr. Scott was to be the architect. The frontage of the new buildings, for the foundation of which £10,000 had been voted, and which was sufficient for the present financial year, would extend rather further than King Street, and not so far as Parliament Street, so that Parliament Street would be widened at that point. His noble Friend truly said they would then have a street much wider at the north end than at the south; but, of course, they looked forward to the country buying the rest of the ground between Charles Street and George Street, facing St. Margaret's Church and Westminster Abbey, and then the new street would be carried on with the public buildings in one uniform line. The House of Commons had, however, not yet granted the necessary funds for this expenditure. With respect to the frontage opposite the vacant ground of the Privy Council Office, that was no doubt completely obscured at present; but he had no doubt that plans would be prepared to alter that defective appearance. It was not for one Government to find fault with another on this matter. They all wished to see the public offices suitably completed for the sake of the appearance of the metropolis. But they could only work with the materials they possessed, and it rested with the House of Commons to say what expenditure it would devote to the purposes alluded to by his noble Friend.

Lord Redesdale

VISCOUNT HALIFAX wished to know, Whether the buildings on the other side of Charles Street were to be proceeded with?

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, that the Home Office, as well as the Colonial Office, was to be built on the vacant ground to which the noble Lord (Lord Redesdale) had referred; but that no plan had been determined upon at present for building on the ground on the other side of Charles Street.

LORD REDESDALE said, there would be nothing more miserable than a Vote of £10,000 for the foundation of the building. What was the use of laying out money in dribblets in this way? The Government were paying a high rent for the house in which the business of the Foreign Office had lately been transacted, and it was now to be occupied by the Colonial Office. The whole arrangement seemed to him to be most unfortunate. They had gone to enormous expense in purchasing this ground for public offices, and now instead of building upon it they were paying very high rents for other buildings. The Government bought this land piecemeal, and the result was that, as each purchase increased the value of the ground adjoining, they had to pay an improved value for every subsequent purchase. He hoped that some Member of the other House would take up that subject, and deal with it in a more efficient manner than it would be possible for their Lordships to do, so that credit still might at length be done in the matter.

EDUCATION BILL.—[H.L.]

PRESENTED. FIRST READING.

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH rose to call the attention of their Lordships to the subject of Public Elementary Education. The noble Duke said, My Lords, I rise for the purpose of bringing before your Lordships the important subject of which I have given notice, which has occupied the anxious attention of Her Majesty's Government, and to which I now entreat your Lordships' calm and patient attention. On a matter of this importance I cannot do better than commence by quoting a passage from Her Majesty's Speech at the opening of Parliament. Her Majesty said, she trusted that Parliament "would approach the subject of popular education with a full appreciation both of its vital importance and its acknowledged difficulty." My Lords, there is scarcely any subject which ought to be so tenderly treated as that of education. Whether we consider its vital consequences, or whether we consider the vast amount of feeling and voluntary efforts that is enlisted in its support, we must upon every side acknowledge that it is one in which the minds of very many persons are deeply interested, and therefore, if we should take a false step, or arrive at a hasty conclusion, we might commit an irretrievable error, and we might, instead of forwarding those objects which we must all have at heart, retard the progress of elementary education in this country, and do irremediable mischief. Many are the advantages which follow from the conflict of parties in this country. It cannot be doubted that these conflicts are productive, to a great extent, of public freedom and the elucidation of truth, and are, upon the whole, conducive to wise and prudent legislation; but if there ever were a subject upon which I might claim and entreat that the views of public politics might be laid aside, and that the hatchet of discord might be buried, it is upon this subject of public elementary education. I believe that many of your Lordships will coincide in that opinion, more especially as noble Lords opposite have at the present moment raised a question of vast importance, and one which will occupy party discussion for some considerable time to come. I trust your Lordships will approach this subject free from these party feelings, and that you will give to it your unbiassed consideration, with a view to the promotion of the real interests of the country. The Government, in considering this question—one to which they felt their attention was imperatively called—have felt that, in order to propose any measure to Parliament which should be of a satisfactory character, it would be necessary not to look merely at one phase of it, or that which embodied or embraced its most salient features, but to take a view of the whole subject, and that whatever measure the Government might propound for the consideration of Parliament, it ought to bear upon the face of it something of the character of a national system—a system which might become a part of the permanent legislation of the country. Your Lordships are aware that we are not for the first time beginning to deal with this question—we are not, as it were, attacking a desert ground, or implanting a system of education in this country; our task is to review what is now in existence, and to endeavour to frame a plan which shall be the foundation of a national system. In bringing this question before your Lordships, it is necessary that I should trespass for some time on your time and patience, for the purpose of stating what may be assumed to be the present state of education in this country. In asking you to change to some extent the present system, it is only fair to consider at the outset what is that system, and what are the wants which we have to supply. Now, in the discussions which have taken place on this subject, the Report of the Royal Commissioners of 1861 seems to me to have been strangely overlooked, yet I do not suppose a more exhaustive investigation was ever made into any subject than was made into education by that Commission, commonly known as the Duke of Newcastle's Commission. According to that Report, the number of children whose names ought at that date, in proportion to the population, to have been on the school books, was 2,655,767; while the actual number on the books was 2,535,462, showing a deficiency of 120,305 who were supposed to be without any school instruction whatever. They added that 321,768 of the 2,535,462 were above the condition of those commonly comprehended in the term poorer classes, and therefore were beyond the range of their inquiry. Deducting these from the number on the school books, there remained 2,213,694 children of the poorer classes who were then receiving elementary instruction in day schools. They then compared these figures with the proportion in foreign countries—particularly in Prussia, which is supposed to have attained great results in consequence of the operation of a compulsory system—and they reported that whereas in that country 1 in 6 of the population attended school, in England 1 in 7 or 1 in 8 of the population were at school. They proceeded to point out the remarkable progress which had been made since the commencement of the present century. They stated that in 1803 the estimated number of day scholars was 24,241, or 1 in 17½ of the population; in 1818, 674,883, or 1 in 17¼; in 1833, 1,276,947, or 1 in 11¼; and in 1851, 1,144,378, or 1 in 8.36; while in 1858, according to their own Returns, the proportion was 1 in 7.7. With this statement before us we cannot deny that great progress has been made in education, and I think we should be committing a very great error if we should run away with the notion that the wants which have to be supplied are so great as to demand any violent or extraordinary remedy. I believe those wants are being investigated, and will become fully known; but I deem it right to combat the idea that the educational wants of this country are so enormous as have been represented, for such statements give the go-by to all those efforts which have been and are being made throughout the country. I will now refer to a more recent Return obtained by the National Society, which is accustomed to prosecute a decennial inquiry into the state of education in Church of England schools, and the results which have lately been disclosed are, on the whole, very satisfactory. It is true that they relate exclusively to Church schools, but the position occupied by the Church of England in the field of education is such that the statistics of these schools afford a very good criterion of what is being generally done for the promotion of education. I will take three specimens of counties, which I have selected more or less at random out of this Return, to show the progress that has been made. First of all, taking an agricultural county, Berkshire, I find that in 1856-7 the number of day scholars at Church of England schools was 15,125; in 1866 it was 18,469; or in the former year 1 in 11.2, in the latter 1 in 9.7 of the population. In the county of Chester, which is partly agricultural and partly manufacturing, I find that in 1856 the number of children at those schools was as 1 in 17 of the population; in 1867 it was as 1 in 14. Taking a county which is the type of a great manufacturing one, where perhaps the Church might be supposed to have less influence and educational establishments to be less prominent than in other and more agricultural counties, I find that in Lancashire, in 1856, the proportion of children in Church Schools was as 1 in 23; in 1866 it was as 1 in 19. These Returns show the great progress which has been made with regard to Church of England schools. I will not detain your Lordships at any length by quoting more extracts than may be necessary; but there is one which I would wish to read with regard to Cheshire, in which Returns have been obtained, not only from Church of England, but also from undenominational and Non-conformist sources. The statement of the National Society with respect to that county is this—

“Returns to the National Society’s statistical survey have been received from all the parishes and ecclesiastical districts in Cheshire except eight. Eighteen parishes are destitute of Church, national, or parochial week-day schools; three, however, of these have dames’ or cottage schools, four are provided with education in schools in neighbouring parishes, while in the remaining eleven parishes there are, so far as the Returns show, no Church week-day schools of any kind, nor do the Returns specify the means, if any, by which the children obtain education. A complete numerical statement of week-day education at this moment in Cheshire is easily attainable. In Church week-day schools there are, as ascertained by actual enumeration, 36,970 scholars; in Roman Catholic week-day schools there are at the present time 5,669; in Wesleyan (Old Connexion) week-day schools 4,382; in British and all other week-day schools in Cheshire, under committees, there were in 1858, as ascertained by the Royal Commissioners, 6,291 scholars, which for the present time is, of course, much under the actual numbers. The total number, therefore, in all week-day schools under committees is 53,312. But the scholars in private adventure week-day schools must be added. Taking the proportion of such scholars to those in schools under committees, as ascertained by actual enumeration by the Royal Commissioners, and adding the result—namely, 27,377—to the above-mentioned 53,312, the total number of children in week-day schools of every description in Cheshire may be safely taken at not less than 80,689, which in a population of

The Duke of Marlborough

536,364 for Cheshire, as estimated by the Registrar-General in December, 1886, gives a proportion of 1 week-day scholar to every 6·6 of the entire population of the county."

That may be considered a somewhat favourable statement, but it is one to which some attach very considerable importance, and which we may fairly enlist as an argument in support of the contention that the state of education throughout the country, though deficient in some respects, is not so deficient as to call for those alarming and perhaps over-strong measures which have been proposed in order to afford a complete and efficient remedy. In looking at the various modes in which it is proposed to supply the educational wants of the country, there are three heads under which we are brought to consider them. The first of these is that great system which is already in operation—namely, that of voluntary efforts aided by Government grants; the second is that system which may be applicable to the same ends, either in substitution for the first or as auxiliary to it—namely, a system of voluntary initiation which, instead of being supported by public and private subscriptions, would be maintained by public rates; and the third would be one which would depend more upon Government action. Instead of leaving the initiation with respect to education to individuals, it would throw it rather upon the central Government, which should take under its cognizance the general educational wants of the country, and of itself apply the remedy, if not applied by local and private efforts. I am bound at the outset, in stating the views of Her Majesty's Government to your Lordships, to say that we have had very fully under our consideration the second of these systems—namely, that of providing for education by means of voluntary efforts aided out of the public rates. My Lords, it is impossible to deny that there are great difficulties connected with the adoption of that system. I do not say that such a system may be ultimately impossible. I do not deny that hereafter, perhaps, if all efforts fail, it may be necessary that some such system be put in practice. But I think I am bound to state the great difficulties which encounter such a proposal—difficulties which it is impossible not to recognize, which it would be the extreme of impolicy to ignore, and which any Government framing a measure for the public benefit would fail in its duty if it did not take into its most serious consideration.

In drawing your Lordship's attention to this subject I must again advert to those very valuable investigations which were conducted by the Duke of Newcastle. The subject of local parochial rating was one to which the Commissioners directed their especial attention, and the conclusions they came to are contained in this passage—

"It is undoubtedly true that a compulsory system of parochial rating would establish school buildings, and supply the means of payment for education in all parts of the country more rapidly than any other system. But though these advantages are great, they would not necessarily secure the means of imparting a good education, there is no reason to doubt that they might be obtained, though not so immediately, by a different method; and the very fact of their being gained immediately might give rise to the evils which attend upon the premature establishment of a system for which the country is not prepared. Parishes are, indeed, seldom unprovided with school buildings, though they often require improvement; and little would be done, either by an increase of buildings, or even of educational funds, unless it were accompanied by the establishment of an efficient system, unless the management were placed in the best hands, and unless security were taken for the ability of the master and the energy of his teaching."

My Lords, they sum up their objections to the local parochial system of rating under the heads, first, of want of local interest. They say that—

"Rates are also a proper fund for expenses in respect of which it is desirable to exercise vigilant and minute economy, and they are accordingly charged with the support of paupers. The support of a good school does not fall under either of these heads. No doubt it is a matter of immediate local interest and advantage, but it is not at present felt and acknowledged to be so by the great majority of persons contributing to the rate. The whole history of popular education in England shows that the contrary is the truth. What has been done towards its advancement has been done by a charitable and enlightened minority, assisted by the Government."

That goes to the point of the initiation of schools depending upon local rating and the will of the ratepayers. They then go on to state what will be patent to most of your Lordships, that if we look to the administration of rates generally it is not characterized by that liberality which would be necessary to secure a supply of good and efficient schools. There is another point also to which they draw attention, and that is with regard to the appointment of teachers. On this point they say—

"The experience of the majority of workhouse schools leads us to fear that the consequence of putting the management of the schools into the hands of the parochial bodies would be that the teachers and pupil teachers would in a great measure cease to be employed, and that the whole standard of elementary education would be lowered. There exist, indeed, some excellent schools for pauper children; but in most cases it is only under pressure from the Poor Law Board that the Boards of Guardians have been induced to appoint competent teachers. When left to themselves, they almost always made unsatisfactory appointments; and though there are special difficulties connected with pauper education, the way in which it has been generally managed by the Boards of Guardians is certainly not encouraging as evidence of the fitness of similar bodies to undertake the management of elementary schools."

There is another difficulty which I must mention, and that is the religious one. We know, my Lords, how strong is the feeling that religion should always form a part of elementary education. I believe that is a feeling so engrained in the minds of the people of this country that nothing can remove it, and I fear that no system of education that could be proposed would be likely to be accepted or be successful in its application if it ignored that great fact upon which the Church of England and the dissenting communities alike insist—that religion should form part of the education of children. Bearing this feeling in mind, the Commissioners state that very great difficulties would arise if a system of general rating were adopted, which would involve questions relating to the management of schools in which religious matters would have to be entered into. They state that—

"The clergy of the Church of England look upon their own denomination as the established religion of the nation, and they would feel that that fact gave them a right to a leading part in the management of any general system of education established by the State. A large proportion of the Dissenters, on the other hand, disapprove any connection between the Church and the State, and entertain conscientious objections to conferring upon the clergy, as such, any official connection whatever with public education. If such position were conferred upon them by law, it could be felt to be exclusive, and the exercise of the powers which it conferred would be scrutinized with jealousy, and would be a constant occasion of bad feeling and disputes. If, on the other hand, it were withheld the clergy would feel themselves aggrieved, and would consider that the State had not recognized their claims. They would thus dislike the system, and would probably be reluctant to give to it that cordial co-operation which would be so important as to be almost indispensable to its success."

In the view of these difficulties, which presented themselves to the Commissioners in 1861, the plan they proposed was not one which derived funds from local rates. Looking to the difficulties of management, as well as the probable illiberality of ratepayers, they felt it absolutely necessary to spread their system over a wider area, and they proposed that whatever aid was to be given to schools deriving aid from the State should be given on the area of the county rate, and that the county rate should be the fund from which the payments should be made. But the Commissioners also kept in view the great fact that whatever was to be done should not in any degree interfere with the support given to schools by subscriptions and by the school pence, and that the aid given should supplement the funds thereby obtained together with the aid given by the State. How that system was likely to be received in Parliament, and what was the opinion of it entertained by the Government of that day, may be gathered from the words of Mr. Lowe, in reply to a question which was put to him when he was giving evidence before the Committee presided over by Sir John Pakington. The plan then under consideration, it should be remembered, was one likely to succeed, if any plan could succeed; it was one framed upon the largest, the most moderate basis, and one which, if they had thought it possible to carry, would have been certainly adopted by the Government of that day. But your Lordships shall hear what was Mr. Lowe's answer when asked why it was not carried out. The question was—

"Have you ever considered whether the extension of education throughout the country might be assisted by any form of local organization?"

"Answer.—Yes, in the form which was suggested to us in the Report of the Royal Commissioners, when it was thought that it would be proper to form county boards, and to have a sort of supplementary agency out of the county rate. We decided that that plan was impracticable; we thought it would be impossible to persuade the House of Commons to agree to it."

Mr. Lowe afterwards added in the House of Commons—

"That being so, I am not, I confess without my doubts as to the figure I should make if I were to come down to the House and propose to impose this burden on the county rates, and I should, I must admit, much prefer that the task devolved on some one else."

That was his opinion as to the feasibility of the moderate plan proposed at the time. Since then a different system has been put forward. The result of the Commissioners' Report was the production of the Revised Code. By means of that Code the aid which the Commissioners contemplated giving out of the county rate was granted from the public Exchequer, and it was supposed that by this system of paying for results, in addition to subscriptions and the school pence, an average of 15s. per child would be provided for the purposes of national education. What has been proposed now in view of a general system of rating? It would not be proposed, as in 1861, to allow rates to supplement that which was already in existence in relief of the public funds, but it would be proposed to establish rates in lieu of private subscriptions, and in many cases the school pence. Now, I will trouble your Lordships with a remarkable Return which has been prepared for me showing what these local efforts are, and what is the amount of school pence under the present system, which, in these two particulars, would be almost entirely superseded if you adopted a system of general rating. From this Return I find that in the purely agricultural counties there are 2,010 schools, with an average attendance in the year ending August 31, 1867, of 195,136 scholars; the average amount of school pence paid per scholar is 6s. 7½d., and the average amount of voluntary contributions per scholar is 9s. 5½d.; the total being £64,478 5s. 5d. a year of school pence, and £92,103 7s. 7d. of voluntary subscriptions. In the manufacturing districts, the average school pence per child was 9s. 4½d., and the average private subscriptions 5s. 5d., making a total of £100,256 1s. 1d. in school pence, and £57,810 3s. 10d. voluntary contributions, showing a much larger amount of school pence and a smaller amount of voluntary contributions than in the agricultural counties. In the mixed districts, the school pence averaged 7s. 10½d. per child; the voluntary contributions, 8s. 8½d.; showing a total of £74,625 6s. 2d. in school pence, and £82,259 12s. 11d. in voluntary contributions. This was for the Church of England schools. In the British schools, the average of school pence per child was 10s. 7½d.; voluntary contributions, 5s. 8½d.; giving a total amount paid in school pence of £94,989 13s. 3d. and in the voluntary contributions, £50,843 17s. 1d. The Roman Catholic schools showed an average of 4s. 11½d. per child in school pence, and 6s. 2½d. in voluntary contributions: making £13,674 6s. 10d. paid in school pence, and £17,118 5s. 8d. in voluntary contributions. The grand total for England and Wales is—average school pence per child, 8s. 4½d.; average voluntary contributions per child, 7s. 6½d.; total school pence, £390,907 13s. 11d.; total voluntary contributions, £351,598 8s. 4d. My Lords, I contend that in the face of these facts it would not be proper to establish any system that would have the slightest risk of imperilling the continuance of those great efforts which show how strongly impressed are the minds of both parents and benevolent persons throughout the country with the value of education, and how, in fact, this feeling has created and maintains a most inestimable system at the present day. No doubt, other plans have been proposed. The noble Earl opposite (Earl Russell) brought in a Bill in 1855 for rating in boroughs; and many years ago Sir John Pakington proposed to introduce a general system of rating. All these plans invariably had in view the desirability of not imposing a system of rating upon those schools which did not wish to put themselves in union; but, at the same time, they devised a plan by which certain school unions might be created; certain schools putting themselves in union with other schools, and becoming participators in the rate. That might have been very well and plausible in theory, but the result must inevitably have been that the system would in a short time have absorbed all schools into its action, and have destroyed the voluntary contributions received in the district. Few people, when obliged to pay rates for educational purposes, will be inclined to contribute by voluntary subscription towards the same object. The result will be that these subscriptions will fall off. Schools before supported by voluntary aid will compare the flourishing rate-aided schools with their own; they will abandon the system of voluntary effort and self-management under which they have hitherto existed, and will be driven by a process of starvation to come into union. If that is done, we shall have come to that system of local rating which the Commissioners of 1861, after lengthened inquiry and patient consideration, declared to be inadmissible and detrimental to the best interests of education. The only other point I have to notice is the plan proposed of raising rates over limited areas, and merely for local purposes. Here we are met with a very great difficulty in regard to what shall be the denomination of the schools. I see no conclusion, no escape out of the difficulty that would be created by such a plan, other than that of the schools being secular schools. That is the proposal made by the right hon. Gentleman

(Mr. Lowe) who has, I think, fairly viewed the difficulties of this position. He has seen that if you have schools supported by local rates, whether they be few or many, it would be exceedingly difficult to escape from the position that they must be secular schools. I do not think we are at present prepared to adopt a system of purely secular schools supported out of public rates. The noble Earl opposite (Earl Russell), in the proposals he has made from time to time in regard to the provision for education in boroughs, has made out a very strong case for the adoption of remedial measures. The case of boroughs, however, is to a great extent different from that of rural districts. In boroughs you have teeming populations of children in conditions of life to which they are rarely subjected in rural districts. Let it not be forgotten that in boroughs the case presents great pecuniary difficulties. In boroughs, the burdens already imposed upon the ratepayers are very great, and of an increasing character. The burdens which press very heavily on the ratepayers include the poor rates, borough rates, lighting and watching rates, general district rates, rates levied by Improvement Commissioners, burial rates, water rates, and, in some instances, church rates. By way of illustration, I may state that they amount to the sums named in these boroughs: — Blackburn, 3s. 2d. in the pound; Devonport, 5s. 3d.; Gateshead, 7s. 0½d.; King's Lynn, 5s. 11d.; Poole, 6s. 4½d.; and Plymouth, 6s. 11½d. The pressure of administrative burdens is, in many instances, augmented by the interest upon the large sums which the boroughs have from time to time borrowed for local improvements. It may not be altogether in form to allude to a speech made in the other House of Parliament a few days ago by a right hon. Gentleman who has paid the greatest possible attention to the subject. Mr. Goschen states that, out of 211 corporate boroughs in 1856, 169 made returns, and in 1866 only 75 did so. From these he gathered that in Bolton the borough rate had risen from £7,500 in 1857 to £10,500 in 1866; that the debt had risen in the same period from £188,000 to £270,000; that in Warrington the borough rate had increased from £6,000 to £10,000; and that Bradford, Birmingham, Oldham, and one or two other towns exhibited similar results. Sanitary measures are being pressed upon corporate authorities. Under Acts that are passed and passing they will be obliged to incur considerable outlay; it may therefore be inferred that the burdens on borough ratepayers, even the poorest, are on the increase; and it therefore becomes a serious matter to propose any augmentation of the burdens borne by the inhabitants of populous places. We have already various educational enactments, such as the Industrial Schools Act, which applies to boroughs and rural districts, the Reformatory Schools Act, and Workhouse Acts, by which children are educated in workhouses out of the rates. The Industrial Schools Act may be extended, and the necessities of the country may hereafter require a further resort to rates in the interests of education; but under present circumstances we should be exceeding our duty if we proposed any additional compulsory burden for the purposes of education. There is another reason why we should pause before we make such a proposal. It is well known that there is a very large amount of property in charitable endowments, and there ought to be no delay in enquiring how far these charitable endowments may be made applicable to education. From information furnished to me the other day by the Charity Commissioners, I find they consider that about £160,000 a year of charity income may be applied to the purposes of elementary education. The amount already applied to schools is over £1,000,000 a year. The value of many charities injuriously applied in gifts to persons who do not require relief will give another large sum, which may with advantage be applied to the purposes of elementary education. Having before us all these facts—the Report of the Commission of 1861 as to the difficulties of a general system of rating, the differences of opinion that exist upon the subject, and the impossibility that there would be of enforcing a system of compulsory attendance—I do not think that the country is ripe for either a partial or a general system of compulsory rating. Whatever future investigations may prove to be necessary, or future exigencies may prove to be desirable, the Government are not prepared now to propose a compulsory system. Having stated what we are not at present prepared to do, I will ask your Lordships' attention to that which we propose to do. I would first direct your Lordships' attention to that great system which has been in operation for nearly forty years promoting the education of the country. No one can consider the effects that system has produced, how it has won the national sympathies and popular estimation, how it has been the parent of all that has been accomplished in the way of education, without feeling that that plan was founded in great wisdom, and that it is worthy of being retained as part of a national system. In a remarkable summary of what has been effected by it, the Commissioners of 1861 say—

“Although essentially a voluntary system, and demanding great previous exertions as a condition of giving aid, it has within twenty years of its commencement either led to the foundation of or greatly improved 9,388 schools, or about two-fifths of the entire number of existing public schools, which contain 1,101,545 scholars, or about half the number now under instruction in the whole country. It assists largely in supporting thirty-two training Colleges, the greater number of which it helped to establish; and while the Government has itself expended on national education, in round numbers, £4,400,000, it has been met by voluntary subscriptions to the amount of £8,800,000. Its system of inspection has raised the standard of education, and by the careful training of its teachers, and, above all, by the introduction of pupil-teachers, it has supplied the best means for teaching in schools.”

Passing on to a more recent date, I will quote figures bearing upon the same results from a remarkable pamphlet by Sir James Kay Shuttleworth. Speaking of the Minutes of 1846, which gave a permanent character and stamp to the Committee of Privy Council on Education, he says—

“A great impulse was thus given to the exertions of the religious bodies. The majority of them entered earnestly into this co-operation. The whole sum of the Parliamentary grants, which had amounted in the seven years between 1839 and 1846 to only £305,000, rose to an outlay of £6,405,862 in the sixteen succeeding years. The sum of the grants for building, enlarging, and furnishing schools amounted in 1866 to £1,608,100, and with this aid 6,801 schools, capable of accommodating 915,516 scholars, had been built. The annual grants towards the expenses of maintaining elementary schools since 1839 had become in the aggregate £5,297,210, of which £3,714,899 had been directly applied to the keeping up of an efficient staff of teachers. These aggregates represent only one-third of the actual expenditure, which exceeded £20,000,000. At the last annual inspection 1,234,491 scholars were present. The grants towards the support of training Colleges—which were in the ratio of two-thirds of the annual outlay—amounted in 1866 to £1,046,443. All notice of some small subordinate objects of expenditure is omitted. The cost of administration has been £912,647, of which the greater portion arose from the inspection and examination departments, by which the efficiency of schools was so greatly promoted.”

I will also trouble your Lordships with some figures, in order to show you what has been the aggregate amount contributed up to the present time by way of school pence and other private and voluntary subscriptions, in aid of the system administered by the Privy Council. And first of all I must state what is the number of scholars in attendance in schools aided by the State compared with the number who attend unaided schools. The number of public schools is now about 60 per cent of the whole, and therefore it will be seen that the proportion of one-half has been on the increase. Looking at the statement of the outlay for buildings, &c., from 1839 to 1867, I find that there has been granted out of the public purse £1,362,450, while there has been subscribed from local sources £3,126,442. In regard to normal schools there has been granted out of the public purse £118,627, whereas no less than £278,842 has been privately subscribed. And in regard to the annual expenditure of schools in the year 1867 the public purse granted £390,486, while the school pence and voluntary contributions amounted to £856,376. The total amount granted out of the public purse for buildings and maintenance amounted to £499,434, and the private contributions to £833,008. We must also bear in mind that the system already in existence has by no means done its work completely, for there are a number of unaided schools which require its assistance, and which ought to be gradually brought within its operation. It is estimated that on these private schools £453,885 is expended annually in the form of private contributions and school pence. My Lords, I have also figures which prove how steadily the system administered by the Privy Council has extended its operations from 1859 up to the present time. In 1859 it appears there were 5,531 institutions brought under its operation; but in 1867 this number had increased to 7,577. Again, in 1859 there were 5,225 certificated teachers employed in these schools, while in 1867 there were no fewer than 10,510. Then I find that in 1862-3 the number of voluntary contributors who subscribed £5 and upwards was 8,281; but in 1866-7 their number had swelled to 11,051. In the former year the number of voluntary subscriptions under £1 was 70,285; and in the latter 99,875. Therefore, in considering the present system, we are bound to ascertain how far it may be possible to make it a part of a national system, and also to discover its peculiar defects, which it will be the duty of Parliament and of the Government to remedy. In the first place, it cannot be denied that there is some disadvantage in the present system, from the fact of its being liable to change. The system of the Code is a complicated one, and although it is true that the Code is annually laid on the table of both Houses, yet, in point of fact, the changes annually introduced into it very often escape the observation of Parliament. There is also another point which the Government have under their consideration, and I trust your Lordships will give your most earnest attention to it. The administration of public education in this country is not carried on as it ought to be. The great defect of the existing system is that it is not initiative, but merely follows in the wake of voluntary efforts. Now, my Lords, it is impossible, looking to the vast importance of the Department of Education, not to be struck with the fact that it is desirable to make some change in this respect, either immediately or at no very distant date. At present, the Educational Department has not only to administer the Grant voted annually by Parliament—which is done by the Committee of Council on Education—but also to superintend the very large and increasing Science and Art Department. This system is capable of vast expansion, and I have no doubt that considerable demands will be made from time to time on the Government of the day to extend and develop it. For instance, new Museums, or portions of those now existing, may be transferred to that Department. In addition to this there is the great subject of Scotch education, which must shortly engage the attention of Parliament. Then there is the system of Irish education, which cannot be said to be at present in a satisfactory state. Practically, the Government has no control over the large grants annually voted by Parliament for Irish education. They are administered by a local Commissioner, who is not directly responsible to the Government. The endowed schools of Ireland likewise offer a wide field for legislation. These schools were reported on many years ago, but no action has yet been taken in the matter; and, coming to a later period, we find that the most voluminous Report of the Middle Class Schools Commission has lately been laid upon the table. On the present occasion I do not propose to go into that Report, which embraces subjects of the widest and most important character. It would, indeed, be impossible for any Department of the State to take up the matter, unless it were specially organized for the purpose, and unless there were persons appointed by the Crown to take this great subject under their cognizance, and to initiate measures on their own responsibility. Having fully considered the subject, Her Majesty's Government have come to the conclusion that there is enough work and a sufficiently large field of enterprise to engage the attention of a special Department of the State, and it is therefore the intention of the Government to propose that Parliament shall empower Her Majesty to appoint a Secretary of State who shall have the whole range of educational matters under his consideration and control. We propose that he shall not only administer the grants now administered by the Privy Council, but also, on his own responsibility, look into the various subjects connected with the education of the country, and propose to Parliament such schemes as he may think are calculated to promote the cause of national education. Therefore, the first change we propose is to enable the Crown to appoint an additional Secretary of State for the Educational Department. In making this change we feel that it would also be desirable to give a greater permanence and a greater degree of security to those conditions on which the Parliamentary Grant is distributed. We therefore propose to put into an Act of Parliament those portions of the Revised Code which relate to the terms on which the Grant is dispensed. The Revised Code, as far as regards the grants made in aid of education out of the public purse, has now been some time in operation. It has worked well and given satisfaction to the public; and I believe experience has shown that the rate at which the funds of the State are applied in assisting voluntary efforts and on the results of examinations is not excessive. We propose that Parliament and the country should have the security of knowing what is the amount of public money that will be given for the support of elementary education; and that any increase of that amount should be regulated, not by any change which may from time to time be proposed by the individual Minister, but simply by the increase in the number of schools gradually brought under the operation of the system. At the same time we also feel that there are certain other changes which will be of a very important and very useful character. The first of these to which I will allude is this. It has long been felt—and I will not detain your Lordships by going over the figures, for I fear I have detained you long enough—it has long been felt that there are a large number of schools in existence which do not partake of the public grants. It has been our endeavour to discover the causes that have prevented those schools from sharing in the grants, and I think that two main causes have operated to a great extent in that way. One of them is that there are a great many Nonconformist congregations who have a strong opinion that the State should have no connection whatever with religious teaching; that it ought not to inquire into and ought not in any way to promote the religious teaching of the schools. Those bodies are not themselves in favour of a system of secular education; they conduct their schools according to their own religious tenets, yet they at the same time feel that from their conscientious convictions they are shut out from participation in the public grants, and they have failed to apply for the public aid which is afforded to other schools in consequence of their belief that the State, in requiring a connection with some religious denomination as a condition of receiving a share of the grants, is interfering with that which ought to be left entirely to their own free and voluntary initiative. The number of bodies who have been thus excluded is very considerable. At the same time, if those bodies were enabled by any change in the system hitherto followed to avail themselves of the public grants, it appears that they would do so to a very large extent. Mr. Baines (who represents the views of a large number of Congregationalists) delivered recently an address on the subject of elementary education, in which he said—

The Duke of Marlborough

“Our primary schools are supported not for our own advantage, but for that of the classes who are less favoured by fortune; at least nine-tenths of the school hours are devoted to the indispensable branches of secular education, and the payments made by the Government are exclusively for the successful results of that secular teaching, ascertained by individual examination of the children. Ought we to cripple and destroy our schools rather than accept those payments? I honour the motives of those who reply in the affirmative, but my own deliberate and revised judgment answers in the negative. Our own subscriptions pay much more than that part of the expense which is entailed by the religious instruction, and I think we may properly receive aid out of the taxes to which we ourselves have contributed for the teaching of reading, writing, and arithmetic to the children of our poorer fellow-countrymen. . .

There can be no doubt that the intention of the Minutes of Council was to aid only schools in which religious instruction was given, and a school which is purely secular in its supporters and its teaching would be denied a grant. To this restriction and condition most, if not all, Congregationalists object,—not that they do not most highly value religious instruction, but that they think it ought not to be forced upon day schools as the condition of receiving grants.”

My Lords, we have carefully considered the great change which has been made in the system of public grants by the Revised Code of 1861. That change established the principle that payments were to be made for the results shown by examination in secular subjects. Yet the noble Earl opposite, (Earl Granville) who is thoroughly conversant with this matter, will, I believe, bear me out when I say that in some of the schools, according to the management clauses, the Inspectors are bound to inquire into the religious instruction; while in regard to certain other schools they are not so bound. Therefore we feel that the great change introduced by the Revised Code in 1861 practically comes to this—that you do offer payment to the schools on the results of the secular teaching. We have therefore arrived at the conclusion that the modification which may be made in the Revised Code, as it will be embodied in the Bill which I shall have the honour of laying on your Lordships' table, should be to leave out the existing condition which requires all schools aided by the State to be in connection with some religious denomination. We propose to give payments for results in reference to the secular teaching alone. We propose that where the Inspectors are bound not to inquire into the religious teaching of the schools they shall continue not to inquire into it. At the same time, where the Inspectors do inquire into the religious teaching, according to the management clauses which have been the subject of so much controversy, and which have been settled, we do not propose to interfere with those clauses, but to let the investigation into the religious instruction of such schools continue to take place. But we have come to the conclusion that when a school offers itself to be inspected, complying with the conditions as to sanitary arrangements, space, and all other requisites prescribed for its due conduct and management—when such a school offers its scholars for examination, when it passes that examination in reading, writing, and arithmetic, and when it satisfies the other re-requirements as to certificated and pupil-teachers, it ought not to be denied the benefit of the Grant. But in order that no mistake should exist on this subject, which is one of great interest to those who feel the importance of connecting religious teaching with education, and which is especially important in regard to Church of England schools, we propose to insert in the schedule of the Bill the management clauses which relate to inspection both in respect to Church of England schools and the schools of all other denominations. In fact, the management clauses of the Church of England, of the Wesleyan, the Congregational, the Roman Catholic, the Jewish, and other schools will be embodied in the schedules of the Bill exactly as they stand and are at present used by those various bodies. The only change which will be made will be this, that if a purely secular school presents its scholars for examination, the State will not refuse to examine and pay for the results of their teaching. I believe that will cause a large increase in the applications for a share in the grants. We have reason to believe that the number of schools brought under inspection by that alteration will be very great, but it is now impossible fully to estimate them. They will be mostly schools promoted by the Nonconformist bodies. I believe the impulse which will thus be given to education amongst those bodies will be very great, because, owing to the religious scruples to which I have referred, they have hitherto failed to build schools and to exhibit that amount of educational enterprise which, when they feel that the assistance of the State is within their reach, they will undoubtedly display. The next point on which we feel that some change is desirable is in regard to the poorer districts. I have already spoken of the schools supported by bodies which are more or less wealthy, and which are not receiving State aid; but there is another class of schools—namely, those in the poorer and small rural districts. There we find at present existing a very large number of unaided schools. Sir James Kay Shuttleworth says—

“The unassisted public schools are far more numerous than those which are assisted, amounting to 15,952 schools, exclusive of 115 factory schools, containing 17,000 scholars, whereas the assisted public schools are only 6,897. They are inferior, however, in the number of the scholars; those on the books of the assisted public schools being 917,255, those on the books of the 15,952 unassisted public schools only 654,393. Some of these schools are unassisted because the managers or patrons reject assistance, either from religious scruples or because their patrons dislike interference. These obstacles, however, are comparatively rare, and are rapidly diminishing. The great cause which deprives schools of Government assistance is their non-performance of the conditions on which that assistance is offered, a non-fulfilment of which the principal causes are poverty, smallness of population, indifference, or, as it has been lately called, apathy.”

Now, it cannot be denied that some of the conditions which are imposed on schools seeking to obtain assistance from the State press somewhat severely on the small rural parishes; and we are led to the conviction that one principal cause of those schools not receiving Government aid, and of the difficulties which they experience, is the condition with reference to certificated teachers. We do not propose to abandon the system of certificates. We regard that system as of the most essential and vital importance. We are of opinion that if we were to abandon the system of certificates altogether a great part of the sum voted for public education would be wasted. One conclusive argument against such a change is the necessity of maintaining the pupil-teacher system. The system of certificates exists in almost every country that has placed the education of its people upon a satisfactory and intelligible basis—in France, Switzerland, Prussia, Germany, and Holland. In all these countries the conditions with respect to teaching are more strict and severe than in this country. In some of these countries no persons are allowed to teach, either in public or private schools, unless they hold a Government certificate. Another objection to abandoning the system of certificates is that we should thereby lose that guarantee for good character and morality which it is most essential that teachers should possess. While we wish to see this system of certificated teachers maintained, I do not think that what I am about to propose will impair its efficiency. A good many schools in small parishes find a difficulty in complying with the requirements of the certificated system. We propose to take a limit below which schools may receive a portion of the annual Grant without the employment of certificated teachers. I say “a portion,” because it would not be fair for them to receive the same proportion as the others. If the change we propose is carried out, it will not supplant the system of certificated teachers, but it would act as an inducement to those parishes, and enable them to start their schools, and when they have had experience of the advantages of the Government Grant, it will encourage them to obtain a larger share of the Grant. We propose to take the limit which is adopted in what is called Mr. Corry's Minute, which was laid before Parliament last year, and which gives a grant of 1s. 4d. per head for passing in an extra subject. That Minute requires that a pupil teacher shall be maintained for every forty scholars after the first twenty-five, instead of after the first fifty, as in other schools. The object of that Minute was to aid the smaller schools. We propose to take the same limit, and to direct that schools below sixty-five shall be enabled to apply for inspection. When the school Inspector has reported that a school is suitable to be inspected by reason of its cleanliness, its building, and its space, the school will be allowed to present its scholars for examination in reading, writing, and arithmetic, and to obtain payment of 2s. 8d. for each subject, the further amount of 4s. being only paid in schools which have a certificated master and mistress. This arrangement will, we trust, be the means of bringing many of the smaller schools into participation with the Parliamentary Grant. We also propose to make some addition to the Building Grant; and I will ask for the attention of your Lordships to a very remarkable Return on this subject. I find that in the year 1853 the Building Grant was 4s. per square foot of the school buildings. In 1860 it was reduced to 2s. 6d., and a very remarkable falling off ensued. Between 1850 and 1860 the Grant for building increased from £34,713 to £111,274. Between 1860, when the amount was reduced to 2s. 6d., and 1867, the amount fell off to £21,656. No doubt there were other causes to account for this reduction, because as so many schools had been built fewer remained to be erected. We consider, however, that it will be desirable to recur to the allowance of 4s. per foot for the Building Grant. Another change we propose to make regards evening schools. It is not very important, but we believe it will be of considerable benefit, as at present evening schools can only be inspected when they are held in the same premises as day schools which are already under inspection. We think that all evening schools which are properly reported upon, and which comply with the usual conditions, shall be open to inspection, and shall receive the grant whether they may be in connection with a day school or not. There is one other change of considerable importance. I refer to the Conscience Clause. Your Lordships are aware of what has hitherto been the practice in regard to the Conscience Clause. That has never been universally applied, except in cases where only one school can be supported in a parish, and where there is a sufficient proportion of Dissenters to make it apparent that their interests ought to be regarded. It was thought that a population of 900 and under could only support one school, and if it appears that one-sixth of the children at such school are the children of Dissenters, it has been thought equitable to apply the Conscience Clause in such cases. I think that where only one school is maintained in a parish the principle of a Conscience Clause is just and equitable. We think that the adoption of the Conscience Clause ought to depend upon there being only one school in a parish. We must remember that we are aiding denominational schools. We have never imposed, either upon the Church of England or upon the Wesleyans or the Dissenters, conditions that they were not disposed to accept. We have, on the contrary, desired to pay deference to their religious scruples. On the other hand, the Education Department, where only one school is maintained, in great part at the public cost, think that the Conscience Clause should be inserted in the deed. Objections, however, have been taken to the existing form of the Conscience Clause. I find, however, that the form has been taken from the Endowed Schools Act, which was passed with the sanction of the heads of the Church, and which enacts that—

The Duke of Marlborough

“The trustees or governors of every endowed school are from time to time authorized and bound ‘to make such orders as, whilst they shall not interfere with the religious teaching of other scholars as now fixed by statute or other legal requirement, and shall not authorize any religious teaching other than that previously afforded in the school, shall nevertheless provide for admitting to the benefit of the school the children of parents not in communion with the Church, sect, or denomination, according to the doctrines or formularies of which religious instruction is to be afforded under the endowment of the said school.’”

The Wesleyan school precedent was to the same effect. It provided that—“No child shall in any case be required to learn any catechism or other religious formulary, or to attend any Sunday school or place of worship, to which respectively his or her parent or guardian shall, on religious grounds, object; but the selection of such Sunday school or place of worship shall in all cases be left to the free choice of such parent or guardian, without the child thereby incurring any loss of the benefits or privileges of any school or schools the trusts whereof are hereby declared."

In the Jewish schools the clause is to this effect—

"The religious instruction in the said school to be given according to the principles of the Jewish religion, but not to be made compulsory upon any scholar whose parents do not profess that religion."

In the Free Church of Scotland it is provided that no child shall be required to "learn any catechism or other religious formulary" to which his parents or guardians may object. In the undenominational schools the same words are used—

"any catechism or other religious formulary." When, however, we come to the Church of England we find a grave distinction—namely, the insertion of the word "doctrine." The Conscience Clause in Church of England schools provides for the exemption of children whose parents may desire it "from attendance at the public worship, and from instruction in the doctrine or formularies of the said Church."

Now, it is felt, and I think with much justice, that the word "doctrine" is a word of so undefined a character, and may have such a wide range of meaning, that it is unfair to apply it to Church of England schools when it is not applied to others. If a child cannot be required to learn a catechism or formulary, everybody knows what the exemption is; but if it is laid down that a child shall not be instructed in the "doctrine" of the Church of England, we may exclude religious teaching from the school altogether, for it may be said that the great doctrines of the Trinity and the Atonement are doctrines of the Church of England, though they are held by most other religious bodies. Considering that other denominations which have never objected to the principle of a Conscience Clause have felt it necessary to avoid the employment of the word "doctrine," and considering that in the case of the Wesleyan schools it is expressly stated that religious instruction shall always form a part of the school teaching, I think it is unwise and unfair to insist on the use of the word in the case of Church schools. The Government have come to the conclusion—which we believe will be generally accepted by the public—that in those cases in which it is desirable upon public grounds that a Conscience Clause should be inserted in the trust-deed of a school, two great principles should be observed—liberty on either side, the liberty of teaching and the liberty of withdrawal. Carrying out these principles, it is important that we should have a definite form of clause, not subject to change according to the opinions of any set of men who may be in office, but sanctioned and ratified by an Act of Parliament, which shall express, with the authority of Parliament, what it is by which the children shall be bound, and to what liberty they shall be entitled. The form we propose will be applicable to all cases where only one school exists, its object being to provide that the religious teaching shall not be interfered with, and that every parent shall have liberty to withdraw his child from teaching from which he dissents. It is to this effect:—It provides that the Secretary of State shall not have power to interfere with the religious instruction given in any school towards which a building grant has been made, unless the school be the only one available for poor children residing within a convenient distance, or unless there be any considerable number of children for whom no more suitable means of education are likely to be provided, and whose parents are likely to object to the religious instruction intended to be given, or to the worship intended to be used. In that case the trust-deed must provide that no child resident within the assigned limits shall be excluded from the school or deprived of its benefits and privileges on account of the religious persuasion of the said child, or of the parent, guardian, or other person having the custody or care of it, or on account of the withdrawal of such child from any part of the instruction given or worship held therein under the provisions hereinbefore contained, and that no such child shall be compelled to attend any Sunday school, or church, or other place of worship on Sunday as a condition of receiving instruction on week days; and any such parent, guardian, or other person as aforesaid shall have a right to withdraw such child from any lesson given, or form of worship used, or religious instruction given, in such school, upon giving notice to the principal teacher of such school that he objects to such lesson, or form of worship, or religious service on religious grounds. That is the Conscience Clause we propose, and such are the principles by which we have been guided. It only remains for me to mention a concluding provision in the Bill which we think of great importance. Although we have not deemed it proper to provide for a compulsory system of rating or for compulsory attendance at school, we think the Secretary of State should have the power of obtaining accurate information respecting the educational wants of the country, so that it may be laid before Parliament, and may indicate what measures are necessary to provide for any well-defined want. The Educational Returns that have from time to time been made have been admittedly imperfect, and we propose that the Secretary of State shall have power to order an Educational Census to be taken in any specified district. He will have the power of fixing the limit of value of the houses within which all children under a certain age are to be returned, and of requiring information of what school they attend, and what system of instruction is pursued. These Returns will be collected by means of the Registrar General's Department, and we regard this as an important step for facilitating any educational action that may be called for in the future. Constituted as the present Department is, and presided over by the President of the Council, who has many varied duties to perform, it would be difficult to set on foot such inquiries; but the change we propose will remove any difficulty on this head. Such, my Lords, is the measure which the Government propose, and which I now beg to lay on the table. We do not consider that it is a complete measure, because under the present state of circumstances it would be very difficult to frame a complete measure. We believe that we are proposing that which will lay the foundation of an ample system of education. We propose to confirm and place in a definite shape that which is already in existence. We propose to create a Department which shall have the responsibility of initiating measures that may be for the benefit of the country, and we propose to put into the hands of the new Minister all those powers which will be necessary to enable him to perform those functions. I trust that the plan is one that will be found to work well, and that it will be admitted to be as much as under existing circumstances can be provided. The noble Duke concluded by laying the Bill on the table.

The Duke of Marlborough

EARL GRANVILLE : It will no doubt be more convenient to discuss the details of the Bill on the second reading ; but perhaps your Lordships will allow me to offer a remark on one or two points. For more than twenty years I have heard the complaint constantly preferred by the Opposition against the Ministry, that Bills of importance have not been produced in this House, so that they might be considered by us in reasonable time. I remember Lord Aberdeen remarking that for fifty years he had been familiar with the same complaint. Now, the noble Duke (the Duke of Marlborough) has presented a Bill which, though I am not quite sure I can call it a very important one, is a Bill on a most important subject, and he has given us a most legitimate mode of discussing the question of education, which I think this House is fully competent to do. I am bound, therefore, to thank him for having introduced it in this House. The noble Duke made an appeal to this side of the House not to treat the Bill in a party spirit. My desire is not to do anything of the kind. Over and over again I have stated, publicly and privately, that I thought Her Majesty's present Government have peculiar opportunities for dealing with this subject ; and I rejoiced, when I read the last Report collected by the noble Duke, that he had come into office at a time when the question was universally asked, whether we would allow the spread of primary education to become simply a question of time, or would adopt measures to accelerate it ? I rejoiced when I heard the emphatic sentiments on this subject which had been put into Her Majesty's mouth by Her Majesty's advisers, and I rejoiced still more when I read in the papers the declaration of Lord Stanley on the subject—though I am bound to say that Lord Stanley has been somewhat unfortunate in prognosticating the spirit of the measures which the Government with which he is connected were about to introduce—wherein he stated in such strong and unmistakeable words the educational measure about to be introduced. But as soon as the noble Duke began his very full description of the present state of things it was evident that some change had come over the intentions of Her Majesty's Government. I can hardly think that some of the most distinguished Members of Her Majesty's Government will be of opinion that this is the answer which ought to be given to that inquiry which the noble Duke so fully described as arising from all parts of the country—namely, “What are the measures to be taken to accelerate the progress of education?" Circumstances have contributed to make this question of education one of vital importance both to political and non-political persons. For my part I do not feel that the measure introduced by Her Majesty's Government, unless great alterations be made in it, will serve to give a satisfactory answer to that inquiry of the country. The noble Duke referred to the statistics of the Royal Commission with respect to the amount of education given in this country; but he referred to facts, the fallacy of which has already been pointed out. The noble Duke said that, while in Prussia, one in six of the population were educated, in England we had arrived at the rate of one in seven or eight. Well, that would be a very satisfactory advance, though I do not see why any difference should exist. But what are the facts of the case? In our account we estimate all that are on the roll, and also take into account the infant schools; but that is not the way the calculation is made in Prussia. The consequence is that, in reality, we stand with respect to Prussia, not as having 1 in 7 or 8 receiving education, but 1 in 15. The noble Duke asked us not to treat this question as a desert — not to destroy, but to supplement. In that sentiment I entirely agree. I quite admit all the good that the Minute of 1846 effected in the education of this country. I admit that a large number of schools have been brought under the system which otherwise would never have found admission, and that the great class of certificated schoolmasters has been created. There is no complaint against the Minute of Council; but when I came first into the Council the noble Earl (Earl Russell) and Lord Lansdowne told me that they did not consider the system as a really national one, but the object should be to stimulate and improve it. That has been done; but yet it is not a national system. I do not care whether you take 100,000 children here or 100,000 there, and add them to the number; for I say that it is impossible for any of us who have read the Reports of bodies who have examined the matter, not only in Manchester, but in other places—in the diocese of the right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of London) for example—not to see that the educational destitution is something quite alarming, whether we consider the present or the future of this country. What I want, therefore, is to supplement; but I say that the scheme of the noble Duke, however well-meant and broad in some points, will utterly fail. I think the noble Duke mentioned seven points in his scheme. The first thing which I regret to see is that it is proposed to convert the Revised Code into an Act of Parliament. I think that is a mistake. These Minutes have been changed every year, and certainly not without necessity. It is almost impossible that, in a system like this, some changes from time to time should not be needful. The noble Duke says that Parliament has no control over it, that though presented every year the public do not attend to it. I believe that is a perfect mistake. The Code is published, and all the alterations in it are marked; and I believe if there is one document presented to Parliament more examined than another it is this, which affects the pecuniary interests of some people in all the counties of England. This I will say, that if you convert this into an Act of Parliament you do more to stereotype the present state of things than by any course you could take. The second proposal, I think, was the creation of a Secretary of State for Education; but I would rather refer to that after I have gone through the other points. The third was with regard to additional grants for building schools. I believe that proposal is good. I am anxious that there should be great economy in the administration of the Parliamentary funds; but I think it is evident that when you have built schools in those parts of the country which are best able to pay for them there could be no objection to granting aid to those places which are not so well off. With regard to the Conscience Clause, I must thank the noble Duke for having adopted its principle. For myself, I should very much prefer to see that wherever aid is given by the State the Conscience Clause should be adopted. There is one proposal which I am sorry to see made; I mean that with regard to certificated masters. The noble Duke, in his Report to Parliament, said that he regarded the plan of certificated masters as the keystone of the system; and he spoke in the highest terms with regard to it. In that I quite agree. With the exception of Mr. Walter, who has certainly paid great attention to the subject and done a great deal for education, and one or two others. I do not know a single manager of schools who does not think the system of certificated teachers one of the most valuable results of the Minute of 1846. To do away with the necessity of a certificated teacher would destroy the efficiency of the school just at the very moment you wish to extend it. The change contemplated in this respect is one which I am afraid will tend to upset the present system. It is all very well for these people to get a grant and have a certificated master; but in these schools the temptation of a cheap school is very great; and without some condition of this sort established by the Central Office you will have them getting rid of the certificated master, and engaging an inferior one. Your Lordships must bear in mind that the uncertificated master who has conducted a school successfully can apply to be examined, and he need only pass in such subjects as are absolutely necessary as proofs of competence. I think it is quite illusory to suppose that any little concession of this kind will have much effect in the country districts; and as to London and the large provincial towns, it will produce no effect whatever, while it gives no initiative, which is the great vice of the present system. With regard to the proposed appointment of a Secretary of State, I know there has been a general cry for such an appointment; but I think there has been some misapprehension on this score. Objections have been made that there is no responsibility at present, and that the Education Department is administered by the Committee of Council, and not by the President of the Council. This is all a mistake. I am sure that the noble Duke considers himself responsible for the Department of Education, and that he administers the office by the help of the Vice President. I am sure that he only calls the Council together on those sorts of occasion when a Minister would call the Cabinet together, and a Committee of the Cabinet would be appointed to consider subjects of detail. You, therefore, have an advantage in being able to take this advice. At least I know that, having administered the office of President for a long time, I felt it an advantage to be able to consult at times the first-rate men who were in the Department, and a man of great genius who acted as Vice President. There is a confusion, I think, in the public mind as to the place where the responsibility really rests. It is impossible, of course, that the Vice President should not share the responsibility. But that is a real advantage in the system, because, having at your disposal a somewhat higher office than that of an Under Secretary of State, you have your pick of persons out of the Cabinet, and can command for that office the services of men of high official position to explain and defend the policy of the Department. I congratulate the noble Duke on the very easy life he will lead when this Department is taken from him; but the House of Commons will not, I think, be inclined to create a sixth Secretary of State, with an additional salary, and probably with some additional officers, whose only duty "at present"—because that was a term frequently used by the noble Duke—will be to turn the Minutes into an Act, thereby relieving himself of all trouble in that respect; to make certain concessions, which will also make it much easier to administer the Department; and to do with respect to the Conscience Clause what, once done, is done for ever. I am sure that you cannot create such an office as that of Secretary of State without bringing forward much more important measures for the promotion of education than are now proposed, and without meeting the demand which is now becoming so general throughout the country for a more extended and complete educational system.

Earl Granville

EARL RUSSELL: I have a few words to add before this debate closes. My noble Friend (Earl Granville) has expressed his gratitude to the noble Duke for introducing this Bill into the House of Lords. I wish also to express my thanks to the noble Duke for avoiding a danger which he himself has pointed out. He said that there is great danger in making mistakes with regard to education, and that, by taking a false step, we might do much more harm to education in this country than we could do by taking a step of admitted wisdom. I am glad to see that, speaking generally, the noble Duke has avoided any false steps upon this subject. The system which now exists is one which I have always watched with great interest from the time when Lord Lansdowne introduced it in 1839-40, and afterwards, when it was extended and improved. The view which Lord Lansdowne took of the subject—and it was at the time a just view—was first to improve the quality of the education, thinking that the quantity might be increased afterwards. Three or four measures were brought forward with this object. One was that Inspectors should be appointed, men of literary talent and of excellent education—men who were likely, by communication with the clergy and laity, to improve the character of the schools throughout the country. Another measure provided for the training of pupil teachers, who might afterwards become schoolmasters; and the third provided for the appointment of certificated masters, thereby furnishing the country with a great number of competent schoolmasters. These were great measures, and I am sorry to see that the number of pupil-teachers has greatly decreased of late years, so that the efficiency of the system has been impaired. That seems to me an additional reason why the House should agree with my noble Friend that it is not desirable to stereotype all the regulations of the Committee of Council. If you think it proper to appoint a Minister of Education you should give him the power of altering the Minutes from time to time; and I say this because, although I think that the Revised Code effected great good, I feel that the diminution of the pupil teachers was a very great evil, and that means should be taken to raise them to their former number. There is another question upon which the whole country takes an interest, and that is the question of rating in districts where schools are deficient. I think that without some machinery for levying rates our educational system never could be complete. There are two reasons why the system is not adequate to supply the wants of many parts of the country. One is the poverty and inability of the people; the other is the unwillingness and the apathy of the people. I observe that Mr. Norris, a most competent Inspector, who has had great experience, when asked before a Committee of the other House what is the reason why in certain districts there are no schools? answered that it is on account of the unwillingness and apathy which prevail among the people there on the subject of education. If that is the case, the question naturally occurs—How are we to remedy that evil? It would not be right for the State to give an increased grant in such instances, because that would be to give an advantage to persons who were unwilling and indifferent. For my own part, I see no other course than that of imposing a rate in such districts by the authority of Parliament. I certainly contemplated that a Minister of Education might be appointed at the same time as you established a system of rates; and, though the noble Duke has rather put the cart before the horse in creating a Minister of

Earl Russell

Education first, I trust that this Minister, taking, as he must, a great interest in the subject, and surveying the whole state of the country, will be the cause of the introduction of a system of rates into this Bill. I think that even in the present year we might empower boroughs, if they thought fit, to impose an education rate. By-and-by we might make another step in that direction; but even now, if such towns as Manchester and Birmingham were willing to take this course, they should be empowered to do so. This matter of primary education is one of the greatest importance; and I own I am very much struck with a declaration made by a gentleman who was at the head of an educational association at Birmingham, who thus ends his Report—

“The general conclusions to which these facts seem to lead are, that we need some far more comprehensive measure than we at present possess, in order not only to bring all children into school, but to make them attend with regularity, and remain after they have learnt the arts of reading, writing, and ciphering—long enough to become accustomed to the use of them as instruments of self-culture. . . . At present they are not prepared for a step in advance. Most of them have as yet no footing, and I fear that it will be in vain to form them into classes for the study of special higher subjects. The lecture is but the handmaid to the treatise, the class-room (except for drawing) is but the ante-room to the study; and technical instruction will make but little way amongst the artizans of this country until they are better prepared for it by a more thorough system of ‘primary education.’”

This is a fact which lies at the foundation of the whole matter. If you have classes for technical education and classes for higher instruction, and those who go to them have not been well grounded in primary education, in reading, writing, and arithmetic, you will find that technical education will make no progress. That being the important part of the matter, I cannot but wish that such towns as Birmingham, Leeds, and Manchester should have powers to rate themselves. The noble Duke accused me of having a party object when I stated my views on a previous occasion. I can assure the noble Duke I wish rather to help him in passing this Bill than to put obstacles in his way. I am glad that he has at least taken a step in advance, which will be for the public benefit, and I can only hope that it will lead to something better hereafter.

THE EARL OF CORK, with due deference to the noble Earl below him (Earl Granville), ventured to think that hardly any portion of the noble Duke's statement would be received with greater pleasure by the country than that which related to the admission of schools to inspection, whether the principal teachers were certificated or not. This would be the case more particularly in the West of England, where there were a number of small parishes the clergymen of which took the greatest interest in education, and in many cases defrayed the expense of it out of their own pockets.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY said, he also approved the proposal that schools need not necessarily be conducted by certificated teachers, referring to remarkable instances within his own experience, in which the relaxation of the present rule would be followed by beneficial results in securing assistance to schools that depended too largely on the exertions of the clergyman. As to apathy in the matter of education, much had been done already that would tend to diminish it, and we must wait for the full effect of it. He believed the measure of last year would have an immense effect.

EARL GRANVILLE said, it would not provide schools.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY said, that indirectly it would stimulate people to provide schools where they did not exist. Employers of labour, when they found difficulty in availing themselves of the labour of children because they were not educated, would find the means to educate them. He hoped the arrangement suggested with regard to the Conscience Clause would have a soothing and conciliatory effect, and that it would tend to show the groundlessness of the alarm manifested by some of the clergy. Under what was called Mr. Denison's Act, permanent power was given to guardians to pay for the schooling of children of out-door paupers. He would suggest that that provision should be made compulsory, and he was told that if it were 1,600 outcasts would be removed from the streets of Birmingham. In this way much of what was sought by compulsory education might be accomplished, and the streets relieved of spectacles that offended the moral sense. In conclusion, the noble Earl was understood to say that nothing was proposed that would reach the uncared-for children of the dense Irish populations in our larger towns.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON said, that reference had been made to Returns as to the state of education in his diocese, which were of a most appalling character, and which would lead to the belief that apathy was by no means confined to the rural districts, but that it existed to a large extent in this metropolis. He must express his thanks to the noble Duke for the way in which he had dealt with the difficulty of the Conscience Clause. He could affirm from his own experience that the noble Duke would find that on that subject the clergy were extremely reasonable. It was true, however, that there was a small body of clergy who were not very reasonable in their demands; but he believed they were in a minority, and were by no means so important as their declamation would lead some to believe.

In reply to Earl GRANVILLE,

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH said, he proposed to take the second reading of the Bill after the holidays; but at present he was unable to name the exact day.

Motion agreed to.

A Bill to regulate the Distribution of Sums granted by Parliament for Elementary Education in England and Wales—Was presented by The LORD PRESIDENT; read 1<sup>a</sup>. (No. 53.)

POOR RELIEF BILL [H.L.]—(No. 39.)

(The Earl of Devon.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE EARL OF DEVON said, he was quite prepared to place before the House the reasons which justified the various clauses which he had introduced into this Bill; but, looking at the great importance of the measure and the variety of its provisions, he thought it would perhaps be more convenient if the House would now read it a second time, and allow him to explain its provisions on going into Committee. He would therefore simply move the second reading of the Bill.

Motion agreed to: Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> (according to Order), and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

House adjourned at a quarter past Eight o'clock, to Thursday next, half past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

*Tuesday, March 24, 1868.*MINUTES.]—SELECT COMMITTEE—On Scientific Instruction appointed.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee—ARMY ESTIMATES.

*Resolutions [March 23] reported.*WAYS AND MEANS—Resolution [March 23] reported—Consolidated Fund (£6,000,000).PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—Investment of Trust Funds Act Amendment *; Revenue Officers Disabilities Removal *; Boroughs and Divisions of Counties; Mutiny *; Consolidated Fund (£6,000,000).**First Reading*—Mutiny *; Consolidated Fund (£6,000,000) *; Revenue Officers Disabilities Removal * [76].Committee—London Coal and Wine Duties Continuance [43]; Court of Appeal Chancery (Despatch of Business) Amendment * [68]; Indian Railway Companies * [55].Report—London Coal and Wine Duties Continuance [43]; Court of Appeal Chancery (Despatch of Business) Amendment * [68]; Indian Railway Companies * [55].Third Reading—Compulsory Church Rates Abolition [72], and passed.

PRIVATE BILL LEGISLATION.

STANDING ORDER 131.

Order for Consideration of Standing Order 131 (Competition to be a ground of locus standi) (by Order), read.

MR. DODSON said, that having gone into this subject very fully not long ago, it was not his intention to trouble the House at any length on the present occasion. His object was to elicit as far as he could arguments from hon. Gentlemen with regard to the difficult question of the allowance of opposition to Private Bills on the ground of competition. The Standing Order 131 was capable of two different constructions. It might be taken to mean that the proprietors of existing works might be admitted before Committees to argue that the proposed new works were not required for the public advantage; or, without denying that the works were for the public advantage, that they might be allowed to oppose the construction of the new works on the ground that those works would interfere with their private interests. The Report of Mr. Cardwell's Committee on Railway and Canal Bills in 1853, upon which the Order was based, merely recommended that in contested cases careful arrangements should be made by which established railway companies and municipal or other public bodies might raise the question of public advantage, and, in order to secure fairness in raising the issue, provision should be made for payment of costs in the case of illusory, vexatious, or unwarranted opposition. Companies, however, had affixed to the Standing Order the interpretation that they should be allowed to object to proposed new works, on the ground that their private interests would be interfered with, and having gained admission to be heard on that ground they naturally claimed that Parliament recognized in them a vested right, more or less absolute, to the monopoly of the district in which their works were situated. He did not believe that Parliament ever had recognized such a right, and as, under the present state of things, investors were led to indulge in hopes of protection which were constantly disappointed, he thought an Order which was liable to this misconstruction ought not to be maintained. The effect of its repeal would be that companies sanctioned by special Act of Parliament would return to the position in which they stood before 1853, and would be in the same position as companies incorporated under the Joint-Stock Acts, which were not allowed to oppose each other on the ground of competition. To this day, docks, although specially sanctioned by Parliament, were not heard in opposition to each other, and why should railways, or any other works? It might be said that companies incorporated by special Acts of Parliament were subjected to special conditions, but then it was in return for special privileges granted. It might be a fair question to consider, whether the conditions imposed were not in some cases too onerous in proportion to the privileges? He thought himself that the restrictions on the financial operations of companies, sanctioned by special Acts, especially of railway companies, were unnecessarily onerous, and were often injurious to the companies, without being attended with benefit to the public. Most of these attempted restrictions, perhaps all of them, like the old usury laws, broke down when put to the test; for it was impossible for Parliament to control the money market and the exigencies of lenders and borrowers. He believed it would be best to revert to the old law of Parliament, and not to allow one company to oppose another except in case of interference with its works. He was not contemplating, however, by his present proposition to withdraw from companies sanctioned by special Acts the concession intended for them in 1853; therefore, in proposing the repeal of the ambiguous Standing Order 131, he would substitute for it a new Standing Order, rendering it competent to the Referees on Private Bills, if they thought fit, to admit the proprietors of existing works to be heard upon their petition against any Private Bill relating to similar works within a town or district served by them, on the ground of the absence of public advantage. It might be said that the words "public advantage" were rather vague; but he thought that his proposition would have an incalculable advantage over the present more indefinite Standing Order, inasmuch as it would plainly declare that the public advantage would be the paramount consideration. In order to form a judgment as to how far the permission to be heard on the ground of their private interests being interfered with was of value to existing companies, he would refer the House to the evidence of Mr. Blenkinsop, solicitor to the London and North Western Railway Company, who stated before a Committee that the Standing Order 131 had not been productive of fruitful results, and that generally speaking the feeling of Committees was to sanction competing schemes. According to the best Returns, the companies established under the present system had, within the last fifteen years, expended £10,000,000 or £12,000,000 in legal and Parliamentary proceedings. Captain Huish, manager of the London and North Western Railway Company, and other witnesses also gave evidence as to the delusive character of the present Standing Order. He thought the House ought not to retain a Standing Order, the terms of which led people to suppose that Parliament was likely to reject a proposed work of public utility simply because it might appear to interfere with private interests.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That Standing Order 131 be repealed."
 —(Mr. Dodson.)

MR. LEEMAN, from his experience of Private Bill legislation, was opposed to the alteration of the Standing Order in the manner now proposed. During the existence of the Standing Order in question, hundreds of millions of pounds sterling had been invested in public works in this country. The hon. Gentleman himself had admitted that fully one-half of the opposition in Committee-rooms was based on this Order, which he now sought to repeal. If this were so, he would leave the House to draw their own inference as to the views which existing companies held with regard to that Order. In 1862, 1863, and 1864, when Railway Bills were more than ordinary rampant, and when no less than 852 Bills were deposited, only 478 actually passed. The railway companies then had succeeded to a very large extent in their opposition, and entirely on the ground of this particular Standing Order now sought to be repealed. But this was not all. In 1865, 1866, and 1867, when Private Bill legislation, owing to the financial condition of the country, was not carried to the same extent, the same relative results followed as in the previous period to which he had referred. The hon. Gentleman told them, on the last occasion when this subject was before the House, that railway directors were conscious of the want of success which had attended their efforts when seeking to avail themselves of this Standing Order. He must say that his own experience as a railway director for twenty years was wholly opposed to such a statement. Many millions of needless outlay had been prevented by railway companies by virtue of this very Order. The hon. Gentleman knew that during the last fortnight a deputation had waited on the Minister, representing the whole railway interest from the English Channel to the Tweed, and more than one-half of the capital of the existing railways — representing £250,000,000 of capital; and what was he told by that deputation? Why, that they looked on the repeal of this Standing Order with the greatest possible anxiety and alarm. He now repeated that statement as a railway director, and he knew he spoke the feelings of thousands whose capital was invested in railways. The hon. Gentleman said that the Bills thrown out during the period to which he had referred were not thrown out on the ground of competition; yet he admitted that fully one-half of the opposition to new schemes was based on this Standing Order, and the railway companies had no other right to be heard against them. Was it too much to ask that the large interests which Parliament had itself sanctioned and encouraged—he did not say protected, for the object of the railway companies was not protection — should be permitted to set up their own case, if the Referees or the tribunal to which a particular Bill might be submitted should think fit? But the hon. Member asked, why railway companies should be alarmed when the Order he proposed to substitute would equally entitle them to be heard against new works? Because the words proposed to be substituted for "as the Referees shall think fit," were these, "on the ground of absence of public advantage"—words which the hon. Gentleman himself admitted he should not and could not define. The hon. Member had told them that the great object of the change he proposed was to save expense in Private Bill legislation; but the most direct method of reducing the costs of parties promoting Private Bills in Parliament would be to substitute one tribunal for the five different tribunals before which such Bills had now to be taken. If this plan were adopted it would be far more effectual than the mere repeal of a Standing Order.

MR. STEPHEN CAVE said, he was certainly not one of those who thought that a railway company should be able to prevent the formation of another railway, merely on the ground of interference with profits. Parliament gave compulsory powers over land in return for restrictions imposed; but it did not guarantee monopoly, as the hon. Member for York appeared to suppose, and therefore such a provision as that in the Railways Construction Facilities Act, which enabled an existing company absolutely to stop in limine a competing line, would be most injurious to public interests, if extended to proceedings before Committees of that House. At the same time he was not sure that he went as far as the Chairman of Committees, and would exclude a railway company from tendering evidence on the ground of competition. Indeed, he doubted very much whether such evidence might not, in every case, be presented in the guise of absence of public advantage—whether prudently or not, he would leave it to Mr. Blenkinsop to decide—and would this not be reasonable? It was easy to say that Parliament would not interfere with the establishment of two banks or two hotels where there was only room for one; but there was a difference in the nature of things between the two cases. The weakest bank or hotel would succumb, the proprietors would be injured; but the premises might easily be turned to some more useful purpose, and the public would suffer to a very small extent. The same might be said, though with some qualification with respect to docks. In the case of two railways, on the contrary, being constructed in a district which could only maintain one, a vast capital would be wasted in permanently spoiling a large tract of land; and the public would be exposed to the hazard and inconvenience of being carried by companies who were obliged, in order to make both ends meet, to stretch economy beyond what was consistent with public safety. Moreover, there had always been this merit allowed to Committees of that House—namely, that they shut out no evidence, but that, whatever might be the value of their decisions, they gave all parties a patient hearing. He was afraid a departure from this rule might have the appearance of injustice and hostility to existing companies, and might also lead to the evil of frequent appeals to the House to suspend the Standing Order in such cases. It was also manifest that in most instances opposition might be carried on through landowners. He thought, therefore, looking at the period of the Session, that his hon. Friend (Mr. Dodson) had done the best thing by bringing about, as he had done—though his own Motion was not carried—in the course of economy and justice, the discontinuance of the double trial and the strengthening of the Committee which would have to decide between reasonable and unreasonable opposition on the ground of competition, and in this he would be materially assisted by the late Act with reference to costs. But he did not think that for the future competition would be heard very much of before Committees. The main lines were for the most part made, and new lines would chiefly be feeders of existing lines, and he believed that Parliament would have to take care that fair arrangements were made for working these small weak lines, so that they might not be oppressed by powerful companies. Competition was, doubtless, the safeguard of the public. Under it they secured convenience and economy. In many instances the maximum rates of fares had been fixed with the intention that they should be moderated by competition. But just now competition was likely to be reduced below what was wholesome and safe by the process of amalgamation and working arrangements. It was an old saying that competition ended in combination, and this had received a remarkable illustration, as the House knew, in the case of the gas companies. The House should have its attention directed to what seemed to him to be a great danger to the public. From 1860 to 1867 344 Bills had been passed for amalgamation and working arrangements affecting no less than 465 railway companies. He proposed to lay this list with a map on the table of the House. This year the number of Bills was only fifteen, but among them was a gigantic scheme affecting a large district in the South of England. Now, he was not opposed on principle to amalgamation. There could be no doubt that it produced the advantage to the public of greater economy and more harmonious correspondence of trains; at the same time it deprived them of this safeguard of competition. He wished that in an earlier year this subject had been referred to a strong Committee, in order that efficient Standing Orders might have been framed, instead of the useless 162nd Order, requiring the Board of Trade to do what in many notorious cases it certainly could not do—namely, satisfy itself of the amounts of capital actually paid and expended, and that provisions had been insisted on not only for present regulation, but for periodical future revision. He had thought it right to say so much on this occasion, in order that the House, while admitting the value of competition by discussing this comparatively small question of locus standi in the few cases likely to arise in future, might not suffer to pass unheeded vast schemes for the substitution of monopoly in the place of competition throughout every district of the kingdom.

Mr. Leoman

LORD HOTHAM said, that the proposal made by the Chairman of Ways and Means had received due consideration at the hands of the Committee on Standing Orders. It was thought that it would meet with opposition from a great many Members who had made up their minds on the subject, while many others would not agree to it without further inquiry. The Committee accordingly recommended that the proposal should not be entertained for the present; and not only did he concur in this opinion, but, though he had heard ten times as much on the subject as he had ever expected to hear, he had seen no reason to alter his opinion. He hoped that the hon. Gentleman would be satisfied with the discussion which had taken place, and would at all events postpone the matter.

MR. WATKIN concurred in the suggestion of the noble Lord.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

THE BOUNDARY COMMISSION—ASSISTANT BOUNDARY COMMISSIONERS' REPORTS.—QUESTION.

MR. SERJEANT GASELEE said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, What instructions were given to the Assistant Boundary Commissioners for the Borough of Portsmouth, and whether he has any objection to lay them upon the Table of the House, and also their Report to the Boundary Commissioners, recommending for Parliamentary Elections the annexation of the town of Gosport to the borough of Portsmouth, contrary to the wishes of both?

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, with respect to the instructions given to the Assistant Boundary Commissioners for the Borough of Portsmouth, it is unnecessary for me to produce them, because they are already lying on the table. With regard to the Reports of the Assistant Boundary Commissioners, they are essentially confidential documents, supplied for the information of the Boundary Commissioners, who form their opinion upon them, and who are responsible for the opinion they give to this House. It is, therefore, quite out of the question to produce these Reports.

Afterwards—

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH: Sir, I scarcely understood the Answer given by the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury with respect to the Assistant Boundary Commissioners' Reports. Does he mean it to be understood that there are secret Reports made by the Assistant Commissioners of Boundaries differing from those laid on the Table of the House, and that their Reports are not to be laid upon the Table?

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, I understood the Question addressed to me by the hon. and learned Member for Portsmouth (Mr. Serjeant Gaselee) to be, Whether the instructions to the Assistant Boundary Commissioners who visited the Borough of Portsmouth will be laid upon the table of the House? In answer to that, I said there was no difference between the instructions given to the Assistant Boundary Commissioners for the Borough of Portsmouth and those given to the other Assistant Commissioners, which are upon the table of the House. And I also said what is invariably the case, that the Reports of Assistant Boundary Commissioners are confidential documents, for the use of the Boundary Commissioners, whose Reports are laid on the table. The Reports of the Assistant Boundary Commissioners are not laid upon the table, but are made solely for the use of the Boundary Commissioners.

INDIA—BANK OF BOMBAY.

QUESTION.

SIR HENRY RAWLINSON said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether the opinions of any Members of the Council of India on the subject of the Government connection with the Bank of Bombay have been placed on record, as provided for in the twenty-third section of "The Government of India Act;" and, if so, whether he will lay such opinions upon the Table of the House, with any other explanatory Papers which may have been addressed to him on the same subject, and in addition to the Correspondence that has been already furnished to the House?

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE replied, that there was only one Minute of a Member of the Council of India that had been recorded under the provisions of the twenty-third section of the Act. There were several other memoranda and papers of a more or less formal character; but inasmuch as the Minute referred to the personal character of individuals and matters that were about to form the subject of an official inquiry, he considered it would not be convenient or proper to produce it.

CONTRACT LAW FOR INDIA.

QUESTION.

MR. KINNAIRD said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, If he has any objection to lay Copies of Papers upon the Table of the House showing the present position of the question of a Contract Law for India; and of all Reports of the Indian Law Commissioners on the subject of Contracts?

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, in reply, that he had no objection to lay Copies of the Papers in question on the Table of the House.

NAVY ESTIMATES.—QUESTION.

MR. CHILDERS said, he wished to ask, Whether it is the intention of the Admiralty, previous to the discussion on the Navy Estimates, to lay upon the Table of the House any detailed Estimates of the expenditure to be incurred in the various Dockyards during the ensuing year, and the particulars connected with the building, repairing, and re-fitting of vessels?

Mr. Disraeli

LORD HENRY LENNOX replied, that the information which the hon. Gentleman desired to have would probably be found in two Papers which he had just laid on the table of the House, and which would be distributed to Members on Thursday. The first was a supplement to the Appendix to Vote 6 in the Estimates. This supplement would show the class and tonnage of each ship, and the estimate cost of labour and material to be expended during the year. The second was a general summary, showing the intended appropriation of Vote 6, distinguishing the sums to be expended in building and re-fitting of ships, and that for the wear and tear and maintenance of the fleet for the year 1868-9.

LICENCES.—RESOLUTION.

MR. MARSH called the attention of the House to the subject of those licences which restrict the trade and commerce of the country, with a view to their abolition, and, in case of a financial necessity, a transfer of the charges to make or sell any article to a direct tax on the article itself; and moved that, in the opinion of this House, it is desirable that all Licences injuriously affecting the industry and commerce of the Country should be abolished. He said that he should endeavour to show that there was no defence for maintaining these licences; that the amount paid was collected in an expensive manner; that they checked the industry and commerce of the country; that they pressed more on some trades than on others, and on some classes of the community more than on others, and especially upon the humbler classes; that they produced, to a certain extent, monopoly and higher prices, and, in some cases, prevented articles from being used. Another objection was that the taxes so imposed were collected by three separate Departments—the Excise, Stamps, and Assessed Tax Offices; and certainly if they were to be continued it would be better that they should all be placed under the control of one Department. The licence to make soap, which was £4 4s. a year, produced £1,234 16s. The time was past, he presumed, when any defenders of taxing soap could be found. The licence to make vinegar, which in fact made itself, was £5 5s., and produced £330 15s. Then the vinegar maker was protected against his foreign competitor, and, that nothing might escape, pickles were taxed. The papermaker had to pay £4 4s. a year, notwithstanding the House had long since declared paper should be free of taxation. Then came a class which was of much greater importance—the licences to tea and coffee dealers. Such persons, if their premises were rated at as much as £8, had to pay 11s. 6½d. for a licence, and if such a person living in a village sold only 30lb. of tea in one year the licence duty would amount to 4½d. per lb., whilst the import duty was only 6d. The consequence of the licence creating a sort of monopoly was, that in villages tea, which could be bought at 2s. 2d. per lb. in the towns, was sold for as much as 4s. in the villages. The tea licence produced £66,577; and the import duty on tea, chicory, and coffee £3,110,000; so that a fractional addition to the duty on tea would recoup the Government for any loss it might sustain by abolishing the licence, and the only hardship that would result would be a rise of about half a farthing per pound on tea. Tobacco manufacturers whose make did not exceed 20,000lb a year had to pay £5 5s. for a licence, and the charge increased by a sliding scale, according to the make, up to 100,000lb, for which the charge was £31 10s. The arrangement was exceedingly complicated, and, of course, hampered the manufacturers very much. The dealers in tobacco paid 5s. 3d. for a licence; small dealers paid as much as large, and occasional dealers, such as the man who sold a cigar and a light on the Derby Day, were expected to pay 4d. This last charge was of course evaded, and it would be better at once to abolish it. The total received for tobacco licences amounted to £77,957; the total revenue from duty on tobacco, £6,332,000; so that an increase of 1½ per cent on the duty would enable the Government to abolish the licence altogether. He now came to the licence duty for selling wines, and he believed that the way in which this duty was imposed had some effect in preventing people from selling wines to the extent that they otherwise would. There were many other licences, including what were called occasional licences, which occasioned much vexation and annoyance, and produced after all, comparatively, very little to the public revenue. In respect to the article of wine, it was charged at a much higher rate than it ought to be. Now, take the case of a traveller by railway; he could procure a newspaper for 1d., a bun for 1d. at a station, a sandwich for 2d., or a sausage and potatoes for 4d.; but if he were to venture upon a glass of wine he would have to pay 6d. for it. Now, he was told that such wine as that usually sold at stations for 6d. a glass could be purchased for 16s. a dozen, and that each bottle contained about sixteen glasses. The result was, that for each bottle costing to the retailer only 1s. 4d. he received 8s., being a profit of above 600 per cent. The total produced from wine licences to the Inland Revenue was £130,911; the revenue from the Customs was £1,409,127. If such an alteration as he suggested were made, and 10 per cent additional put upon the Customs in respect to this article of wine, it would amply recoup the Government for any losses they sustained by this change in the licencing system. Dealers in sweets were taxed to the amount of £11,000. Dealers in plate were also taxed, and the mode in which the tax was levied upon them was unequal and complicated. A very small percentage on the value of the plate would in this case also render licences unnecessary, and at the same time guard the Revenue of the country against loss. He might observe that under the existing system a considerable advantage was given to the French manufacturers of plate. Pawnbrokers in London paid £15 licence, and in the country £7 10s. Pawnbroking was said to be a necessity to the poor, and foreign Governments took this trade into their own hands. He did not say that, as a protection against receivers of stolen property, pawnbrokers ought not to be registered in some way; but he did think that the State ought not to tax the wants of the poor. With respect to malt and beer, they were taxed six times over and in twenty-five different ways. So unequal was the manner in which the licences were levied that the small man had to pay most, the large man paid least, and the country gentleman who brewed his own beer at home paid nothing at all. He did not propose to deal with the retail trade, though he believed that the licencing system was of no use in preventing drunkenness. In some places where there was free trade in brandies and wines there was no drunkenness at all. He knew that the malt tax was an unpopular impost; but it was a question whether it would not be better to raise money by a tax on beer than by means of all those licence payments in the malting and brewing trades. He believed there would be no difficulty in raising a tax on beer, and the great advantage of this would be that the Excise would be levied in the last stage before consumption. Adam Smith laid it down that this was the most advisable way of levying excise on a manufactured article. A brewer had written to him to explain that there would be no difficulty in raising a tax on beer. The private brewers at the present moment were becoming an extinct species. They could not contend in towns against the machinery and capital of the large brewers, and hence private brewing practically was confined to the wealthy farmers and country gentlemen. But these were the very persons least likely to cheat the Excise, and assuming even that the disposition existed, how was it to be done? The income tax might be evaded, because you could not smell it; but he defied any person to conduct brewing operations without the fact becoming known. If the duty levied upon malt were levied at the last moment, instead of at the first, a great many disadvantages would be got rid of. It was impossible for a maltster under the conditions of modern science to comply literally with Excise regulations, some of which were 200 years old. If the course which he advocated were adopted, anybody would be free to use barley, according to its quality, for any purpose that he liked; and it was only if he turned it into beer that he would have to pay duty. The duty raised from spirits was enormous; but it was not merely the amount of the levy which was oppressive, but the operation of the tax, which extended to chymists, and exercised an effect almost prohibitory upon various industries. If we allowed French tables to come in duty free, at least we ought to take care that the materials for French polishing were not denied to our own tradesmen. Stage carriages were taxed in ten different ways, and it appeared to him that many of those taxes were most injurious, some of them acting very severely upon cabmen, a much abused but good class of men. It would be better, instead of licences, to increase the assessed taxes on horses and carriages. Why, again, should auctioneers be called upon to pay a license of £10 10s.? Abuses there might be connected with auctions; but, on the whole, the system of public competition was the fairest that could be devised. One would suppose that the classes invidiously subjected to the payment of licence duty would remonstrate and petition Parliament for relief. But as long as they fancied that monopoly was thereby secured to them they reconciled themselves to the payment of these charges. A wine merchant to whom he spoke upon the subject recently avowed that he did not think the licence duty any hardship. For, said he, "it keeps people out of the trade," thereby letting the cat out of the bag. It might be thought that if this small additional percentage were added to the Customs and Excise duties the odd sums would be found very difficult to collect. But tables could, of course, be produced which would give equivalents; and, moreover, the existing proportions of duty—such, for instance, as 3s. 1d. and eight-tenths of 1d. per pound upon tobacco—were often quite incomprehensible. The licence system, in fact, had been tolerated because the payments were almost inappreciable; but surely it was better to pay 6d. and know it, than to pay 1s. and know nothing about it. He objected to the charges which he had enumerated, because they were partial and unjust in their operations; interfering unequally with many industries, and because they were often evaded, and where paid, established a monopoly resulting in more than commensurate loss to the consumers. The hon. Member concluded by moving the Resolution of which he had given notice, intimating, however, that it was not his intention to put the House to the trouble of dividing.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, in the opinion of this House, it is desirable that all Licences injuriously affecting the industry and Commerce of the Country should be abolished."—(Mr. Marsh.)

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he wished to make a few remarks on the subject of one licence, especially as it seemed to be supposed that the burden fell upon the consumer. He referred to the licence upon those unfortunate victims of taxation, the brewers. That licence was entirely paid by the brewers themselves; and what did it amount to? A London brewer who made 100,000 barrels of beer per annum, would require a capital of about £300,000.

Mr. Marsh

At the average price of barley, the profit per barrel would be 5s., or £25,000 per year. From that must be deducted the interest on the £300,000, which would leave £10,000. But the duty would be £1,300, which would be 13 per cent. on the trade profit. When the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone) imposed the tax, he urged as an argument in its favour that the brewers would be more than compensated by the abolition of the hop duty; but the fact was that since that time hops had been dearer, the hop-growers being now able to hold their hops, instead of submitting to forced sales in order to pay the duty. The result was that the brewer had to pay an additional tax of 13 per cent, and received no compensation for it. He (Mr. Labouchere) could see no reason why a brewer should be taxed more proportionally than a cotton spinner. There was indeed a species of delusion abroad that brewers made large profits, but that was not the case—certainly not with the London brewers, who very seldom received more than 8 per cent upon their money. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer chose to levy a general tax on trades, there might be some reason for that; but he (Mr. Labouchere) did complain of this invidious burden upon one; and he trusted not only that the right hon. Gentleman would inaugurate his entry into office by modifying to a considerable extent this licence, which was really a measure of spoliation, but that the right hon. Gentleman below him (Mr. Gladstone), whose prediction had not been verified, would assist the brewers in obtaining a modification of the tax.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I have listened with great attention and interest to the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury (Mr. Marsh), and I am glad to find from his concluding remarks that he does not intend to divide the House upon his Motion; because if he had done so I should have opposed it, as no one in my position could assent to a Motion which would, at the present time, strike off so large an amount of the Revenue without proposing a substitute. The question is one of great importance, and I must remind him and the House that the licences to which he has referred come under different categories. These licences were first imposed upon those who sold exciseable or dutiable articles; and though the duties on many of those articles have been relaxed the licence on the vendors still remains; and I must admit there are some anomalies connected with them which I think it would be desirable to remove. The licence for the sale of beer and spirituous liquors produces £1,150,000, and in considering it we must do so, not merely as a licence on the sale of articles for the purposes of revenue, but also to a certain extent with reference to police regulations, as bringing the persons who sell these articles under the control of that body. The stage and hackney carriage and postmasters' licence yields about £170,000 per annum, and the game licences about £158,000. The postmasters' licence is a subject to be dealt with when a convenient time arises; but I think they should all be dealt with together, when the locomotive duties are dealt with as a whole. The brewers', distillers', and auctioneers' licences yield about £420,000 per annum; and tobacco, tea, hawkers' licences, &c., about £270,000. The licences on the larger classes which I have enumerated have been imposed for different reasons, and the hawkers' licence was imposed partly in order to protect small shopkeepers, who complained that these itinerant dealers who paid no rates and taxes ought have a duty imposed on them, and partly as a police regulation, it being necessary that men who were always going about the country, and who had many opportunities of committing frauds and depredations, should be subjected to some supervision. The hon. Gentleman has made a great point with regard to the licence for selling coffee and tea, which is no doubt a matter open for consideration. There is a great difficulty in imposing a fixed rate of licence, because it must press much heavier on the small trader than on the man who carries on an extensive business. In 1853 the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) proposed a scale of trade licences according to the value of the premises; but he found considerable difficulty in dealing with the question, and eventually he was obliged to give it up. It has, however, been urged by some that a general trade licence graduated according to the rateable value of the premises, should be imposed in lieu of the income tax on profits of trade, but great, if not insuperable, difficulties present themselves in devising such a scheme. Now if some trades are required to take out a licence it is difficult to see why all should not. But then again arises the difficulty of imposing it in such a manner that it shall press equally upon all. The rateable value of the premises does not indicate the magnitude of the trade carried on, because some trades, from the bulky character of the goods, require much larger premises than others. I have referred to these matters to show that this is a subject that ought not to be dealt with hastily, and without due consideration; and with regard to the machine referred to by the hon. Member in Somerset House, I do not think there is in existence any machine which would devise a scale of duties that would be likely to give satisfaction. The subject which the hon. Member has brought before the House is one of considerable importance, and it shall have my best attention.

MR. POLLARD-URQUHART said, the licencing system was one of those subjects that would very early engage the attention of the new Reformed Parliament. The poor in the agricultural districts had gained less by the great reductions that had taken place in the duties of all articles of consumption than any other class in the kingdom, from the fact that the retailers in the small villages had not made a corresponding reduction in the price of those articles of necessity and comfort so largely consumed by the poor. The traders remained a monopoly of the trade, because others were deterred from embarking in business on account of the heavy licences they would have, or thought they would have, to pay. A labouring man with 11s. a week in Manchester or Birmingham gained the whole benefit of the reduction, whilst the poor Dorchester labourer, on his 8s. or 10s. a week, got none.

MR. M. T. BASS said, he could not understand why one trade should pay a licence while others did not—why a soap-boiler and a papermaker should pay a licence and a calico maker should not; why a banker should pay and a merchant should be exempt; why a horse-dealer should pay and a cow-keeper be exempt. The hon. and learned Member for Tiverton (Mr. Denman) annually brought forward the grievance of attorneys and their certificates or licences; but the attorneys were by no means singular in this respect. He wished the hon. and learned Gentleman were present that he might challenge him to a discussion of this whole question. Whether licencing was good or bad; if good, it should be made general, and if bad, it should be abolished. In America, a vast number of licences were imposed, and where licence duties were imposed almost every trader and manufacturer paid duty on their articles. In this way alone he thought licence duties upon articles should be collected. But he rose chiefly to call attention to one particular licence which he thought the most grievous of all. It was a blot, a special blemish, on the great financial schemes of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Gladstone). When he brought forward the measure originally it was presented to the House as a commutation of the hop duty. He argued that every one would pay the duty according to the quantity of malt he consumed. He himself had ventured to oppose that view; but the right hon. Gentleman persisted. It happened that at the last General Election he had the misfortune to incur the displeasure of an important portion of his constituents—the Licensed Victuallers—who took it into their heads that he had supported the right hon. Gentleman in maintaining the proportion he had taken of two bushels of malt to a barrel of beer; whereas the reverse was the fact, and he was obliged to seek a certificate from the right hon. Gentleman in order to appease their wrath, who was kind enough to state that he had taken the opposite course. Instead of two bushels, four bushels of malt were used, and the result was that they paid a double tax. The duty paid upon one cwt. of hops used in the brewing of pale ale was 6s. 7d., and the duty upon the malt £6 5s. 7d. The duty paid upon strong beer was 9s. 9d. for the hops and £10 2s. 8d. on the malt, being 50 per cent more than the other and nearly 100 per cent on the malt duty. The right hon. Gentleman attempted to push this tax further and place it on all private brewers; but he himself, accompanied by an hon. Gentleman engaged in one of the largest trades in this country, said they should not insist on the tax being extended to private brewers. He confessed, however, that he had made a great mistake. It was a real injustice which the right hon. Gentleman had inflicted on the brewer, and the private brewer had been allowed to escape altogether. The right hon. Gentleman gave as one of his prime reasons for imposing this tax that it would be recovered in a reduction of the price of hops. But the very reverse was the fact. There had been an average advance of 35 per cent in the value of hops. The brewing trade had in the interval paid the sum of £1,500,000 in the increased value of hops, and in licence duties over £2,000,000. He defied any person to show that they had received a single penny in exchange for this. It was his firm conviction that the brewers' tax was paid out of capital this year and last; and he had heard, on reliable information, that one of the oldest houses in the trade did not get a single shilling last year. They were required to pay £12,000 before they were allowed to begin business; and he knew a house that had paid £46,000 by means of this tax since 1862, and they had not made forty-six pence in return for it. He asked the House, was it just to impose this additional property-tax on the brewers, whilst other trades were free? The whole system of licences was bad unless it was made general. The licence tax was an iniquity. They might as well require Chancellors of the Exchequer to pay a tax of 50 per cent, although there were no persons he would deal with more liberally. He would double their salaries to-morrow. He hoped in return they would do something for him. He defied any Chancellor of the Exchequer to defend this tax. He would seek some other opportunity of bringing this matter forward.

MR. GLADSTONE said, that he thought the hon. Member for Salisbury (Mr. Marsh) had exercised a wise discretion in not calling for a division on the question he had introduced. However important it might be to discuss the principles on which a remission of taxation should be made, it was obvious that such discussions could not have any practical effect in the face of a progressive increase in every branch of the public expenditure. It was on their success in restricting expenditure that they must chiefly depend for the remission of taxation; because, if they continued to increase the expenditure rapidly, it was quite in vain to make the most enlightened speeches on the subject of the reduction of taxes. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer was quite correct in stating that the subject of licencing was a very difficult one to deal with; and, indeed, so great were those difficulties, and so anomalous our licencing laws, that every attempt which he (Mr. Gladstone) had hitherto made to reduce them to something like order and principle had failed; and he had always been obliged to desist from bringing forward any propositions on the subject in a practical shape. When the hon. Member called upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer to establish some principle with respect to licencing, he (Mr. Gladstone) would suggest that there was a class of commodities on which he considered that it was expedient to obtain the maximum amount of revenue which it was possible to obtain. Such a commodity was ardent spirits. It appeared to him to be perfectly fair, with some small reservation, to get as much as they could in the shape of indirect taxes from such a commodity; but it was quite a different case with respect to tea. He did not for a moment suggest that the present was a time when the licence duty on tea could be further reduced; but he thought that, as a general rule, all licences which acted as a restraint to trade ought to be the first to be dispensed with. Then, again, with respect to licences granted to small dealers, which produced only an insignificant amount of revenue, he quite agreed with the hon. Member for Salisbury, although he could not think of parting with that revenue at present. Such licences operated as a restraint to trade, and ought to be parted with at as early a period as was convenient. With regard to the sale of strong liquors, he did not see that the licencing system was at all objectionable, nor ought it, in any probable or proximate circumstances, to be abandoned. The brewers' licence pressed upon brewers beyond the ordinary rules of trade, and could only be justified by necessity. [Mr. M. T. Bass: It is nearly double what you compute it to be.] The question was not now before the House, and his hon. Friend would do him the justice to admit that, when it was proposed in lieu of a duty on hops, it was unanimously accepted by the House, and met with the approval of several eminent members of the trade itself. His hon. Friend, with great magnanimity, refused the advantage offered to private brewers, amidst the cheers of the House. However, he hoped that the time would soon come when the whole question of licences could be fairly considered, and when any objectionable one brought before the attention of the House could be dispensed with altogether. With respect to brewers' licences, he admitted that he would not support them if they could be commuted into a duty upon malt; and if Her Majesty's Government made such a proposal he should not oppose it. He admitted that the brewers' licence was a question which was fairly open to discussion, and should, therefore, be glad to see it brought forward at any time in that House. As regarded licences granted to bankers, they in no degree acted as a restraint upon trade, from the simple fact that they were only required to be taken out by banks of issue, and there were obvious reasons why a licence should be required in their case. He thought the right hon. Gentleman (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) was quite right in sticking to his licences, and he was glad that the hon. Member who had brought forward the Motion was not going to press it to a division, as he should otherwise have been compelled to vote against it.

MR. GREENE complained that the brewer was unable to recoup himself for his licence by raising the retail price of a pint of beer by an impossible fraction of a penny, and therefore the whole sum came out of his pocket. He could not see why the brewer should be taxed while the cotton manufacturer got off free. He did not object to the brewer paying a licence; but he said that the licence in lieu of hop duty was unfair in the extreme. The hon. Member for Salisbury (Mr. Marsh) proposed that the duty should be raised upon the beer, instead of upon the malt; but experience had shown them that the restrictions imposed upon the brewer by such a practice were such as it was impossible they could now submit to; and, moreover, this was not the proper time to propose the reduction of the malt tax now we were at war with Abyssinia. His object in rising was to express his regret that, when practical questions came before the House, there should be so thin an attendance of Members; whereas, if the hon. Member for Birmingham, or any other hon. Member, brought forward a sentimental grievance from the other side of the water to be discussed a large number of Members were invariably present. He hoped that the Motion of the hon. Member for Salisbury would be brought forward on some future occasion, and that a Committee would then be appointed to consider the whole question of trade licences.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER remarked, that according to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the licences of hawkers were needed for the protection of shopkeepers. But this was an argument that could scarcely be recognized in these days of free trade. Hawkers were amenable to the criminal law of the country; and if they committed any offence they could be pulled up before the magistrates and punished without any aid from the system of licences. He considered that these hawkers' licences were oppressive and exceptional. They produced only about £50,000 a year, and they were a very great restraint on the trade of the poorer classes, many of whom were thus prevented from getting an honest living. To impose such restrictions on those persons was a very likely means of forcing them into the workhouse or the prison.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

SCIENTIFIC INSTRUCTION.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. SAMUELSON, in rising to move for the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into the provisions for giving instruction in theoretical and applied Science to the Industrial Classes, said, that in the Notice which he had given he had been careful to avoid the use of the term technical education, and for this reason: technical education was of two kinds—that of the school and that of the factory. Now, it could not be denied that the instruction received by artizans in our factories was at least equal, if not superior, to the instruction received in the factories of any other nation in the world. Our manufactures had long carried off the palm among the industrial productions of nations; our manufactures had been renowned at a time when the Continent had even the rudiments of good workmanship to learn. But it should be remembered how very recent was our present great industrial system. It dated from the inventions of Watt, of Arkwright, and of Crompton; and to show how entirely it was of modern creation, he would simply mention that the manufacture of iron in this country had increased from 60,000 tons in 1788 to 5,000,000 tons in 1867, or very nearly a hundred-fold. Whilst this great industrial edifice was being created, European countries were suffering from exhausting wars. It should be remembered that until within a comparatively recent period the exportation of machinery from this country was prohibited; while, until the middle of the reign of George IV., it was an offence punishable, he believed, with death, to entice any artizan to go abroad for the purpose of teaching his trade to foreign workmen. Meanwhile, schools were established on the Continent for conveying, not only theoretical instruction, but also for the purpose of imparting instruction in practical manipulation. In France les Ecoles des arts et des metiers were established; the great Ecole centrale was created in Paris, and polytechnic schools throughout North and Western Germany. It was urged that the example of the United States showed that there was no necessity for the establishment of technical schools. He was not aware whether the United States as yet possessed any such schools; but that they regarded the subject as being one of great importance might be seen from the fact that, in the midst of their troubles, they voted towards technical schools land of no less a value than 8,000,000 of dollars. There were in this country no technical schools, and though our Universities and some of our public establishments of instruction contained the elements of such schools, yet they were from this point of view open to several objections. In Oxford, he was glad to say, scientific instruction was gaining ground; but he contended that it was not only of too theoretical a character, but that Colleges were conducted on principles which were too severely denominational. A son of a friend of his, in the sixth form at Rugby, offered himself as a candidate for a prize at Christ Church in natural science; but his father holding the views of the Society of Friends, and he being consequently unable to produce a certificate of baptism, he was not permitted to compete. The only two unsectarian institutions we had were those of the University College of London and of Owen's College in Manchester. He was aware that there were two great schools in London which partially fulfilled the purpose he had in view—the School of Mines together with the College of Chemistry in Jermyn Street, and the School of Naval Architecture in Kensington. The School of Mines was no doubt an institution of great use, but it was not a polytechnic school; and one inquiry of his Committee would be, whether this school could not be made the foundation of a great school of general technical instruction? The School of Naval Architecture was also of great use; and he had been told by Mr. Reed that till it was established he could not find anyone to draught his plans, and he was obliged to sit down to a drawing-board himself to work out his own designs in detail. But there was not a complete polytechnic school in England. The case was different in Ireland. There was a College of Science in Dublin whose curriculum was very complete; but it was too recent in its establishment to enable him to speak of its success. As regards secondary education, some attempt was made to instruct the middle classes in the applied sciences; but the general working of these schools might be summed up in a remark from the Report of the recent Schools Commission, that in general the masters were ill supplied with apparatus, and that they were very deficient in manipulative skill. As far back as 1859 attempts had been made to get up classes for the teaching of theoretical and applied science to the working classes; but the result was that they had been established in very few of the manufacturing districts, and that, with the exception of Lancashire and London and its neighbourhood, they had taken no hold on the industrial population. In Lancashire, an excellent school had been established at Oldham, mainly through the munificence of the hon. Member for that town (Mr. Platt); and in Halifax, in Yorkshire, there was another excellent school, sustained by the liberality of the hon. Member for that borough, (Mr. Akroyd). But there were no schools in Durham, none in Northumberland, few in Staffordshire, none in Derby. He had no doubt, however, he would be told by the noble Lord opposite that the number of persons receiving scientific instruction was increasing. [Lord ROBERT MONTAGU: Hear, hear!] He was aware that was so; but in the majority of instances it would be found that the increase was made up of children taught in the elementary schools, and taught in a very superficial way. For instance, it was stated that at Plymouth in 1865 there were two scientific schools, and in 1866 there was a third added for navigation. But in the first year that school had 458 pupils, and it had only one master. The consequence was, that not one of the pupils gained a certificate at the examination—as, indeed, how could they when the whole 458 were taught by a single master? And yet the Inspector reported everything colour de rose, and the only remark he made was that it would be better if there were more masters. But only 123 of the 601 existing certificated teachers were being employed; and, taking this in conjunction with the cry for more teachers, it was evident something in the shape of a grievance existed, into which the House might do well to inquire. Of this he felt sure, that the Minute of Council which enabled holders of Queen's prizes to become teachers, without having undergone a special teacher's examination, was a great mistake, and ought to be repealed. Already the instruction was weak enough, as shown by the results. In the annual papers of examination throughout the country upon scientific subjects, he found in those of May, 1866, that in geometry, 51 per cent of those examined were failures; in mechanical drawing, 36 per cent; in applied mechanics, 46 per cent; in geology, 42 per cent; in mineralogy, 45 per cent; in steam, 57 per cent; and in physical geography, 61 per cent. This was excused on the ground that two sets of papers had been issued under a new system, and that the pupils, in error, had taken the more difficult. The statistics, however, showed that a majority of the failures took place in the easier papers. This, for instance, was so with regard to 40 out of the 61 per cent of failures in physical geography. One reason for the want of success in these schools he believed to be, was that their practical management was in the hands of a gentleman who was thoroughly familiar with art, but, he was afraid, was not equally acquainted with science—Mr. Cole—and who therefore could not do his duty in the Department of Science as, notwithstanding all the fault found with him, he believed he had done in regard to art. But there was one excellent thing done in this Department—the establishment of drawing classes in elementary schools. For his own part, he believed that nothing could so much tend to promote efficiency in the schools to which his Motion had more especial reference than the giving of preparatory instruction to young children in drawing; not, however, as was now the case, by art masters exclusively, since the Department by one of its rules acknowledged their incompetency to give instruction in geometrical or mechanical drawing, but rather by science masters; and a Minute had lately been issued granting scholarships to advanced scholars in elementary schools who should pass a satisfactory examination in science and art; but that had been issued so recently that he was unable as yet to give an opinion of its success. The answers forwarded by the different Chambers of Commerce to the circular issued by the Privy Council declared that British workmen were placed at great disadvantages by their want of systematic instruction; but he was sorry to find that those Chambers appeared to be quite unconscious of the defective education of the managers and proprietors of manufactories. One difficulty surrounding the subject at this moment was that we hesitated to grant efficient Government aid to any class except the working classes in this country; while they, on the other hand, were not prepared by their previous training to accept it, and so matters moved in a vicious circle. He believed that a solution, to a great extent, of the difficulty might be found in granting aid towards the establishment of professorships upon the understanding that, whatever other instruction the professors might give, they should also give instruction to working men in the night schools. If in some form or other the Government were prepared to promote more systematic plans for teaching science in our great manufacturing centres, local efforts in aid of them would not be wanting. As to the necessary funds, he would not, as was so often done, compare the grants for education with those for naval and military purposes; but when he stated that education in the British army cost four and a half or five times as much per head as it did in the French service, he thought he had pointed out a fund from which some portion of any additional grants in favour of science might be recovered. If ever cultivation was to be extended to our industrial classes, it must be in the first instance by educating them in science. He by no means undervalued other branches of education. The claims of classical literature, indeed, had latterly been under-rated, he thought, by men like the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe), who themselves were masters of the subject, and owed many of their greatest successes to the perfection of their classical training. If they wished to give the industrial classes of the country, from manufacturers and managers down to the artizans, a desire for instruction, it must be done by tempting those classes to instruct themselves, in the first place, in the principles underlying the arts they pursued in their daily avocations, and that having been accomplished, the question would arise whether a combination of such instruction with literary instruction could or could not, in the majority of instances, be effected. He believed that encouragement of technical instruction in this country would not merely promote arts and manufactures, but would tend to the advancement, of the general education of the people. The hon. Member concluded by moving for a Select Committee to inquire into the provisions for giving instruction in theoretical and applied Science to the Industrial Classes.

Mr. Samuelson

MR. DIXON said, he sincerely hoped that the granting of the Committee would not be a bar to giving the assistance immediately and urgently required by some of the provincial towns, and which would be asked for by others. He hoped that the result of the inquiry would be practical legislation, and a disposition on the part of the Government to grant the supplies necessary to carry out the recommendations of the Committee. They could not hide from themselves the fact that this was a question of no small importance; because it was beginning to be fully recognized that, upon the right method of dealing with this question depended, to a considerable extent, the continuance of the manufacturing prosperity they had hitherto so largely enjoyed. We did not now occupy the same position in regard to manufactures as we had occupied ten or twenty years ago. He referred to our position as compared with that of other countries. The letters written by jurors at the Paris Exhibition showed that we had not kept pace with Continental nations. This was the opinion of Chambers of Commerce, which ought to be able to arrive at a correct conclusion on the matter; and Sir James Kay-Shuttleworth held that in our middle-class education there had been scarcely any advance during the last thirty years. He hoped that the Committee, if appointed, would inquire, not only into the provisions now existing respecting technical education; but would also inquire into the provisions that ought to exist, and which it should be the duty of the House to bring into existence. The Science and Art Department, in its last Report, informed them that in all the schools connected with the Department, there were not more than 7,000 pupils under certificated teachers—or not more than one pupil, in a scientific school, out of every 4,300 inhabitants. To the science and art school in one small town the Government of Saxony allowed £3,000 per annum; while £7,000 a year was the aggregate allowed by our Government to the provincial schools of science and art in this country. Government should do a great deal more than they had hitherto been able to do. Much had been done by private enterprise at Birmingham to promote technical education; but there was still work before them which they could not perform for want of means, for which they were now applying to the Government, and he trusted they would give it to them. He trusted also that, when the Report of the Committee was before the House, the Government, backed by the opinion of the House and the feeling of the country, would do a great deal more for technical instruction than they had ever yet dreamt of doing.

MR. BAINES said, he considered it was very desirable that the Government should grant the Committee asked for. If a Committee were appointed, it should be composed of men of science, practical manufacturers, and men connected with public and political life; and the inquiry might be more efficient if it were carried on by a Royal Commission, because the services of men of science would be more at the command of a Commission than of a Select Committee; but if the noble Lord the Vice President of the Council thought that the inquiry ought to be referred to a Committee, he should make no objection. He must do the Government the justice to say that the Department of Science and Art had been by no means idle in the matter of technical education; nor had their efforts been unattended with good. It was only eight years since the Government Grant was first given, and the number of scholars had increased from 500 in 1860 to 10,000 in the course of the present year. He believed, however, comparatively little had been done out-of-doors to provide the education which was suited to persons intended as managers for large manufacturies. Still, he might say, if science had been neglected by the humbler classes of the community, it had been neglected in a still greater degree by the upper and middle classes. In the middle-class schools the great defect was found to be the want of scientific education; and he believed the fact was in a great degree attributable to the Universities, where, until recently, science was not made an especial study. The University of London, and other kindred institutions, had given a great stimulus to the study of science; and, although they might be disposed to look with favour upon what had been accomplished, they were forced to admit that as compared with other countries there was a great inferiority in this with respect to scientific education. He hoped to see artistic and scientific education in this country raised to a point commensurate with our manufacturing ascendancy. He trusted the Committee asked for by the Motion of the hon. Member would be granted, and that it would enter on its duties with a resolution to bring the matter to some practical result.

MR. BAZLEY said, he did not despair of the capabilities of his countrymen, who, he believed, would still be found unrivalled in the race of the world's competition; and with regard to education he thought that the first duty which that House had to perform was to provide primary instruction for the great masses of the people. His hon. Friend had omitted to mention the great advantage which a man's genius gave to his labour. There were many persons in this country who were continually undergoing a system of self-education, not being much indebted to school education, and to that class the manufacturers of this country owed more than to those who were deeply skilled in science and art. He took a more cheerful view of the result of the Paris Exhibition than was entertained by his hon. Friend. According to the Report of an engineer artizan (Mr. Evans), published under the sanction of the Society, it appeared that in the engineering department of the Paris Exhibition there was nothing to surpass British workmanship for finish and soundness; and that for exactness and perfection of design nothing could exceed the tools of Messrs. Whitworth and Co. In like manner, it was stated in the work published by that society upon the Paris Exhibition that in the watch trade the English, taking quality into consideration, had really nothing to fear. From Coventry two individuals were sent to the Paris Exhibition, and the report drawn up by one of them stated that for the manufacture of good, plain ribands Coventry had no reason to be apprehensive of rivalry. Speaking generally, he thought that, instead of asking the Government to patronize the British workman, he should himself forego his invocations to Jupiter and put his shoulder to the wheel. The cotton trade was originated by self-teaching and self-help. Within his own recollection Mr. Heathcoat, formerly Member for Tiverton, commenced the lace trade in this country: he had no scientific teaching, but the manufacture succeeded so well that £1,000,000 a year, at least, is contributed to the public Revenue by those engaged in it. He should not despair of the working class, with only that education which he hoped the Government might give, keeping pace with the times; and he hoped manufacturers would keep pace with their workpeople. He would rather see efforts made out-of-doors to educate for particular trades than that the Government should provide that education. To prove that, after all, we were not so far behind our neighbours as some represented, he would mention this fact:—The French were reported to be, from their superior knowledge of chymistry, more skilled than ourselves in the art of dyeing, and yet, within the last fortnight, the manufacturers of Rouen had applied to the Manchester Chamber of Commerce for what information they could give with respect to the common art of dyeing. He did not think that our own workmen were sufficiently appreciated; yet it was well known that they were always applied to where great skill was required for the development of any new branch of trade. In the manufacture of steel it was said we were inferior to Prussia; but he had been assured by one of the most competent judges that we were not behind Prussia in that manufacture. We had formerly produced steel which others had converted into watch-springs; but now that branch of trade had sprung up among ourselves, and watch springs were largely produced in this country. This was a convincing proof that we were not retrograding in the race and struggle of inventions. With only a broad system of education he believed our course was perfectly clear. He had every confidence in the resources of the country, and he hoped they would be left unshackled by the Government, for any kind of patronage would rather retard than develop their resources. He hoped his hon. Friends would not press the Motion for a Committee.

Mr. Baines

MR. BAGNALL mentioned, as an instance of the want of education among skilled workmen, the fact that, some years ago, he required a manager for a very large and important iron works, and was obliged to give the appointment to a man who could neither read nor write. That occurred some eleven years ago, and he believed the difficulty in procuring educated workmen had scarcely lessened up to the present day. He hoped the noble Lord would not object to the appointment of a Select Committee upon this question; and he trusted the result of that appointment would be, that some provision would be made to provide a technical, scientific, and artistic education, not, first of all, for the working classes, but for those among whom one would look for managers of manufactories.

MR. E. POTTER, as one well acquainted with calico printing, admitted, that in the higher class of goods the French excelled us in design and colour; but said that, although we imposed no duty, the importation of French prints had increased very slowly, and only amounted to £500,000 a year. Under our system of Free Trade it was impossible we could compete with them in the supply of their description of goods, as the manual labour required in their preparation cost 40 per cent less in France than in this country. He should be the last to oppose inquiry; but they should very carefully guard against any attempt to make grants for education to those who were very well able to pay for it themselves. Though schools of art had been in existence in this country for many years, the subscriptions for their support from manufacturers in all the great manufacturing towns did not exceed a total of £2,000 or £3,000 a year. If our employers of labour did not come forward as they ought to do to provide this education, it was not the duty of the Government to supply their deficiencies. The total number of artizans taught in the schools did not exceed 7,000 or 8,000. A great deal had been said about the Continental system of education; but what were its results? In France the cost per head was nearly double that in this country, and there was very irregular attendance, after all, in the schools, while the technical education which the students received had not enabled them to strike out any new path of practical industry. He hoped if the Committee were appointed its Members would be carefully selected, and that its investigations would be strictly confined to certain definite subjects connected with the progress of our own manufactures. The hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Dixon) stated that our manufactures were losing ground; but how did he reconcile that allegation with the fact that our exports and imports had doubled during the last twelve years, and that, notwithstanding the unfavourable circumstance that our manufactures were liable to a heavy duty at nearly every Continental seaport? All that we required and all that our manufacturers had a right to ask for was that our working classes should receive a sound and solid primary education.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU was not at all disposed to dispute the position of the hon. Member for Banbury, with whose arguments he agreed in the main, and with whose general conclusions he concurred; and yet he ventured to differ from him upon a very few points. On the other hand, there was a great deal of truth in what had fallen from the hon. Members for Manchester and for Carlisle. He believed that competition was in a great measure the cause of the present cry for technical education. The hon. Member for Banbury said that during the French war our industries had been firmly established in this country; but that since 1815 foreign countries had been able to make great progress in their manufactures, and in a large degree to supplant those of this country; and that the cause had been their technical schools. There were, however, other reasons which could be assigned for the fact that foreign nations were catching us up in the race. Not thirty years ago there were but few manufactures on the Continent, and but few railways throughout Europe to distribute the produce; whereas at the present time the Continental nations had as many manufactures as we had, and their countries were intersected with railways, by means of which their productions were taken to foreign markets easily and cheaply, to compete with our own. To these circumstances it was due that we were beginning to feel the pinch of competition; our difficulties were not solely to be attributed to our want of technical education. He could, however, not agree with the hon. Members for Manchester and Carlisle in altogether making light of the case of the hon. Member for Banbury. Several deputations had had interviews with him lately on the subject of our manufactures, and had mentioned facts which had startled him much. He had learnt from them that a very few years ago no person abroad could compete with us in the manufacture of woollen goods, whereas at the present time upwards of £5,000,000 worth of wool was annually sent abroad to be dyed and worked up, instead of being manufactured in this country. He had been informed by Mr. Behren the chairman of the Chamber of Commerce at Bradford, that in the year 1864 upwards of £33,500,000 worth of woollen goods were manufactured in that town, yet that even that long-established trade, with all the exceptional facilities which Bradford possessed, could scarcely hold its own against foreign competition; and that at Rheims in France large quantities of our Australian wool were worked up, and the articles manufactured from it competed successfully in the market with those produced by this country. Why was this? Because that abroad they excelled both in their patterns and their dyes, in their art and science. The hon. Member for Manchester said that the dyers in this country were superior to the dyers on the Continent; but was the hon. Member aware that many thousands of pieces of Orleans—a fabric composed of wool and cotton—were annually sent abroad to France to be dyed? Again, with regard to silks, ribands, and velvets: fifteen years ago we imported only one-tenth, whereas we now imported nine-tenths of our annual consumption of those articles. This result was doubtless owing to some extent to Free Trade, but it was also greatly due to the superiority of the dye and finish of the articles made abroad. The hon. Member for Carlisle asked how could we complain of the want of technical education when we had doubled our exports and imports within the last few years. True, our imports of raw silk from China may have doubled, and our exports have increased; but we export the raw silk to be worked up abroad, and we import the manufactured article after it has been worked up. Why was this? Because the manufacturers abroad were superior in their style and finish—that is in their art and science. Mr. Mundella, a well-known manufacturer in Nottingham, had informed him that the lace trade of that town was beginning to fall away in consequence of the design and the workmanship being far inferior to that of Continental manufacture. Doubtless, many hon. Members had seen the Lyons lace which had been exhibited at the Paris Exhibition, the design of which was not a mere pattern, but was shaded like a picture. The lace manufacturers of this country never produced anything to compare with those fabrics. Unfortunately our inferiority was not confined to the lace trade. Messrs. Creed and Williams, in their letters which appeared in The Times last year, stated that France and Belgium supplied the greater part of Europe with iron. French and Belgian productions were fast supplanting those of this country both in Russia and Spain. Yet, Russia and Spain were in the first stage of railway development. This was a most significant fact. To show to what extent foreigners were succeeding in their competition with our workmen he might remind the House that a contract had recently been entered into for the erection of some new buildings at South Kensington; an immense number of iron girders which were required were brought from Belgium, although the contract for the buildings had been taken by an English contractor. Germany had been greatly retarded by the recent war. Yet what we had to fear from that country was sufficiently depicted by the list at the end of the answers from the Kendal Chamber of Commerce, which was among the Papers moved for by the hon. Member for Bradford. The hon. Member for Whitby had stated that in consequence of not being able to find a competent man to fill the post, he had been compelled to appoint as overseer a man who could neither read nor write. Complaints of a similar character were frequent; and he had been informed that in the large machine-making firms of Yorkshire and Lancashire the practical managers were generally selected from Germans who had been educated in the German Polytechnic Institutions. What was the cause of all this? England could boast of workmen inferior to none in energy and talent; she possessed more coal and iron, a cheaper transit, a seaboard, everything, in short, tending to superiority except technical education. Where the effect was different it was due to the only difference in cause. In England, trade was a tradition; it was a rule of thumb handed down from father to son. Abroad it varied with varying circumstances, and adopted new improvements. He could not help remarking that in the course of the discussions last winter upon this subject, no one had ventured clearly to define what it was that he meant by “technical education;” the speeches and articles were all like clouds, up in the air, and therefore led to no conclusion. The hon. Member for Westminster had defined education in his speech at St. Andrew’s as “the effect produced on the mind and character by things which, perhaps, might have another purpose.” That might be accepted as the definition of the genus, of which technical education was the species. If that were so, technical education must also be a means of forming the mind. The end was not to increase practical skill, but to enable a man to pursue his calling with intelligence. The object of technical education would be not so much to instruct the pupil in the mechanical branches of any particular trade as to make him acquainted with the general laws by which certain results might be obtained; for though the State might have a duty to perform towards the brains of its subjects, it was the workshop alone that could employ hands. He would say that technical education consisted in giving a workman such a knowledge of the natural laws involved in his pursuit that he could apply them intelligently to any case. If the end of technical education were to enable a person to procure, in greater abundance, the necessities of life, then technical education would have a very low rank. The knowledge of medicine and dietetics are sciences which have for their end the preservation of human life. This is a much higher end. Moreover health has far more to say to happiness than money or an excess of the necessities of life. Again, if the end of technical education were to increase the wealth of the country, it would rank very low. For to increase the intelligence and raise the character of the nation is a far higher end. If therefore technical education has the importance which is attached to it, it must have for its aim the improvement of the mind, and not the increase of trade. Let them now consider the species of technical education. There was a technical education for the artisans or those who produce for wages, and a technical education for the middle class, or the heads of firms, and those who manage factories. That for the artisans might be divided into two kinds, one of which—that for the girls—was, he believed, very much neglected, and yet he held it to be the most important of all. In elementary schools girls had to be taught sewing, as an absolute requisite before any grant could be made to the schools. Why was this? Because that sewing would be useful to them in after-life. Yet sewing could have no beneficial effect on their minds. How much more then should we require such branches of learning as would not only be useful in after-life, but will also tend to raise the character and mind. He would teach them how to make homes comfortable, how to bring up and teach infants—in fact, the whole art of household economy. He would give them habits of cleanliness and of thrift. In the Reports of the School Inspectors for this year he observed recommendations that cooking should be taught in elementary schools. It was mentioned that in one parish the church alms were not given to the poor in money; but were used for the purchase of provisions, which were cooked day by day in the schools, and then served out to the poor. The same alms thus served two charitable purposes. The importance of such technical teaching was very great. First, with regard to the nation—it was the wife which gave the character to the family, and the family was the cell of the nation. Secondly, with regard to the working man, the importance of it was shown by a comparison of the homes of the artisans at Manchester. Those of our English artisans were too often comfortless and uninviting, while those of the German artisans, receiving no higher wages, presented a great contrast. The difference arose from the fact that the females in the one case lacked that instruction which in the other had been carefully imparted when young. Thirdly, it would have an effect on our elementary schools. One cause of non-attendance was said to be poverty; it was shown in evidence before the Committee on Manchester and Salford Education, that this arose from the great quantity of money spent at public-houses. Why did the man frequent the public-house? Because his home was uncomfortable and cheerless. Alter this, and his children would attend the school. And, fourthly, this technical education would have a great effect on the girls themselves; it would train them for servants, and enable them to gain an honest, rather than cater for a base livelihood. He turned now to the effects of the technical education of lads. And first, as to the produce. A skilled workman was more productive, and caused less waste and spoiling of materials; so that the production by skilled workmen was greater. By skill he did not mean a knack, but a knowledge of physical laws, and a readiness in applying science. Again, it is frequently the dye of tissues—for instance, the colour of silks or curtains—which determines their sale; and the success of the dye depends on a knowledge of science. The sale of various articles—as shawls, ribbons, carpets—also depended on the design; while the shape of china goods, furniture, or ornaments, often determined the purchaser. This was the result of art. Secondly, as to the man himself. The great enemy to elementary education was what was termed the labour claims. Let them consider that point for a moment. No one rejects that which conduces to his ends in life. If, therefore, you desire that persons should seek elementary education, make it conduce to their aims. What was the end of the working man? To better himself in life. If your education will assist him in this, he will not despise the education which you give him. If you give a man a key to a treasure house, and he knows it, you will need no compulsory law to make him lift the latch. The education imparted in early youth had generally too little in view the advancement in after-life. Boys as a rule received the education which would be proper for a clerk, but other matters which might enable a lad to rise in life as he increased in age were generally neglected. Hitherto the means sought by working men to rise in life were unions to obtain less work and more pay. He believed that they now saw a better way; they were aware that by knowledge they could command a superior position. Their desire for knowledge was proved by the growth of science schools. While in 1860 there were only nine science schools in the country, with 500 scholars, there were in May, 1867, 212 schools, with 10,230 scholars, and in January, 1868, 282 schools, with 12,800 scholars. The existence of working men's Colleges all over the country, for higher scientific education, was an additional proof of the same proposition. They might, he believed, receive encouragement not only from the increasing desire for education which was exhibited by the working men, but also from the great advance which had been perceptible of late years. That advance dated from what was termed the Albertine movement—a movement which had its origin in the Exhibition of 1851, when the newspapers were teeming with articles lamenting the increasing superiority of foreign productions over those of English artizans. The Exhibitions in Paris in 1855, and in London in 1862, were attended with similar effects, but with this difference—that while in 1851 the excellence of French productions excited in the minds of the English a fear lest our nation should be distanced, the two subsequent Exhibitions caused an alarm in the minds of the French which was equally strong. The French were terrified as to their future place in the scale of nations; and the cause of all this alarm was due to the art schools which had been established since 1852. That this was so might be seen from the Reports of the French jurors appointed to attend the Exhibition of 1862. One of these Reports said—

“The upward movement is visible, above all, among the English. The whole world has been struck with the progress which they have made, since the last Exhibition, in design. . . . It is impossible to ignore the fact that a serious struggle awaits France from this quarter.”

The sculptors' Report said—

“The progress made in sculpture by England has been immense since the Exhibition of 1851. She has made a gigantic advance.”

The shawl designers—“Envy England her schools of design.” The porcelain painters reported that—“The vast progress within the last ten years is due to the immense extension given to the study of drawing.” Was not that a great encouragement to us, and a proof that we had taken the right road, and that all we had to do was to continue to travel on that road with patience? The French, in consequence of their alarm, appointed an Imperial Commission to consider the whole subject, and to look for remedies. That Commission recommended, firstly, the introduction of physical science into primary schools. We had done that by the Minute of December 22, 1867. Secondly, the French Commission recommended an increase in the number of evening schools—a matter dealt with by the Bill introduced that evening in “another place.” Thirdly, they suggested the establishment of large central schools for giving technical education—a point to which he would presently refer. He would venture to throw out two more suggestions for consideration. Anyone who had been to the institution at Limehouse, or Hanwell Central District School would know the enormous value of places where pauper boys were taught a trade as well as general knowledge. Again, the statistics, contained in the evidence before the Manchester and Salford Education Committee, and relating to the industrial schools at Aberdeen were perfectly astonishing as to the rapid decrease of crime and poverty which they produced. By a Bill passed last year it was made compulsory on every union in the metropolis to have an industrial school, and he did not see why a similar provision should not be applied to every district throughout England. The reformatory schools had been found equally beneficial; and if all beggar and vagrant children were placed in them by a simple order of justices at petty sessions, it might be still more advantageous. What was so powerful to cure would do much to prevent. He now came to the education of the middle classes, in which, he believed, lay the whole gravamen of the charge. The hon. Member for Leeds had admitted as much. The whole tenor of the letter of the hon. Member for Banbury revealed that this was the fons et origo mali. It was said there was a great want of technical education for those classes in England; and it was asked why that want should not be supplied by the State? Now he asked, in turn, why should the State supply it? Eton, Cambridge, Oxford, and all middle-class schools were originated by local endowments; they were not paid by the State. It did not provide general education for the middle classes, and why, then, should it pay for their technical education? What had been the course pursued in regard to the farmer when he felt the effects of foreign competition? The technical education for a farmer is Scientific Agriculture. The State had not aided him by giving him such a technical education; but left him to adopt those mechanical appliances which saved labour, and to find out for himself those scientific processes which yielded the results he wished to attain. Since free competition had been brought about in 1846 the farmer knew that his livelihood depended on his possessing superior knowledge. In the same way, when the English manufacturer felt the pinch of competition, owing to there now being more manufactories abroad and more railways to distribute their produce than was formerly the case, he said it was not the business of the State to give him technical education in order to save him from that competition. Besides, the danger, after all, did not arise so much from want of technical education as from defective morals. An illustration of this was afforded by the practices resorted to by the throwsters and others employed in the silk trade. He took his statements from a letter by Mr. Bennoch, which had been moved for by the hon. Member for Bradford. The goodness of silk depended on its fineness and on its evenness. From China and Japan we procured silk of very different qualities. The Englishman reeled the coarse and uneven silk first, and then covered the reel with the finer and more even silk. The foreigner had been frequently deceived by this means; so that while English reeled silk had been depreciated 25 per cent within the last year, French and Italian silks had risen in price. The same practice prevailed in the throwing of silk. The throwster received, say, 100lbs. of silk at 30s. per pound. When thrown it should yield not more than 95lbs. of silk at 33s. 6d. per pound, and 5lbs. of waste or rough thread. The throwster did not remove the rough thread, however. Again, all silk contained 25 per cent in weight of natural gum; this must be boiled out before the silk could be properly dyed. Yet the throwster left this in, and also soaped the silk to make it smooth. Hence, our silk lost 35 per cent on boiling before it was dyed, and the foreign manufacturer would not look at it. If there was a little more honesty in trade, they would hear less of the cry about competition and technical education. And, moreover, if a trade languished from such a cause, should the State give money to revive it? Technical education, as he had said, was a means of cultivating the mental faculties. He was for giving a man all the knowledge and all the science he could, but he would certainly avoid equipping him for a trade. He would abjure schools for special training. They had already been tried in England. When the "Department of Practical Art" was first started, the object was to educate the artizan for special pursuits. And consequently every effort had been made to carry this out. Special masters were engaged; special classes were established for painting porcelain, metal working, and many other trades. Exhibitions of £40 were given, and every effort was made. But it did not succeed, because there was no demand on the part of the manufacturer for this superior artizan. Or if the superior artizan became a teacher there were no scholars willing to be taught by him; and so, when they had trained him they had made him a useless being. All these things depended on a demand on the part of the public. Hence, what they had to do was to educate the taste of the nation and create a demand, and all the rest would follow; but, of course, that could only be done slowly and by degrees. In 1853, special training was abandoned in England. The French Commission reported to the like effect. They said—

Lord Robert Montagu

"It is better to annex the school to the workshop, than the workshop to a school." "The Real Schulen of Germany are found dwarfing to the mind, lessen the culture of the intellect, and lead to materialism."

We should therefore teach the sciences which are applied to trades, but not the trades to which sciences are applied. We should aim, not at work, but at intelligence in work. The Dutch taught science in the evening after the day's work. With the French the scientific studies were carried on in the morning, while in the afternoon the practical part of the work was learnt in the different workshops in Paris. With regard to Germany the hon. Member for Banbury (Mr. Samuelson) in his letter said—

"The apprenticeship schools themselves which I visited, with the exception of the one at Crefeld, drag on a languid existence, and the opinion is almost universal in Germany that for all trades, except those whose conditions approach to that of an art, as the designing and weaving of complicated patterns, and others of a similar kind, the true apprenticeship is in the workshop or factory."

The first thing to be avoided by the Government was the giving of special instruction, and the second was the establishment of State manufactories in order to encourage trade. State manufactories would actually stamp out and crush the trade itself. That stood to reason, because a private individual with his limited capital could not compete with the State, whose capital was practically infinite. The private individual had to pay for failures and mistakes, but the State did not smart under its failures. That was seen in the case of the manufactory set up by Louis Quatorze at Sévres. Sévres now stood alone in France. The example of Meissen in Saxony taught the same lesson. Meissen and Sévres were now beaten by Minton. The speech made by the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) among his constituents had been referred to. It was a very sensible speech. He said, they ought not to establish central technical schools in England. They were all very well abroad, being all of a piece with the policy pursued, where nothing was done by private enterprise, and everything was done by the State. Here, on the contrary, we left as much as possible to local action, and were jealous of central authority. If in England the Government was to begin to do everything, what would become of their Anglo-Saxon independence? It would soon dwindle away and disappear. But it was said that the foreigner had technical education forced upon him, while the Englishman groped his way, and struggled through failure to success. True; but you might buy central assistance at too high a price. History showed that the highest excellence in art might exist with the lowest moral degradation. Mere beauty of design could not save a State in which public spirit had evaporated. The decadence of a nation would not be stopped by grace in a cup and saucer. If the want really existed, those middle classes who were not ignorant of their interests, nor too poor to attain them, would surely supply it. The hon. Member for Banbury had asked him a question with respect to the new Minute of the 21st of December. Two classes of scholarships had been established by it. The first enabled parents to keep their children at the elementary schools longer than they otherwise would; that had already been applied for by about twenty schools; next came the science and art scholarship, which enabled the pupil to go away from his own neighbourhood to a College where he would study in the highest walks of science. The first of these scholarships was procured by competition among the children at any elementary school; one scholarship being given for every 100 children. The second was reached by competition among the science and art pupils. And thirdly, exhibitions were established which enabled students to proceed for three years to College. Thus the Minute provided a ladder by which the humblest pupil might reach the highest possible position to which education could help a man. The Minute had been in operation only three months, yet its introduction had already been followed by results which promised exceedingly well for the future.

MR. BAZLEY wished to state, with reference to what had fallen from the hon. Member for Banbury (Mr. Samuelson) on the subject of London-made watches, that the watch he held in his hand had kept time with a variation of only two minutes during the last ten months.

MR. BRUCE thought the House should feel much obliged to the noble Lord for his careful statement; he had touched upon many topics worthy of consideration, but his own opinion regarding the defects and shortcomings of our educational system was that the remedy would be found in measures of extreme simplicity. The simple fact was that our elementary schools were insufficient in number and quality, and that the want of good elementary schools, especially those of a supplementary kind, formed the real obstacle to the success of science schools. The remedy would be found in the improvement of our elementary schools, and the establishment of what the Commissioners had recommended—namely, schools which should take up the education of pupils after they had done with the elementary schools. But he was convinced we should be unable favourably to compare this country in point of education with Switzerland and Prussia until we had adopted such measures as were in force in those countries. Mr. Matthew Arnold had made a special Report on the canton of Zurich, which he described as about equal in population to the county of Leicester, and, presumably, not superior in wealth. The people of the canton were notoriously frugal, looking to the material prosperity of their country as much as any people in Europe, and not likely to be carried away by enthusiasm. What they did, it might be presumed, was done because they were satisfied it would pay. The canton had a University, a veterinary school, a school of agriculture, two great classical schools, and, besides other special schools, it had fifty-seven secondary and 365 primary schools. Many of these schools Mr. Arnold declared were among the best in Europe; then, how were these results obtained? Zurich devoted nearly one-third of its public income to education, although the canton possessed considerable endowments, and the parents paid more or less for the education of their children. These facts might serve to show that in any attempt to give efficiency to any new educational system, we must incur a considerable outlay. For his part, he believed that they had better make up their minds to establish a system by which the local expenditure should be locally raised and locally supervised.

Lord Robert Montagu

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he understood the right hon. Gentleman who had just addressed the House to have drawn an unfavourable contrast between the state of education in the county of Leicester and in the canton of Zurich. But he (Lord John Manners) did not think it was fair to pick out the county of Leicester for the purpose of that comparison.

MR. BRUCE explained, that he had merely quoted Mr. Arnold's comparison of Zurich with Leicester in the matter of wealth and population.

LORD JOHN MANNERS observed, that the right hon. Member had given statistics to show Zurich's efficiency in educational establishments; he had said nothing regarding Leicestershire's, and his remarks, unless contradicted, would lead the public to imagine some frightful contrast existed between the state of education in Leicestershire and Zurich. ["No!"] Now, he should state that, as far as he was aware, there was nothing to justify such an imputation. There was one manufacturing town—namely, Loughborough—in that portion of Leicestershire which he had the honour to represent, and he ventured to say that there was no other town in England, or even in the canton of Zurich, which was better supplied with schools for the purpose of both primary and the higher branches of education.

MR. HENLEY remarked that of all the strange things which had happened during the last two or three years nothing was more strange than the sudden discovery which some persons appeared to have made of what they called the extreme ignorance of our working classes, and more especially of our artizan class. The strange statements he had come across during the last few months had caused him the greatest surprise. Not three years ago a sort of general triumph was going on in the country over the singular progress of our people, and we were called on to rejoice in the marvellous growth of intelligence observable in the working man. This progress was so great that the wealth of the nation had been doubled in twenty years; and what had produced this? The skill of those very men whom it had been the pleasure of some persons during the last year or two to call all manner of names, in some cases hardly respectful. That increase of wealth which had been pointed to with so much pride had been created by those very men who, in his humble judgment, had not received their fair share of it. He might be right or wrong; but he thought it remarkable that they had heard nothing of this extraordinary ignorance both of masters and men, for the masters were not spared by many persons, until a kind of stoppage came in the great race of prosperity which we were running. As a looker-on he had read in the papers reports by those who had been about the Continent collecting information on the subject, and in every such report it came out, as if in a postscript, that those highly-educated and technically-educated workmen abroad always worked longer hours for less money than their ignorant English competitors. Whether it was desired to reduce English workmen to long hours and short pay he did not know; but that, as far as he had read, was the state of things on the Continent under the system so much commended. One gentleman of the name of Mundella, who gave an account of what he had seen

t some place in Germany, after having alluded to the vast number of the workmen employed, added that to be sure many of them were without shoes or stockings. Now it might be that some of our fellow-countrymen expended a portion of their earnings in clothing themselves and their families instead of applying it to the purposes of technical education; and if they did so he thought the fact was very much to their credit. He was glad that the noble Lord had agreed to grant a Committee on this subject. His own opinion was that if they would give the people of this country a good elementary education those who had better heads than others would get the scientific education that would enable them to lift themselves out of the crowd. But they could not make seamen except upon the sea, and they could not make skilled workmen except in a workshop. They would only deceive themselves if they thought they could train English workmen in schools to be better workmen than they now were. He should wish to see them become better workmen if possible, because if they were better workmen they would be better citizens. But of all those who had talked about foreign competition abroad, not one had asserted that any particular process had been executed by a number of foreign workmen because they had been technically educated. It leaked out in all these cases that these men had worked longer hours for less money than our own workmen. That might be the secret of the competition for anything he knew. The hon. Member for Banbury (Mr. Samuelson) said something about these people abroad giving great attention to small economies. It appeared that he thought our English workmen quite above these small economies. They could not shut their eyes to the vast race which this country had been running for twenty years, in which men with money and men without money, but with credit, had run into all sorts of trades, their object being to find men who knew that which they themselves did not know. It was not possible that these men should find all that they wanted in that direction. It was, however, marvellous to see the extension of manufactures in this country during the last twenty years, to know how the workmen had been found, how they had adapted themselves to the new state of things, and to see the wealth that they had created. Notwithstanding the wealth these men had created and the sanitary improvements that had been made, it was lamentable to think of the frightful death-rate where large numbers of the people were gathered together. For the last twenty years there had hardly been in such cases any decrease of the death-rate. That was a most serious thing for their consideration. These men had been stimulated by considerable wages to create an amount of produce and wealth that was almost unparalleled, and it was astonishing how the demands of the world had been supplied. These men, too, who were so ignorant, were sent for all over the world to teach these "highly-educated people abroad." He was anxious that every means should be taken to improve the education and condition of every class; but there was something at the bottom of this cry about the ignorance of our workpeople which had been raised during the last two years which he could not exactly see or understand. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Merthyr (Mr. Bruce) talked about the agricultural schools of Zurich, but where, he (Mr. Henley) asked, was agriculture in a more advanced state than in England? Where was land to be found of the same fertility which produced a greater amount of produce? Calling men hard names was not a ready way to draw them, and without they had the people with them it was useless to attempt anything for their benefit; but he was sorry to say that during the last few years too many hard names had been applied to many of our fellow-countrymen. These artisans had certainly not had a fair share of that wealth which they had helped to create. It was only about a year and a half ago, in connection with the iron trade at the East End, they heard they must meet the "world's wages." Some gentlemen went over to Belgium, and they published a string of figures. They said that things were cheaper in Belgium but that the work was not so good. He had never seen that the foreign workman, man for man, could turn out more work by the same process than the English workman. But the masters got the work done for less money. He doubted whether, man for man, our men would not work the foreigners' heads off. He could only say that he never saw them put to anything that they did not do it.

MR. T. T. PAGET merely rose to say that the right hon. Member for Merthyr (Mr. Bruce), in the remarks he made, did not convey to his mind the idea that he intended to cast any slur upon Leicestershire. That right hon. Gentleman merely drew a comparison between the position of the canton of Zurich and that of the county of Leicester, as affirmative of the advantages which might be derived in the case of that county from the adoption of a system of education which he was known so warmly to advocate, and of which he (Mr. Paget) was a warm supporter. He was not an advocate of all that which was called technical education, because he thought that it was in some measure a work of supererogation. Such was the opinion he entertained of the skill and knowledge possessed by the British workmen, that he had no fear that they would not be able to compete with the workmen of any country in Europe, if only they received the elementary education which would be afforded them by the scheme propounded by the right hon. Member for Merthyr. He did not believe that his native country was behind other counties in regard to education; but he believed that the present system of education might be greatly extended and ameliorated. Much knowledge on the subject, no doubt, might be obtained from our Continental neighbours, and with a compulsory rate, great advantages would result.

Mr. Henley

MR. ACLAND, after pointing out that farmers were the only class who had prosecuted technical education for the last twenty years, remarked, that the farmer and the manufacturing implement maker, the engineers and the manufacturers very well understood their own business—namely, how to make money; but he was convinced that the time had arrived when merely the art of money making would not enable this country to hold its position. In addition to capital and skill it had become necessary to diffuse amongst their workmen a sound scientific knowledge. He was of opinion that next to a good general education a knowledge of mathematics lay at the foundation of the manufacturing prosperity of this country. In three Registrar General's divisions lying on the coal field from Bristol to the north of Yorkshire there were 7,000,000 inhabitants, and instead of there being, according to calculations which had been made, about 70,000 boys in the public schools of that district learning mathematics, there were only 2,098, while the entire number learning natural science, such as it was, was only 1,009. The hon. Member for Leeds

(Mr. Baines) had cast some blame on the Universities for not doing their part; but he had reason to know that immense efforts were making in the University of Oxford for the express purpose of enabling it to take its proper place in this country in teaching the general principles of science to all comers; and at the present time that University was spending £10,000 on a department of natural philosophy, limited strictly to the subject of physics. He believed Cambridge was equally alive to the importance of scientific teaching.

MR. SAMUELSON, in replying, said, he was glad the noble Lord had acceded to the inquiry he had proposed. With regard to the introduction of workshops into schools, which the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Bazley) had supposed that he favoured, he had never contemplated any such plan, which was being gradually abandoned in the Continental schools. As to Grants for middle-class education, he had not proposed the introduction of the system, as the noble Lord appeared to think, for, in point of fact, such Grants were already made in several cases—as, for instance, to the School of Chemistry and the School of Mines, and a contribution towards the endowment of a chair of engineering had been promised to Edinburgh; but he regarded it as a proper subject for inquiry whether grants of this kind should be continued or increased. As to extended hours of labour, he agreed with the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Henley) in deprecating that system, believing that such labour was in the end the most expensive.

Motion agreed to.

Select Committee appointed, "to inquire into the provisions for giving instruction in theoretical and applied Science to the Industrial Classes."—(Mr. Samuelson.)

And, on March 27, Committee nominated as follows:—MR. ACLAND, MR. AKROYD, MR. BAGNALL, MR. BAZLEY, MR. HENRY AUSTIN BRUCE, MR. BEECROFT, LORD FREDERIC CAVENDISH, MR. DIXON, MR. GRAVES, MR. GREGORY, MR. THOMAS HUGHES, SIR CHARLES LANTON, MR. M'LAGAN, LORD ROBERT MONTAGU, MR. EDMUND POTTER, MR. POWELL, MR. READ, and MR. SAMUELSON:—Power to send for persons, papers, and records; Five to be the quorum.

POST HORSE AND CARRIAGE LICENCES DUTIES, AND HACKNEY CARRIAGE DUTIES.

MOTION FOR A COMMITTEE.

Acts relating thereto read—

MR. ALDERMAN LAWRENCE said, that in proposing a large reduction in these taxes on locomotion, and that a great change should be made in the mode of charging, and in the manner of collecting these duties, he was aware that he was considered by some to be infringing to a certain extent upon the prerogative of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, doubts having been expressed whether any Member who was not a Minister of the Crown was competent to move such a Resolution. He could assure the House, however, that he should confine his Motion within Parliamentary rules and regulations. The taxes to which his Motion referred were levied most unfairly and unequally; were collected at great expense to the Revenue, and involved a considerable loss of time, labour, and money to the parties whom they affected; and acted as restrictions opposed to the first principles of Free Trade, being alike injurious to the trader and the public. The House, and possibly the Chancellor of the Exchequer himself, might be surprised to hear that these taxes were levied in five distinct ways, formed five distinct items of account in the statement of the public Revenue, and, more extraordinary still, were paid on thirty different occasions in each year, some at one place and some at another. For instance, if the same person were the proprietor of an omnibus, a cab, and a brougham, let for hire in London, he would have to pay five distinct duties, and to make the payments in two separate places in the metropolis at thirty different times every year. The only wonder was that the system had lasted so long, and that the business of locomotion continued to be subjected to such exceptional imposts. The stage coach and omnibus mileage duty was levied at a uniform rate of a farthing per mile throughout England, Wales, and Scotland, and in the metropolis the duty was paid monthly at Somerset House. The amount of duty was the same whether the omnibus was drawn by one horse and carried eight passengers, or was drawn by two horses and carried twenty-five passengers, or was drawn by three or four horses and carried thirty-five or forty passengers. The annual licence duty, levied on stage coaches and omnibuses, in addition to the mileage duty, presented this difference, that three guineas were charged for those drawn by two or more horses, and 10s. only on those drawn by one horse and not carrying more than eight passengers. The licence duty was paid annually in the first week in November; but the mileage duty was paid monthly, the proprietors being compelled to send in monthly returns of the licence number on each omnibus belonging to them, the number of journeys run by each on every day during the month, the number of miles of each journey, the total number of miles and the amount of duty. Hon. Members might have observed men at different corners of the streets in the metropolis taking down upon slips of paper the number on the plate of each vehicle as it passed; these slips were sent in daily or weekly to Somerset House, to check the returns of the omnibus proprietors; and the cost of the ten or fifteen stations where these men took their stand was something like £1,500 or £2,000 a year. It followed, from what he had already stated, that the omnibus proprietors or their agents in the metropolis had to attend at Somerset House and make payments thirteen times a year for the duties. Throughout the country eight payments sufficed; but the House could imagine the amount of labour involved in furnishing and checking these returns. Ireland he excepted from the calculation altogether, because the system there was not identical with that prevailing in Great Britain. The post horse and carriage licence duties were levied differently in the country and in the metropolis. Hackney carriages, cabs and flys plying for hire in the public streets were taxed under these duties in every city and town throughout Great Britain, with the single exception of London. These duties were levied on an entirely wrong principle of taxation, and one which aggravated the difference between the man of capital and the man of small means. Although an alteration was made in the scale of duties in 1866, by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, which somewhat mitigated the evil, yet the evil still existed, because the larger the business carried on the less in proportion was the duty paid. For example, under the present scale of duties, the proprietor of one horse and one carriage paid £5 per annum; of twenty horses and fifteen carriages, £70 per annum; and of fifty horses and twenty-five carriages, £100 per annum. These duties were paid differently from the stage-coach and omnibus mileage duty, being paid once a quarter or four times a year in advance at the nearest district office of the Inland Revenue, each proprietor making a return of the number of horses and carriages which he employed. Then with respect to cab duties, the grievance here was still greater. The proprietor of cabs at Liverpool, Edinburgh, Birmingham, Brighton, and other places paid the post horse duty, the charge for which commenced at £5 for one carriage, and diminished on each additional carriage in proportion to the number kept. But in London the proprietor of one cab had to pay £19 5s. per annum, and the like sum for each additional cab. This was enormous. That the system should have lasted so long was most extraordinary! It was true that if he used it only six days in the week he paid only £16 13s. But compare this amount with the sum paid in other towns. In the metropolis there were proprietors who had as many as fifty cabs, and they had exacted from them fifty times the charge of one cab. This was altogether a different principle from that of the post horse duty prevailing in the country. So that the proprietor of fifty cabs in London had to pay the enormous duty of £962 10s. per annum, while the proprietor of fifty cabs at Liverpool, Edinburgh, Brighton, &c., had to pay only £170 per annum. The complaint was often heard that the metropolis was not supplied with vehicles as it ought to be, and that the London cabs were not equal to those of Birmingham or Manchester and other English towns, and compared most unfavourably with those of Continental cities. But it should be remembered that in London the highest possible duty was exacted, and the lowest fare awarded, the fares being much less in London than in any other city or town. It was perfectly clear that between the two a very good article could not be supplied. The duty was originally imposed as a war duty, and hackney carriages and sedan chairs in London were taxed at the same time, when there were only 800 hackney carriages and 300 sedan chairs: it was made a security for a loan, and its duration was limited to thirty-two years; but it had not been taken off when the war had ceased, and had been allowed still to continue, to the great disadvantage of the public. The stage carriage duties and the post horse duties were originally imposed in 1779, the largest amount received from them being in the year 1836, when £524,500 was received for stage carriage duties, and £266,500 for post horse duties. The metropolis had submitted to those large taxes, because neither the public nor the cab proprietors were aware that they were paying so much in excess of what was paid in other towns, and he believed that even many Members of that House were not aware of the difference. It might be asked why were there so many cabs if they did not pay? But it was well known that they were starving the cabmen out, and it would be seen from the Returns issued at Somerset House that in April, 1867, the number of cabs in the metropolis had diminished by 304, and there had been a further diminution of 500 this year, and the number was still decreasing. It was all one trade whether cabs or omnibuses were employed, or post horses and carriages were let for hire, and why, then, was there such a difference made in the amount of duty and the mode of paying it? How did the cab proprietors pay the duty? Once a year they had to pay the licence duty of £1 for each cab, which was due on the 1st of January, and must be paid before the end of March in each year; they had to pay the remainder of the duty at Somerset House monthly. In this metropolis, there were 2,000 cab proprietors, of whom 1,400 owned only a single cab, and from the first Monday to the first Friday in each month the duty was received at Somerset House. There the men went in droves, and, although great improvements had been made in the mode of receiving the duty, yet it was well known that they were often obliged to wait one, two, or even three hours before they were able to pay it. The loss of time incurred in that way might be taken as equivalent to a loss of 2s. 6d. on each occasion, and if, from sickness or any other cause, a cab proprietor was not able to pay the duty between the first Monday of the month and the Friday following, immediately on the Saturday a summons was issued by a solicitor in Chancery Lane, and he had to go and pay that gentleman a fine of 10s. and make arrangements for paying the duty within a certain limited time. The cab proprietors were supplied with fresh licence number plates from Somerset House every three years, and an additional plate, with a different number, was affixed to each cab by the police, certifying that it was fit for public use. A saving of expense might be effected here. Now, the suggestion he would make was this—that all the present taxes should be abrogated and the restrictions removed, and in lieu thereof an annual licence duty, similar to the duty so successfully imposed upon dogs, should be levied, payable in one sum in advance. By this arrangement a great boon would be conferred upon the proprietors of public vehicles and the public, and a large saving would be effected in the heavy expenses now incurred in the collection of these taxes. He would suggest that an annual licence duty of £1 should be levied upon each horse, whether it was used to draw a cab, an omnibus, or a brougham let for hire; and that an annual licence duty of £2 should be levied upon each vehicle, whether it was a cab, an omnibus, or a brougham or other carriage let for hire, and drawn by one or more horses. The London cab proprietors required five horses for two cabs, so that the tax would amount to £4 10s. annually upon each cab, instead of the present duty of £19 5s. As to omnibuses, which required ten horses, £1 for each horse and £2 for the vehicle would give £12 for each omnibus in London, instead of the present duty of £24 per annum; and the same ratio would hold good throughout the country. As to horses and carriages charged under the post horse duty, one horse and one carriage would pay a duty of £3 per annum, instead of £5, and three horses and two carriages would pay £7 per annum, instead of £10 as at present. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue, in their tenth Report, pointed out, in reference to the post horse duty, that the circumstances of the times had completely changed since 1779, when this duty was first imposed, and that the incidence of a burthen originally borne exclusively by the wealthiest classes has been shifted to those who were formerly exempt from it. The people who are most affected by this tax are those who hire carriages, because they cannot afford to keep their own; and the posting business in the old form has almost entirely disappeared. Jobmasters in London and in the great provincial towns, and owners of frys which ply in the streets of those towns and at the railway stations are those who are primarily charged with the tax, and if the removal of it should not cause much reduction in the cost of hired carriages, it would undoubtedly afford more accommodation to the public by an increase in the number of such conveyances—especially at small railway stations in the country. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue also state, that the reduction which had now been made in the stage carriage duty was only a step towards placing it on the same footing as the railway duty, and that the present tax of  $\frac{1}{4}$ d. per mile on omnibuses was nearly twice their share of taxation at the same rate as the railways. The Commissioners were of opinion that the time must come when the subject would be taken into consideration. The one great advantage of placing the duty in the form in which he (Alderman Lawrence) had recommended would be the abolition of all restrictions whatever, thus enabling the proprietors of horses and carriages to use them in any manner they pleased. It would enable a tradesman in a small town, by paying £3 a year duty, to keep a horse and a wagonette, which he might use to carry passengers to and from the nearest railway station on market days, and also to let out the vehicle for hire when required. If he were to do this at the present time, he would have to take out two separate licences and pay two different duties. He would now state what the difference would be in the receipts under the present system and those which might be expected if his plan were adopted. He had been unable to obtain from the Report of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue an exact account of the duties received in 1867; but a Return moved for by his hon. Friend the Member for Manchester (Mr. Bazley) gave the figures. For the year ended 31st of March, 1867, the hackney carriage duties and licences amounted to £113,000; the stage coach and omnibus mileage duty and licence duties, and the supplementary and occasional licences, to £74,200; the postmasters' and jobmasters' licence duties to £141,400; and the drivers' licences to £3,300—making a total of £331,900. The higher duties had not all expired in 1867. For 1868, he was obliged to make an approximate estimate; but one which, he believed, would be found tolerably accurate. He estimated that the total amount of the duties for the year ending 31st of March, 1868, would be £294,000, consisting of hackney carriage duties, £104,500; stage coach and omnibus mileage duty, and licence duties, and supplementary and occasional duties, £46,500; postmasters' and jobmasters' £140,000 ; drivers, £3,000. The change he suggested would cause a loss to the Revenue of about £120,000 or £125,000 ; but from this must be deducted the saving that would result from the reduction of the staff kept at Somerset House and throughout the country in consequence of the existing system, and also the saving arising from the abolition of the ten or fifteen stations in the metropolis for checking the omnibus duties. He was afraid that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, while not disputing his facts or denying that a change would be desirable, might plead the Abyssinian War, and the fact that other taxes were falling in amount. Now, he could not agree in the doctrine which had been laid down this evening—namely, that no re-adjustment of taxation should take place except when there was a surplus ; because if that proposition were true, no burdens ought to be lightened till we had paid off the National Debt. Then, as to Abyssinia, since our expenditure, there was by millions and additional taxation had to be imposed, whether an additional sum of £100,000 had to be raised or not, could make no appreciable difference. But he (Mr. Alderman Lawrence) was able to suggest a plan by which, if the trade were thrown open, the Revenue for the year ending the 31st of March, 1869, would gain instead of lose by the change. Supposing the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer were to fix the alteration to take place on the 1st of October next (the time when the present stage coach and omnibus licences are renewable), and that the proposed annual licence duties of £1 per horse and £2 per vehicle should then become payable, he would receive before the 31st of March, 1869, the following sums:—namely, six months' duty on hackney carriages to the 1st of October, 1868, £50,000, and arrears, £4,000 ; six months' stage coach duty, £18,000, and arrears, £6,000 ; supplementary and occasional duties, £2,000 ; postmasters and jobmasters, £70,000, and arrears, £1,000 ; making a total of £151,000. The new duties payable on the 1st of October, 1868, may be estimated as follows : Hackney carriages (say 7,000), amount of duty, £31,500 ; stage coaches and omnibuses, £22,500 ; postmasters and jobmasters, £110,000 ; total amount of new duties, £164,000 ; making, with the six months' old duties of £151,000, a total amount receivable before the 31st of March, 1869, of £315,000, being a gain to the Revenue over the amount received for these duties in 1868 of £21,000. In addition to this, there would be the saving in the cost of the collection for the last six months of the year. He would not give the House the trouble of dividing ; but would move that the House do resolve itself into Committee to consider the taxes on locomotion, with a view to their being revised, reduced, and equalized.

Mr. Alderman Lawrence

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House will immediately resolve itself into a Committee to consider the said Acts."—(Mr. Alderman Lawrence.)

MR. AYRTON said, that, in 1861, he presided over a Committee which investigated the subject of hackney carriages. The tax on these was originally a local tax, for the repair of roads in the metropolis ; but it was found so profitable that it was transferred into the national Exchequer. There it had ever since remained. After the Committee reported deputations waited on the Chancellor of the Exchequer (the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire), who intimated that it was desirable to re-consider the whole of the taxes on locomotion. The present Prime Minister, when addressing the House on the question of finance, recognized that principle, and stated that as soon as the state of the finances of the country permitted, he would consider the matter with a view to the abrogation of the present system. He was sorry that his hon. Friend had not contented himself with urging these general views ; and that he should, instead of insisting upon the total remission of these taxes, have anticipated the functions of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and proposed a sort of equinal Budget. It would be a great misfortune if the Government should undertake to re-adjust these taxes on the scheme which had been suggested, instead of applying themselves to their total remission. Instead of being able to repeal taxes on horses and carriages in this country, we were driving mules and carriages in Abyssinia. He was afraid it was hopeless to ask the Government to pursue the settled policy of the House, and to re-consider the whole of the taxes on locomotion. However, at present he should oppose going into Committee on the subject.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER had already touched upon this question, and had said he thought it would be highly desirable, when a convenient opportunity arose, to consider the whole question of taxes on locomotion, and he saw no reason to change this opinion. Against one remark made by the hon. Member he must enter his protest. The hon. Member said that, at a time when we were spending millions, the spending of another £100,000 did not much matter. He would rather insist that when they were compelled to spend such large sums in one direction they were all the more bound to practise economy in another. The hon. Member estimated the financial loss in this instance at only £120,000. The loss estimated by that Department was £137,000; but it was also calculated that his proposals, though in effect a relief taken broadly, would in certain cases involve a considerable additional charge. For example, in one case, the average charge for one-horse omnibus was now £2 10s. 7d.; but it would be £3 under the plan suggested; so that the hon. Member would impose there an additional charge of 9s. 5d. The House would hardly expect him on that occasion to enter into a question which ought to be considered in all its bearings. Even if the Government were prepared to make the sacrifice recommended, they would not be able to adopt the hon. Member's scheme in its entirety. He hoped that the Motion would be withdrawn, and that the question of the alteration of the duties on locomotion would be left to the proper occasion.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, that if relief from these taxes were delayed until our finances were in the favourable condition desired we might wait a long time. He thought the thanks of the House were due to his hon. Friend for having called attention to this question, which pressed very unequally and unjustly upon cabmen and omnibus keepers.

MR. ALDERMAN LAWRENCE said, he was not surprised at the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets dissenting from any scheme he had not himself proposed. If the country was to wait for the time when the Government was prepared to remit the whole tax, he believed they would have to wait a very long time indeed. The Home Secretary was preparing a Bill to regulate the hackney carriages of the metropolis, and he could assure the right hon. Gentleman that it would be impossible to impose further restrictions upon the proprietors unless this enormous taxation were reduced. He would leave the matter in the hands of the Government, and withdraw his Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

BOROUGHES AND DIVISIONS OF COUNTIES BILL.—LEAVE.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY moved for leave to introduce a Bill to settle and describe the Limits of certain Boroughs and the Divisions of certain Counties in England and Wales, in so far as respects the Election of Members to serve in Parliament. He said it was not necessary for him to make any statement, as there had been a Parliamentary Commission, and the Bill would be introduced in the shape in which the Commission had reported to the House; and he therefore simply moved for leave to bring in the Bill.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to settle and describe the Limits of certain Boroughs and the Divisions of certain Counties in England and Wales, in so far as respects the Election of Members to serve in Parliament, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Secretary GATHORNE HARDY, Mr. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, and Sir JAMES FERGUSSON.

LONDON COAL AND WINE DUTIES CONTINUANCE BILL.

(Mr. Dodson, Lord John Manners, Mr. Hunt.)

[BILL 43.] COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. CANDLISH moved that the House go into Committee on the Bill that day six months: firstly, in deference to a sense of duty to his constituents; and secondly, because he regarded the Bill as essentially bad in itself. The Bill did not propose to impose a duty upon coals brought into London; that existed already; but it proposed to hypothecate the coal duties for seven years, from 1882 to 1889, and so withdraw them from the control of Parliament for twenty-one years. The duties were obstructive to trade, and particularly to the coal trade of the Newcastle district. He was surprised that the Bill was not opposed by metropolitan Members; for the coal duties were a tax upon one of the first necessities of human life to the amount of 1s. 7d. per head per annum for each man, woman, and child in the London district. Coal, too, was one of the raw materials entering into nearly all our manufacturing operations, and hence these dues were a tax upon all our manufacturing processes. London ought to provide for its municipal necessities by local taxation, and not by octroi duties.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

MR. SAMUDA seconded the Motion. He believed the tax was much more injurious now than when it was first proposed. At first, London was the only district for manufactured goods; but now they met with competition all over the Continent. In France, for instance, all the materials for shipbuilding were free; and coals were actually cheaper in France than in London, though this country supplied coal to all parts of the world. At this moment, the French manufacturers were paying 1s. 1½d. per ton less for coal than the manufacturers of London. The Bill was also objectionable because it proposed to deal with a tax which was not available at the present time; but which had been forestalled for the next twelve or fourteen years. That was a process which could only be likened to an extravagant youth selling a post obit. Among the many resources from which money might be obtained for metropolitan improvement none was so unjust as that proposed in the Bill. He should certainly follow his hon. Friend into the Lobby if the Motion were pressed to a division.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House will, upon this day six months, resolve itself into the said Committee,"—(Mr. Candlish,)—instead thereof.

MR. PEASE declared that the tax was opposed to the interests of the coal-producing districts, because the increase of price was a great bar to their industry. The collieries in the North were working four or five days a week, and were they to be exposed to a further detriment by means of this tax? It was a tax of 8 or 9 per cent on the shipbuilding in the River Thames, and when the industry of the Thames was crippled it was a fit time to call the attention of the House to this tax. It was a grievous tax on the poor of the metropolis, and injuriously affected the districts around the metropolis which derived no benefit from the City improvements. He opposed the Bill.

MR. LABOUCHERE, while regarding this as an excessively bad mode of raising money, thought it better that the funds should be raised even from this source than that the improvements now in progress should be stopped. The noble Lord (Lord John Manners), he understood, proposed that a portion of the money should be expended out of the metropolitan police area in freeing the bridges over the Thames, and therefore it was not his intention to continue to oppose the Bill, in accordance with the Notice which he had placed upon the Paper. He should, however, move an Amendment when the Bill went into Committee.

LORD JOHN MANNERS remarked, that the opposition to the measure did not proceed from the representatives of the constituencies who would have to pay the duty; but from Gentlemen who represented constituencies in a remote part of the kingdom. The hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Candlish) had clearly explained the object of his opposition, when he stated that he spoke in the interests of his constituents; but in reality the hon. Gentleman was not correct in saying that the interests of his constituents would be in any way prejudiced by the Bill, for the coal duty, as it now existed, did not operate as a bar to the export of coal from Newcastle and Sunderland. The quantity of coal exported thence into the metropolis was annually on the increase. In 1863, the imports into London amounted to 5,127,000 tons; in 1864, to 5,476,000 tons; in 1865, to 5,909,000 tons; and in 1866, to 6,029,000 tons. The hon. Gentleman wondered that the metropolis did not find some local object of taxation in order to carry out local improvements as other towns did; but surely the hon. Gentleman could not be ignorant of the fact that a number of other large towns—such as Dublin and Brighton—had recourse to this very mode of levying funds for local purposes. When the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Pease) objected to the tax as interfering with the consumption of coals, he ought not to overlook the fact that Newcastle itself placed an export duty of 2d. a chaldron on coal sent to the metropolis; and, until the hon. Member induced the municipal authorities of Newcastle to abolish that duty, it was hardly consistent in him to endeavour to withstand the wishes of the inhabitants of the metropolis and to oppose the present measure. The hon. Member for Tavistock (Mr. Samuda) had suggested that the Government might propose some substitute but surely it was the duty of the opponents of the Bill to make a suggestion on that point. The House would remember that two years ago the Metropolitan Board of works proposed to make three most necessary improvements in the metropolis, stating at the same time that they had not the requisite funds to carry them out. These three measures were submitted to the Committee over which the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets presided, and the Committee, after taking evidence, came to the determination by a majority of votes that these public improvements should be carried out by a continuation of the Coal and Wine Duties. That determination was sanctioned by the Government, the City of London, who had in hand the Holborn Valley Improvement, and the Metropolitan Board of Works. Last year fifty-nine Petitions were presented from different bodies who would come under this taxation, praying that the Bill might be passed into law. Under these circumstances—without saying that this was the best system of taxation, or that some better system might not in course of time be devised—he was confident that if the House wished the immense public improvements of the Thames Embankment, the widening of Park Lane, and the viaduct over the Holborn Valley to be carried out, it would reject the Amendment which had been moved.

MR. WATKIN trusted the House was not to be considered as a mere vestry meeting in the City of London; for the question affected not merely the metropolis, but the production of minerals all over the country, and also manufactures within the district of the metropolis itself. The tax was not going to expire until 1882. Surely, under the circumstances, this measure might be left for the consideration of a Parliament elected by household suffrage. Had the small consumers who suffered most from the existence of the tax met together to say that this was a desirable form of taxation? In the country the people said that in consequence of this tax, which they called a tax upon production, trade was being abolished. He thought the noble Lord (Lord John Manners) might very well postpone this till, as there were several years to consider it. He hoped the hon. Member for Underland (Mr. Candlish) would not be intimidated, but go to a division upon his amendment.

MR. GOSCHEN said, what the House really had to consider was this—the House having sanctioned certain Bills for certain improvements, how were those improvements to be paid for? He was not going to say that the coal tax was the best tax; but what he asked was, from what source of revenue were the improvements to be carried out? That was a question which might be fairly put before the House. When the Acts sanctioning the improvements had once passed, it seemed to him a somewhat illogical proceeding for hon. Gentlemen to oppose the only mode of carrying them out. The hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. Watkin) said that, in the country, people did not like this matter to be looked upon from a metropolitan point of view; but he would remind the hon. Gentleman that what the people of the metropolis had to look to was, whether they preferred an increase in their rates, or the passing of the noble Lord's Bill. If hon. Members would propose some means by which the funds could be got without increasing the taxation of the metropolis, they would perform a considerable service to the metropolis; but he had not heard of any counter proposal. Surely the people of the metropolis were the best judges of what taxes they ought to bear, and he might say that the working classes of the metropolis strongly protested against any increase of taxation. He did not say the measure of the noble Lord was the best measure that could be produced; but, seeing that there was no alternative proposal before the House, he had no option but to vote with the noble Lord. The House had sanctioned all the works for which this tax was to provide—for instance, the Holborn Valley improvements. For these, a 6*d.* improvement rate had been proposed, but it had been rejected by the efforts of the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton), and now no resource was left except the coal tax.

COLONEL HOGG, as a member of the Metropolitan Board of Works, could tell the hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. Watkin) that, unless this Bill was passed, it would be impossible, from want of funds, to make the approaches to the Thames Embankment. It would also be impossible to complete the improvements in Park Lane, or to finish the Chelsea Embankment; and he might add that the latter work was necessary for the completion of the low level sewer.

MR. AYRTON said, that in the Select Committee which had been referred to, he made a proposal against the continuance of this tax; but the noble Lord the Chief Commissioner of Works proposed an Amendment, and that Amendment was carried, because the hon. Member for South Northumberland, who was appointed on the Committee to protect the interests of the coalowners, voted with the noble Lord. Therefore, if the coal-owners suffered they ought to know whom to blame. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone) approved his scheme. The present Government also adopted it, and the noble Lord introduced his Bill continuing the Coal duties while he was requested to bring in his Bill; both were to proceed pari passu. It was found to be impossible to pass his Bill last Session, and the noble Lord withdrew his. In the present Session, his right hon. Friend (Mr. Goschen), the Member for the City of London, brought forward the subject of metropolitan finance, and the Government thought it their duty to consider the question, and accept the responsibility of proposing a scheme to carry out metropolitan improvements. This Bill was accordingly introduced. The responsibility rested entirely with the Government, and the metropolitan Members had no option but to accept it, although they considered it a very bad Bill.

COLONEL W. STUART complained of the injustice of taxing rural districts for metropolitan improvements, simply because the coals they consumed passed through London.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 147; Noes 83: Majority 114.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clause 2 (Coal Duty of Fourpence to be applied by Corporation of London for Improvements).

MR. LABOUCHERE moved, to add words to allow the Corporation of London to give a drawback for the coal duty to certain manufacturers carrying on business within half a mile of the county of Bucks. He explained that it was intended that this power should have reference to certain papermakers, whose places of business were just within the line of taxation, and who had to compete with other papermakers whose places were just on the other side of the line.

MR. AYRTON said, the chief objection to the insertion of the words was that the Mayor and Corporation of London had no power whatever over these duties, which were paid into the Treasury. The last time the House passed this Bill the town of Hertford, which was under the patronage of the then Prime Minister, was exempted from its operation. He did not know whether the county of Bucks was under the patronage of the present Prime Minister. Perhaps it would be better to exempt from the operation of the Act the coal used in all manufactories.

MR. COWPER denied that the town of Hertford was mentioned in any Acts of Parliament relating to this subject.

COLONEL HOGG opposed the Amendment.

MR. LOCKE observed, that although the name of Hertford was not expressly mentioned in any of these Acts, alterations had been made in the boundaries of the district affected by the Act, which had had the effect of excluding Hertford from its operation.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, it would be very difficult to adopt the proposition of the hon. Member for Middlesex, as it would interfere with the boundaries which had been fixed by competent authority.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he would withdraw his Amendment.

MR. AYRTON said, as the Amendment had been withdrawn, he should move the addition to Clause 2 of the following words:—

"For every ton of Coals consumed for any purpose of manufacture in any factory separate from any dwelling house, there shall be allowed to the consumer of such Coals a drawback of one shilling a ton, provided such consumer shall comply with such regulations and conditions as may be prescribed by the said mayor, aldermen, and commons, and approved by one of Her Majesty's Secretaries of State, to ascertain the amount of such drawback, and to prevent any abuse therein."

There were other industries besides those which had been mentioned; he referred especially to the case of the iron ship-builders, upon whom the tax of 1s. 1d. per ton was peculiarly oppressive.

Amendment proposed, at the end of the Clause, to add the words—

"Provided, That for every ton of Coals consumed for any purpose of manufacture in any factory separate from any dwelling house, there shall be allowed to the consumer of such Coals a drawback of one shilling a ton, provided such consumer shall comply with such regulations and conditions may be prescribed by the said mayor, aldermen, and commons, and approved by one of Her Majesty's Secretaries of State, to ascertain the amount of such drawback, and to prevent any abuse there-

—(Mr. Ayrton.)

LORD JOHN MANNERS regretted that he could not assent to that Amendment. The Committee having sanctioned the continuance of those dues for the limited period of seven years, on the assumption that they would be levied on all classes of consumers within the prescribed radius, it was now impossible to exempt a large class of consumers from their operation. If such an exemption were allowed, it would be necessary to impose those dues for an additional number of years. If there was a class of persons who ought to contribute their fair share of the funds required for cleansing and embanking the Thames, improving the thoroughfares, and all the other great works to which the coal dues were applicable, it was the manufacturers, who by the nature of their business did so much to obstruct those thoroughfares and pollute the river.

MR. WATKIN supported the Amendment, and asked for statistics as to the proportion which the amount of coal tax collected from the manufacturers bore to the total proceeds of the impost.

MR. LOCKE said, that what the manufacturers complained of was that, while they paid as high rates and taxes as the rest of the community as ordinary householders, they were subjected to a heavy extra tax on the trade they carried on. The Thames iron shipbuilders naturally had to pay more for their coals than their rivals on the Clyde, and yet an additional impost of 13*d.* per ton was extracted from them for the fuel they consumed. He would support the Amendment if it were pressed to a division.

MR. SAMUDA also pointed out the onerous character of the tax as affecting the struggling iron shipbuilders of East London, who had lately been called upon to pay rates, not on their buildings alone, as formerly was the case, but also on their plant. Within the last seventeen years fifteen of the shipbuilding firms of the metropolis had failed in their business, or discontinued building, and these firms had during their existence employed 4,000 persons; which really meant that they had provided the means of support to about 10,000 individuals. It was now vitally important that the trade should not be too heavily loaded with taxation. He thought that some such Amendment as that proposed by the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets should be adopted.

Mr. Ayrton

COLONEL HOGG remarked, that as the evidence given before the Committee showed, in spite of the taxation complained of, the profits on the London shipbuilding trade at the time admitted of one of the witnesses making extensions which would cost £100,000—a fact which justly excited comment on the part of the Committee. He opposed the proviso on the ground that the tax was absolutely necessary to meet engagements entered into. The noble Lord had given every possible care and attention to the affairs of the metropolis, and all persons connected with it ought to be grateful to him.

MR. GOSCHEN said, he should be reluctant to throw difficulties in the way of the manufacturers; and, if the case were perfectly free, he should be inclined to vote for the Amendment; but they were in reality discussing what was to happen sixteen years hence. He regretted that their taxation should have reached such a point that they were obliged to begin to pledge the revenues that would only accrue sixteen years hence. For his part he would rather say let them get rid of the matter as soon as they could. He thought it would be better to leave the tax as it was than to begin and establish differences which could not begin until sixteen years from the present day. The difficulty would arise of deciding what was a manufacture at the interval of sixteen years, and he therefore thought it would be best to allow the matter to stand as it is.

MR. AYRTON thought that his right hon. Friend was mistaken in supposing that the proviso would not take effect at once, and, in case he was not mistaken, he would alter his proviso to the extent that it should take effect from and after the day on which the Bill may pass.

Question put, "That those words be there added."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 30; Noes 146: Majority 116.

Clause agreed to.

Remaining clauses agreed to.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, that it being felt as a grievance by those who lived in the district outside the Metropolitan Board's area, but who were, nevertheless, subject to the Coal and Wine

Duties, that they could receive no direct benefit from their imposition, he begged leave to move the addition of the following Clause:—

“That the several Coal and Wine Duties by this Act continued for the year ending the fifth day of July, one thousand eight hundred and eighty nine, shall be applied in the first instance in freeing from toll the following Bridges on the Thames: viz., Kew, Kingston upon Thames, Hampton Court, Walton upon Thames, and Staines; and next in making free from toll Chingford Bridge and Tottenham Mills Bridge upon the River Lee; and should there be any surplus remaining the same shall be applied as Parliament may hereafter direct.”

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS proposed, that in the event of any arrangements being proposed for freeing toll-bridges by means of the Coal and Wine Duties, the Creek Bridge at Deptford should be included.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER thought the two bridges at Battersea should be included.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, if the clause was to include bridges within the metropolitan area, the dues would have to be continued for a much longer time.

MR. GOSCHEN said, the boon was given distinctly as a compensation for those bridges beyond the metropolitan area, the inhabitants of those districts receiving no advantage from the tolls.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, that to include the bridges within the metropolitan area would be a departure from the principle upon which they were asked to agree to the clause. He trusted that the hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Alderman Salomons) would withdraw his Amendment.

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS said, that rather than have his Amendment rejected he would withdraw it.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause added to the Bill.

MR. AYRTON moved a clause providing for the audit of the accounts.

At the suggestion of Mr. SCLATER-BOOTH, the clause was withdrawn, with a view to its introduction upon the Report.

MR. WALDEGRAVE - LESLIE remarked that the Bill had no Preamble. To supply the deficiency, he moved the adoption of the Preamble of the previous Continuance Act.

LORD JOHN MANNERS had been assured by the highest authority that a Continuance Bill like this required no Preamble.

Motion negatived.

House resumed.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered upon Thursday.

RAILWAYS (GUARDS' AND PASSENGERS' COMMUNICATION) BILL.

(Mr. Henry B. Sheridan, Sir Patrick O'Brien.)

[BILL 66.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. STEPHEN CAVE said, he would ask the hon. Member for Dudley (Mr. H. B. Sheridan) to postpone the second reading; partly, because the Bill had not been distributed, though he believed it was in the Bill Office; and partly, because clauses requiring a communication to be made between the guards and passengers of railway trains had been introduced in a Bill brought into the other House by his noble Friend the President of the Board of Trade. It would be more convenient to wait until that measure came down to them, and then the House would see whether the principle for which the hon. Member had so long contended had been sufficiently carried out in the Government Bill.

MR. H. B. SHERIDAN said, he had no objection to the course proposed by the right hon. Gentleman.

Second Reading deferred till Tuesday, 21st April.

COMPULSORY CHURCH RATES ABOLITION BILL—[BILL 72.]

(Mr. Gladstone, Sir George Grey, Sir Roundell Palmer.)

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Bill be now read the third time.”—(Mr. Gladstone.)

MR. HENLEY hoped the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire would not go on with the Bill. [“Oh, oh!”] He thought reasonable time ought to be given to consider the Bill as it now stood. The Amendments have been put in by instalments, and time ought to be given to consider them. [“Oh!”]

SIR ROUNDELL PALMER said, the right hon. Gentleman must well know that the Amendments were the result of the discussion which had taken place upon the Bill, and in reality did not alter the general character of the Bill at all. The amendments were some days on the Paper, and no hon. Member offered any objection to them. The object of the new clauses had been to put church rates in parishes under local Acts as nearly as possible on the same footing with church rates elsewhere; to prevent the parishioners in new parishes from voting in respect of voluntary rates at vestries of the original or old parishes; and to allow owners the option of paying the rate instead of occupiers, giving them a vote in case they did so.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, it was his intention to move the adjournment of the House. ["Oh!"] The hon. and learned gentleman who last addressed the House had not said a word as to the purport of the Bill as it now stood. He (Mr. Newdegate) could show that the Bill as it now stood virtually infringed the parochial system of the country. He begged to move the Adjournment of the House.

Whereupon Motion made, and Question, "That this House do now adjourn,"—(Mr. Newdegate,)—put, and negatived.

Question again proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."

MR. SCHREIBER, remarking that it was not desirable that the House should adjourn until the Mutiny Bill had been introduced, moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Schreiber.)

The House divided:—Ayes 28; Noes 31: Majority 103.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that as the Motion for the third reading had been made after one o'clock in the morning, and as great exertions had been made to collect the party opposite while there were but few on that (the Ministerial) side of the House, he would make no further opposition. He would only say that the Bill would destroy the parochial system of the Church of England.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

Sir Roundell Palmer

INVESTMENT OF TRUST FUNDS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Mr. HENRY B. SHERIDAN, Bill to amend the Investment of Trust Funds Act, ordered to be brought in by Mr. HENRY B. SHERIDAN and Mr. AYRTON.

REVENUE OFFICERS DISABILITIES REMOVAL BILL.

On Motion of Mr. MONK, Bill to relieve certain officers employed in the collection and management of Her Majesty's Revenues from any legal disability to vote at the Election of Members to serve in Parliament, ordered to be brought in by Mr. MONK, Sir HARRY VERNY, and Mr. OTWAY. Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 76.]

MUTINY BILL.

On Motion of Mr. DODSON, Bill for punishing Mutiny and Desertion, and for the better Payment of the Army and their Quarters, ordered to be brought in by Mr. DODSON, Sir JOHN PAKINGTON, and The JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL. Bill presented, and read the first time.

WAYS AND MEANS.

Resolution reported;

"That, towards making good the Supply granted to Her Majesty for the Service of the year ending 31st day of March 1869, the sum of £8,000,000 be granted out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland."

Resolution agreed to:—Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. DODSON, Mr. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, and Mr. SCLATER-BOOTH.

Bill presented, and read the first time.

House adjourned at half after One o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, March 25, 1868.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—Second Reading—Grand Jury Cess (Ireland) [14], negatived; Tancred's Charity [67], negatived; Consolidated Fund* (£8,000,000); Mutiny. Committee—Industrial Schools (Ireland) [6]—[R.P.]

IRELAND—THE TOWER OF ARDFERT—KERRY GRAND JURY.

QUESTION.

THE O'DONOGHUE said, he rose to ask Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Whether, as a Conditional Order has been granted by the Court of Queen's Bench to quash a Presentment of the Kerry Grand Jury, enabling Mr. Crosbie of Ardfert to close up the roads leading to as well as the Tower of Ardfert, it is not illegal for Mr. Crosbie to take any further steps in the matter, pending the final decision of the Court of Queen's Bench? He might, perhaps, be allowed to add that he has been informed that the proceedings of Mr. Crosbie have created great consternation amongst the people; and that he asked this Question in order, if possible, to prevent any rioting or breach of the peace in the neighbourhood.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WARREN) said, in reply, he was not aware that it was the province of an hon. Member to ask Questions of the Law Officers in reference to a civil case pending before a Court of Justice, and as this was a Question of that sort he could not enter into any explanation of it. In fact, the matter to which the hon. Member's Question referred was entirely one of a private dispute. It was one in which the Attorney General had no right or power to interfere, and, as he had told the hon. Member privately yesterday, if there were any legal remedy it could be sought in the ordinary way.

GRAND JURY CESS (IRELAND) BILL.

(Mr. Stacpoole, Mr. Corbally, The O'Connor Don.)

[BILL 14.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. STACPOOLE, in rising to move the second reading of this Bill said, it was a measure which would be received in Ireland with a great deal of gratitude. Its object was to oblige Irish landlords to contribute directly to the county cess; to effect an equitable distribution of it between the landlord and the tenant; and to give the occupiers some control over the expenditure, by fuller representation of the cess payers at the presentment sessions. At present all the cess was paid by the occupiers, and the landlords paid none of it, or only paid the cess on any tenements they held in their own hands; though the improvements effected by the expenditure of the cess in the formation of roads increased the value of their property. As Grand Juries were at present constituted, the cesspayers had really no voice in the determination of the amount of cess to be levied.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Stacpoole.)

THE EARL OF MAYO said, he hoped the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Stacpoole) would not press the second reading, as the whole question of the Grand Jury Laws, which involved the subject dealt with by the Bill, had been referred to a Select Committee at the instance of the hon. and gallant Member for Roscommon (Colonel French). The House, having taken that step, would not think it right to express any opinion upon the subject till the result of the labours of the Committee should be known. The county cess was not wholly paid by the occupier. The proprietors paid their proportion of it. It was, in fact, a charge upon the land, and it came eventually out of the landlord's pocket. It might be a subject for the Committee to inquire into whether, in reference to future lettings, the incidence of the county cess should not be assimilated to that of the poor rates; but existing contracts could not be disturbed without inflicting great injustice. He begged to move, as an Amendment, that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(The Earl of Mayo.)

THE O'CONOR DON agreed with the noble Earl in thinking, that while the Select Committee was sitting it would not be expedient to go on with the present Bill; but he suggested that the Bill might be read a second time on the understanding that it would not be pressed further on at present. If, as the noble Earl had stated, the landlord in reality paid the cess ultimately, that fact would constitute a strong argument in favour of the Bill, as the landlord could suffer no wrong in being required to pay directly what he at present paid indirectly.

SIR HERVEY BRUCE hoped the hon. Member in charge of the Bill would agree to the suggestion of the noble Earl, and postpone the second reading. He was not prepared altogether to oppose a measure of the kind; but he thought that the present time, when a Select Committee was taking into consideration the whole question of the Grand Jury laws, was inopportune for the discussion of the Bill.

MR. POLLARD-URQUHART joined in requesting his hon. Friend not to press the second reading at present. In Ireland there were many tenants-at-will who held their lands upon an understanding that their rents should not be increased; but if this Bill should be passed in its present shape he feared these rents would be increased, and that, in consequence, much heartburning would be created in Ireland.

MR. BAGWELL said, the Select Committee had been arranged since this Bill was brought in by his hon. Friend, and therefore he did not think it would be fair to stop its progress in a peremptory manner. He would suggest that the second reading should be agreed to, upon the understanding that the Committee should be postponed till after the Report of the Select Committee.

MR. MURPHY said, it appeared to him that the principle of the Bill was not objected to, and he would therefore suggest that, after the second reading, it should be referred to the Select Committee of the hon. and gallant Member for Roscommon.

MR. BLAKE expressed a hope that the Chief Secretary for Ireland would consent to the second reading, in order that the Bill might then be referred to the Select Committee on Grand Juries, lately appointed. The principle contained in the Bill was a very important one; and if the noble Earl would not yield to the appeal made to him by so many Members, he hoped his gallant Friend would go to a division, so that those who, like himself, considered the present system an unjust and impolitic one, would have an opportunity of recording their protest against it. Hon. Members opposite had stated that when a tenant took a farm, he knew he was to pay all the Grand Jury rate, and that he got his land for less in consequence. No doubt the tenant did know he was to pay all this rate, but he never could calculate what it would amount to; and then it was pretty certain that there was little abatement in the rent in consequence of the landlord not having to contribute a portion of the tax. The anomalies connected with the levying and expenditure of county cess were remarkable. One of the great principles of the Constitution, which says there shall be no taxation without representation, was flagrantly violated. The man who paid the tax, with few exceptions had no voice whatever in appointing those who were to expend it; and, practically, he had no control over that expenditure, no matter how extravagant it might be. To speak of the associated ratepayers was absurd—they were the nominees of the Grand Jury, and even if a few of them would venture to act independently, they could be overborne by the magistrates associated with them. As the law stood, the landlord had every inducement to heap as much cess on the tenant as he could. For if, by the contributions of the latter, better roads and bridges and other works of utility were constructed near his property, the latter would be enhanced in value, and the poor tenant, as often occurred, would find that the only result to him of paying heavy rates would be to enhance the value of his farm for the benefit of his landlord, and then to have the alternative of paying an increased rent or suffer eviction. If the landlord paid half the rate, he would be more economical in the expenditure, and the tenant would be in less danger of suffering, as now, in consequence of improvements made with his money. A very striking injustice to the occupier was the obligation he was under for the entire support of pauper lunatics, whilst he only paid for half the maintenance of those who were sane. At the town he (Mr. Blake) represented the poorhouse and lunatic asylum were nearly opposite to each other. So long as a pauper retained his senses, the farmer contributed only a moiety to his support; but the moment he lost them, and was sent across the road to be locked up, the unfortunate farmer had not only to pay all the expenses, but the cost was doubled as well, owing to the larger expenses attendant on the care of the insane; so that the occupier was mulcted to four times the extent he paid before, and so continued to be unless the lunatic recovered or became an idiot, in which event he crossed the road again to the workhouse, was maintained at half the cost as before, and the landlord had to commence again to contribute his quota. Now, surely that state of things called for amendment. The hon. Baronet the Member for Coleraine had complained of the constitution of the Committee, and that some Members on it had never served on Grand Juries. Even if they had not, they might make very good judges of the reform required. But he never doubted if there was a single Gentleman on it who had not been at some time a grand juror. He (Mr. Blake) could not boast of being an important county man, or possessing much influence, but there were few who had given more attention to the question of Grand Jury reform. He had framed Bills to effect that object, and brought them forward for two years in succession; and though he did not pass them, he ventured to think he did something towards calling attention to the subject, and for that reason, he presumed, he had been placed on the Committee.

Mr. Pollard-Urquhart

MR. KENDALL thought the Bill ought not to be pressed forward without further consideration.

COLONEL FRENCH observed, that if the Bill were now read a second time its principles would be sanctioned. Now, the Bill, although plausible, was most delusive. So far from being beneficial, it would be highly injurious. It would unsettle the relations between landlord and tenant, and create discontent where it did not now exist. It would also throw difficulties in the way of the Select Committee on the Grand Jury Laws of Ireland.

MR. O'BEIRNE said, he wished to add his earnest appeal to the noble Earl (the Earl of Mayo) to withdraw his opposition to the second reading of this Bill; and he did so, encouraged by the fact that with the exception of his hon. and gallant Friend, the Member for Roscommon (Colonel French), every Member who had addressed the House, including the noble Earl himself, had expressed assent to the principles of the Bill. ["No, no!"] He (Mr. O'Beirne) repeated his statement; it was so. The only objections taken were that the whole question was now under consideration by the Committee recently appointed, who had but just commenced their sittings, and that it would be a discourtesy to that Committee if the House expressed any opinion upon one branch of a subject, the entire of which had been so referred. Another objection offered was that the second reading of the Bill would be something like pre-judging the question which had been sent to the Committee to discuss; but not a syllable of dissent from the main object of his hon. and gallant Friend's Bill was uttered. Now he (Mr. O'Beirne) believed that there was some very palpable misapprehension on the part of hon. Members who took this view. The only effect that reading this Bill a second time could possibly have, would be to express the views of the House subject to the inquiry of the Committee; and the Committee would have the fullest power to do what they pleased with the Bill, to report in favour of, or to reject it, or to embrace the principle it advocated in a new Bill. In fact, all that could follow a second reading would be the expression of opinion by the House in favour of the principles enunciated, without in the least interfering with the power given to the tribunal up stairs. If then that be so, why should there be any hesitation in permitting the Bill to proceed. He hoped, therefore, that this useless, and he thought ill-judged, opposition would be withdrawn.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WARREN) considered that nothing would be more mischievous than to read this Bill a second time with a view to immediate legislation. It appeared to him that the Bill contained as much mischief as any that had been introduced for some time past. The tendency of the measure was to tell the occupying tenants that they were suffering under a grievance, for which he believed there was no foundation; the Grand Jury cess being a charge upon the land apportioned justly among all classes. More than half the land in Ireland was held under tenancies from year to year; and as the Bill proposed the immediate application of the new law to all these tenancies, the result would be to create a vast amount of discontent between landlord and tenant, and to oblige landlords in self-defence to put an end to existing contracts with their tenants. He did not acquiesce in the principle that it was desirable that the Grand Jury cess should be apportioned between landlord and tenant, but he admitted that the subject was one deserving of inquiry before a Committee. It was against the practice of the House to affirm the principle of a Bill, when that very principle was to be one of the matters referred to a Select Committee.

SIR JOHN GRAY said, that the Bill would not interfere with existing arrangements between landlords and tenants; for all existing contracts were specially excepted from the operation of the Bill. There could be no hope of preserving good-will between landlord and tenant—as the opponents of the measure professed to wish—if Bills founded like this on just principles were to be rejected. It was now declared that a simple act of justice would produce ill-will between landlord and tenant. What could be fairer than that the person who possessed the permanent interest in the soil should pay his portion of the burden, instead of the whole being thrown upon the shoulders of the tenant? The House was asked to read the Bill a second time; not for the purpose of immediate legislation, but that the Select Committee might have official cognizance of its provisions. There was nothing more common than to give instructions to Committees as to the manner in which they should conduct their inquiries.

MR. SULLIVAN contended that the tenants had a serious grievance of long standing in the payment of the county cess. It was loudly and universally complained of, that the occupying tenant should pay the whole of a tax which went substantially to improve the property of the landlords. The Bill would not create discontent; for discontent in connection with this question, was of long standing. Why should it not be put on the same footing as the poor-rate? It was only reasonable and fair that the charge should be shared by the landlord. He entered his protest against the statement of the Attorney General for Ireland, and declared his belief that those who defended the present system did not understand the subject, or the feelings which existed among the tenant class of Ireland.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON thought it most proper that the whole subject should be discussed and maturely considered by the Committee upstairs; but it would be contrary to the practice of the House, and not very courteous to the Committee, to sanction the principle of a Bill by reading it a second time, and thus endeavour to dictate to them the mode in which the question should be settled. The Committee had full powers to inquire into the whole subject; and he trusted the House would not fetter them by the reference proposed by the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Murphy). Although he could not admit the grievance alleged by the hon. and learned Member for Mallow (Mr. Sullivan), he did not deny that some changes in the present system might be desirable. Exemptions similar to those made in the case of poor rates would, no doubt, be beneficial; but he had represented for thirty years a large agricultural population in Ireland, of all classes and creeds, and had never heard of this long standing grievance which pressed for immediate legislation. He looked to the Committee for useful suggestions, and hoped that beneficial legislation would follow.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, he was in favour of apportioning the county cess between landlord and tenant as was already done in the matter of poor rates. There had not been a single objection advanced against the principle of the Bill. It was true they had been told that an interference with the relations of landlord and tenant might excite discontent among the people of Ireland, but there was no possible measure connected with land in Ireland to which the same observation did not apply. The only desire of its promoters was to make a fair and equitable arrangement, and the noble Earl would do a graceful act if he allowed the second reading to pass with a view to the reference of the measure to the Select Committee.

MR. MAGUIRE said, the Gentlemen composing the Select Committee would form an excellent Committee, thoroughly representing all the interests of Ireland, and there was only one Gentleman among them who had not been on the Grand Jury. He (Mr. Maguire) thought it might be useful to read the Bill a second time, and refer it to them. The right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Warren) laboured under a great misconception if he believed there was no grievance involved in the existing condition of the law. Those who were acquainted with the feelings of the people knew that a grievance did exist, and that it was felt very strongly. He had himself seen a petition, signed by 6,000 occupiers in the South of Ireland, complaining of the grievance; and if the noble Earl opposite would refer to the occupiers of his own county, he would find there were not more than ten in a thousand who would not be in favour of a division of the burden between landlord and tenant. But no improvement was ever attempted to be made in that House for Ireland without the parrot cry being raised that dissensions and divisions would be created between the landlords and tenants. That was, however, all nonsense. Hon. Members came here to improve the law. Good will, not ill feeling naturally arose from improvements. He hoped the second reading would be agreed to.

Question put, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 57; Noes 70: Majority 13.

Words added.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Second Reading put off for six months.

INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS (IRELAND) BILL.
(The O'Connor Don, Mr. Monsell, Mr. Leader.)

[BILL 6.] COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. PEEL DAWSON said, that last year he had opposed a similar Bill upon its second reading; but, that having received little encouragement in that opposition, he had not considered it his duty to pursue a similar course in this Session. His objections, however, remained the same, and he thought that the momentous consequences which such a measure involved were not sufficiently understood by hon. Members. The hon. Member for Roscommon (the O'Connor Don) had not made out a case for it. If it passed in its present form, it would immediately effect a most disastrous blow upon the system of united education in Ireland. It would add very considerably to the burdens of local taxation; and almost all the grand juries of the northern counties of Ireland had protested against it. It had been urged that the grand juries would be left to take advantage of its provisions or not, as they chose; but there was no knowing how soon, if it were passed at all, application would be made to Parliament to make it compulsory. It was beyond the functions of grand juries to have the power of establishing schools out of the county rates, and he desired to record his protest against the measure, believing that it was wholly uncalled for; that it would add greatly to the burden of local taxation; that it would destroy the principle of self reliance among the lower order of the people; and that it would give perpetual opportunities for increasing religious rancour and acerbity.

MR. VANCE moved that the House should go into Committee on the Bill on this day six months. There was a certain amount of plausible argument in favour of this Bill, inasmuch as its principle was one already in operation in England. The object of the measure was to extend the operation of the Industrial Schools Act to Ireland, but the circumstances of the two countries were wholly different. There was much more vagrancy in Ireland than in England. The consequences of the measure would be that vagrant children might be seized and placed in sectarian schools, and that an expense would be incurred pressing heavily on the ratepayers in Ireland. He entirely disapproved of giving such children a better education and better nurture than those of hard-working, industrious, and well-conducted occupiers. The poor law schools were quite adequate at present for the purpose of eleemosynary education. It is true the Bill is only permissive; but it would no doubt be put in force, in all places in which there are town councils and would shortly be made compulsory. Where parents are living and have not parish relief, they should educate their own children. It would increase the pressure of rates to an enormous extent, as well as add to the religious rancour by which Ireland was vexed.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words, "this House will, upon this day six months, resolve itself into the said Committee,"—(Mr. Vance.)

—instead thereof.

MR. REARDEN said, he should vote for the Motion for going into Committee; but he intended to move an Amendment to a certain clause of it in Committee. He thought it would be inexcusable not to make the schools self-supporting.

THE O'CONOR DON expressed his surprise at the opposition from certain hon. Members opposite, to a Bill which was simply intended to extend the provisions of the Act which had operated so effectively in England. He had received a vast number of letters from magistrates, heads of reformatories, and other gentlemen in Ireland, all expressing their highest approval of the measure, and the necessity of such an act for the sister country. At present many children were sent into reformatories who ought to be sent to industrial schools. The judicial statistics of Ireland proved that the proportion of children of this class was far greater in Ireland than in England. In respect to the petition presented by the hon. Member opposite from Armagh, he (The O'Connor Don) had received a letter from Mr. Hancock, a member of the grand jury of Armagh, in which he stated that, after the grand jury had finished their criminal business, and whilst they were assembled together with closed doors, a gentleman proposed that they should sign the petition he produced against the Bill. Mr. Hancock objected to being a party to such a proceeding, and stated that, though other members of the grand jury had signed the petition, he believed that none of them except himself and the gentleman who had made the proposal had read the Bill. If the intention was to set up the Reformatory Bill as a rival to this measure, the charge under that measure would be higher, and it would be equally defrayed out of the county cess. The children who would be sent to the industrial schools were not of a criminal class. In the absence, however, of such institutions, those children must be sent to reformatories, where they would be treated as criminals. He (The O'Connor Don) objected to the principle of branding those innocent children as criminals, and of contaminating them by associating them with criminals. The measure was one of a mere permissive character, and it lay with the grand juries to say whether it should be put in operation in any particular district. As the Reformatory Act had worked so well without being compulsory, there was no good reason for believing that this Bill would not work equally well as a voluntary measure. The head of the Glencree Reformatory approved the measure. He (The O'Connor Don) did not believe that its enactment was at all likely to be followed by a compulsory measure, as the hon. Member for Armagh appeared to apprehend. But, even if such a consequence were likely to happen, the proper time to object to it was when the actual proposition was made.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON said, the cause of much of the opposition which had been offered to the Bill was the utter silence observed by the hon. Member for Roscommon as to the necessity of the measure and his reasons for introducing it. As a representative of a large county, he (Lord Claud Hamilton) had always felt it his duty to oppose any scheme involving taxation, the provisions of which had not been made thoroughly known to the country, and in respect to which an opportunity had not been afforded of opposing it, if disapproved, by any portion of the people. After the statement he had heard, and the explanation given in respect of its provisions, he should not feel it his duty to offer it the same opposition as before. The hon. Gentleman had omitted to state that this Bill was different from the Bill of last year. Only two individuals signed a petition against the measure. Since that time it had become a little more known, and had become the subject of eleven petitions, with 231 signatures, but all of the petitions were against the Bill. It might be an excellent Bill, but he thought it should not be passed until there had been given to the cess-payers of Ireland a more ample opportunity of expressing their opinions with regard to the measure, either for or against it. The hon. Member had not stated the number of children likely to come under the operation of his measure. What with the facts of higher wages being given than heretofore, and the continuous emigration going on, he (Lord Claud Hamilton) believed that the number of vagrants under the age prescribed by the Bill was rapidly decreasing. He confessed he still shared the opinion expressed by the hon. Member for Armagh that the measure was unnecessary; and, judging from experience, he did not think that those schools to be created under it were the best that could be established for teaching young people trades, or to become good agricultural servants.

The O'Connor Don

MR. PIM supported the Bill, on the ground that it would compel some parents, who would not otherwise do it, to pay a portion of the sum necessary for the maintenance of their children. He thought that the Bill was as much required in Ireland as in England.

MR. VERNER said, that in reply to the observations of the hon. Member for Roscommon relative to the grand jury of Armagh, he begged to state that a copy of the Bill had been sent by request to the grand jury, and every member of it had full opportunity of reading its provisions.

THE EARL OF MAYO wished to say one or two words in regard to the Bill. He did not propose, on the part of the Government, to take any action in respect of the Bill; but he wished to express his own individual opinions on the merits of the measure. He confessed he did not think that the hon. Member for Roscommon had made out a very strong case for extending the principles of the English Act to Ireland. He (the Earl of Mayo) had endeavoured during the last Recess to inform himself as to the feeling of the people of Ireland upon the subject; and, from all the inquiries he had made, it appeared to him that if this Bill were passed it was not likely it would have any extensive operation; but there was a very great difficulty in refusing to consider the provisions of a Bill which was almost precisely similar to the statute now in force in England. He thought that the House would do well to assent to the Committee on this Bill with a view of adapting, as far as possible, its provisions to the circumstances of Ireland. When in Committee it was his intention to move an Amendment which would have the effect of excluding all persons from the operation of the Bill who would naturally come under the amended provisions of the Irish Reformatory Act.

MR. VANCE said, he should divide the House.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

The House divided :—Ayes 82 ; Noes 46 : Majority 36.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clauses 1 to 10, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 11 (As to Children under Fourteen Years of Age found begging, &c. 29 & 30 Vict. c. 118, s. 14).

THE EARL OF MAYO moved the rejection of the first paragraph of the clause—namely, that which related to vagrant children—on the ground that a distinction between reformatories and industrial schools should be maintained. The industrial schools should be for those only who had committed no legal offence ; and children guilty of acts of vagrancy should be sent to reformatories instead of industrial schools. By his Bill all children who were guilty of an offence punishable by law were to come under the provisions of the Reformatory Act, the effect of which would be that vagrant children in Ireland would be treated in the same way as in England, and after suffering a short period of imprisonment would be sent to reformatories. Persons in Ireland who took an interest in the subject wished to have the distinction between reformatories and industrial schools maintained.

THE O'CONOR DON could not agree to the Amendment ; because he did not think it right that such children, who might perhaps be sent out to beg by their parents, should be deprived of the advantages of these schools, and subjected to the contaminating influence of a prison.

MR. BAGWELL thought it a considerable infringement of personal liberty to take up children merely for vagrancy, and send them to prison for a long time, although the prison was called an industrial school. He thought that there ought to be some safeguard to prevent the children of the poor being taken up and sent to industrial schools when they had committed no crime.

MR. CANDLISH pointed out that the Amendment of the noble Lord really broke down the distinction which existed between criminal and other children, because though, no doubt, some vagrant children in Ireland were criminal, it was not so in the majority of instances. He considered it was preferable to send these children into industrial schools, rather than reformatories with the probationary process to going through a gaol. He thought the clause ought to be maintained in its integrity.

MR. O'REILLY believed that the Amendment of the noble Lord would bring these children into the criminal class, a class whose future life was a source of so much difficulty to the country. He trusted, therefore, that the noble Earl would withdraw his Amendment.

THE EARL OF MAYO said, that his intentions had been misunderstood by the hon. Gentleman. His object was simply to extend the operation of the Reformatories Act in a direction in which the friends of those institutions thought it ought to be extended. As reformatories were working well, he thought the class to which he had referred ought to be sent to them. To secure the best possible results from the industrial schools it was desirable to separate those children who were properly the objects of charity from those who might more fairly be regarded as belonging to the criminal class. He had no objection to the House considering and deciding upon the question whether this particular class of children should be sent direct to a reformatory, or through the medium of a gaol.

MR. CANDLISH, believing that the proposition of the noble Earl would overthrow the reformatory system, trusted that the Committee would retain the clause as it now stood.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, the question was, how to draw a line between the two classes, who ought to be sent, irrespectively, to industrial and reformatory schools. He did not see how it could be done ; and he thought the clause in the Bill of his hon. Friend was best suited to meet the circumstances under which children in Ireland were placed. It would be dangerous to depart so far from the system sanctioned by the English laws. He hoped the noble Earl would not press his Amendment.

MR. VANCE was afraid the Amendment would lead parents to send their children out to beg, in the hope that they would be instructed by the Government.

MR. MURPHY thought the magistrates ought to have a discretionary power of sending children direct to the reformatory without passing them through a prison; and did not see any objection to giving to magistrates the power which they possessed in the case of industrial schools.

MR. VANCE believed the clause as it stood would give encouragement to parents to send out their children to beg.

THE EARL OF MAYO said, he would withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. BAGWELL moved, that at the end of the clause the following words should be added :—

" Or, in case of there being no industrial School in the district where the child is found, the workhouse may be duly certified by the authorities as fit to receive children to be trained as in Industrial schools."

THE O'CONOR DON had no objection to the addition to the clause.

MR. CANDLISH thought the addition would interfere with the working of the Poor Law system.

THE EARL OF MAYO said, anything that could improve the industrial training of workhouses would be most desirable; but he was afraid there was no machinery in the workhouses to carry on industrial training.

MR. REARDEN: If that machinery were introduced into the workhouses it would effect a most charitable revolution.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clauses 12 to 25, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 26 (Penalty on Child escaping from School).

MR. BAGWELL said, this was a most outrageous clause, as it provided that a child who escaped from school could, at the discretion of the magistrate, be sent to prison for a period of fourteen days with or without hard labour. He would divide the Committee on this clause.

THE O'CONOR DON said, if this clause were not passed the Bill might as well be abandoned.

Clause agreed to.

Mr. Chichester Fortescue

Clauses 27 to 41, inclusive, agreed to.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

TANCRED'S CHARITY BILL—[BILL 67.]

(Mr. Beresford Hope, Mr. Walpole, Viscount Cranborne.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE, in moving the second reading of this Bill, thought it right to offer a brief explanation of its provisions and some account of the charity itself. He observed, by the way, that he specially appeared on behalf of Christ's and Caius Colleges, Cambridge, peculiarly benefited as they were by the institution; and that the Bill which he had brought in was substantially the one of last year, originally introduced by his noble Friend the Vice President of the Committee of Council (Lord Robert Montagu), and then amended by a Select Committee. The founder of the institution was a certain Mr. Tancred, a Yorkshire squire of strong prejudices, one of which was an objection to heirs female. Early in the last century, this gentleman executed a trust deed, settling the largest portion of his property (of which the principal seat was at Wixley some dozen miles from York), on a trust which would, no doubt, had he had issue male, have made an entail for ever; but which, as the case was, created a charity, speaking roughly, divided into two parts—one an almshouse situated in the town of Wixley for twelve decayed bachelor gentlemen, and the other an establishment of twelve studentships—four for law, to be taken at Lincoln's Inn and the residue at two Colleges of renown at Cambridge, at either of which it was a privilege to enter; four for divinity at Christ's College; and four for medicine at Gonville and Caius College. Several years later Mr. Tancred executed a will, leaving his remaining property in augmentation of the settlement. Still a bachelor, he died a few years afterwards, and his will became the subject of a Chancery suit; for his sisters and their representatives naturally objected to it. The then Lord Keeper Henley pronounced a decree, in which he established the settlement with certain modifications; and in consequence of this judgment a Private Act, 3 Geo. III., incorporated the charity in conformity with Tancred's arrangements, appointing as its governors the Treasurer of Lincoln's Inn, the Master of the Charterhouse, the Governors of Chelsea and Greenwich Hospitals, the President of the College of Physicians, and the Masters of Christ's and Caius Colleges, Cambridge. At the same time, Christopher Tancred's whimsical provisos of keeping up for ever a deer park at Wixley was abrogated; and the estate placed on so satisfactory a footing that instead of yielding something under £1,000 a year, it produces, at the present day, upwards of £4,000. He need hardly observe how the selection of these trustees was wisely designed to secure the proper fulfilment of the second object of the charity—the maintenance of the twelve studentships, four in law at Lincoln's Inn, four in medicine at Caius College, Cambridge, and four in divinity at Christ's College, Cambridge. He should observe that both with regard to these studentships, and the pensioners of the "Hospital" at Wixley, the beneficiaries were strictly enjoined to be members of the Church of England. He was not now concerned with the question as it affected Wixley; but so long as the Colleges retained their connection with the Church he saw no hardship in the provision. The Church of England offered a most ample area, when the benefits to be conferred were so limited; and Christ's and Caius Colleges were foundations which it was an advantage, and not a detriment, to enter, particularly when £100 a year was the result of the transaction. As to the Wixley Hospital, he must confess that it had proved a failure. It would be easy to conceive the evils which would result from twelve bachelors of fifty, afflicted with an inability to get on in life—or otherwise they would not have offered themselves as candidates for the Tancred benevolence—living together on a common income barely sufficient to keep one gentleman in decent circumstances, in little rooms cut up out of a small country house, touching which the founder had the vanity to propose that the buildings should never be enlarged or altered. Having to dine together and live in community without any special occupation, religious vocation, or manly sports, soured in temper by the degradation of being regarded as recipients of charity, and with nothing to do but to kill time, these masculine old maids would naturally take to smoking, eavesdropping, and quarrelling, if not something worse. In 1865 the case of the Hospital became so flagrant that its governors submitted a scheme to the Charity Commissioners, proposing to reduce the number of the pensioners from twelve to six. Some other reforms were suggested; but the whole proposal was manifestly too timid and compromising to command success, particularly when it was remembered that the estate, which when Tancred died, was worth something less than £1,000, had now increased in value to more than £4,000. The Charity Commissioners were accordingly solicited from various quarters to take vigorous measures, and they did so with a vengeance. As a first step, they sent their assistant Commissioner, Mr. Martin, to report on the condition of the Hospital. He made a very minute examination of its internal arrangements, in which he was assisted by the fussy ingenuity of the inmates, men of, perhaps, a once large experience, who had withdrawn their powers of observation from the world to concentrate them within the narrow limits of their own circle. The Commissioners came to the generally approved conclusion that the Hospital as an almshouse should be done away with, and that the income should be dispensed in the shape of out-door pensions, supplementary to other sources of income, to educated gentlemen, so that no recipient should run a risk of collision with any brother in misfortune. The scheme also provided that when the number of inmates had been reduced to four, these should be withdrawn from the building and the establishment broken up. The charity would thus in time have assumed a shape similar in organization to the Royal Literary Fund and similar institutions. Embodied as this plan was in the original scheme, and consequently in the Bill as it first came before the House last year, it was also accepted by the Select Committee, and therefore was embodied in the Bill of the present Session, so he hoped it would be cordially approved by the House. Regarding the studentships, Tancred had laid down these three conditions:—First, that the beneficiaries should be natives of Great Britain, thereby shutting out Irishmen, colonists, and the whole world beside; secondly, that they should be members of the Church of England; and, thirdly, that they should, as students, be educated at the particular institutions, in relation to which the list of governors had been settled. The limitation to members of the Church of England was objected to; but surely, for an endowment limited in amount and in the number of possible recipients as this was, it opened a field of distribution sufficiently wide to secure an unquestionable power of selection among excellent competitors. What better schools of law, of medicine, or divinity existed than those which this testator had selected? Of Lincoln's Inn he need not make himself the advocate. As to Caius College, it had, from the days of its second founder, been a renowned school of medicine; while the fame of Christ's College as a seminary of divines was incontestible. Yet the Charity Commissioners, for some reason of their own, wished to make a clean sweep of all restrictions, leaving the governors of the charity to elect the students out of the wide world; and whether these would, in consequence, take their degrees in England, in France, in the United States, or in China, was to be a matter of the most complete indifference. The Bill introduced by his noble Friend the Vice President of the Council, as the mouthpiece of the Charity Commissioners, for giving effect to their scheme, appeared in a shape which might have become usual with regard to enactments brought before Parliament to give legislative sanction to such proposals, but against which he felt bound to protest. Instead of the scheme being cast, in proper legal language, into a Bill, which might in time become a statute, it was with all the amplifications and fine language incident to a report, and out-of-place, in a law, transferred just as it stood within the four corners of the Bill, with a few words of prefatory enactment, professing to give validity to the subsequent essay as the scheme of the Charity Commission. This Bill was referred to a Select Committee, which altered the scheme in various particulars; and yet, the Preamble having been, by the forms of the House, first adopted, it still professed to state what had become an untruth—that the scheme so propounded and proposed to be enacted was that of the Charity Commission. His Bill, which substantially embodied all the alterations of the Committee, did not follow this bad example, but adopted the ordinary form of other Bills. The Select Committee of 1867 restored the vested rights of Lincoln's Inn and of the two Colleges as recipients of the gift, together with the limitation to members of the Church of England of these studentships. In this he cordially concurred; but there were other points embodied in the amended scheme, with which he could not so thoroughly agree, although he felt it was most respectful to the Committee to introduce the Bill in the shape in which they had cast it, leaving it to the House to amend it in Committee if they pleased. Mr. Tancred had devised the advowson of Wixley to the charity; but Lord Keeper Henley pronounced this devise illegal. Consequently the patronage of the living had since continued in alien hands, although a small provision had been made to the clergyman who was constituted warden of the Hospital. The scheme proposed a permanent addition to the living, consequent on its being purchased by the governors, and then the advowson being sold with the estate. The Committee retained the whole of the land, probably looking upon it as the best security on which the charity fund could be put; and yet owing, he hoped, to the misadventure of the provision for the increase of the living having come earlier in the scheme, rejected the proposal of augmentation, with the view, no doubt, of subsequently rejecting the complex transaction affecting the sale of the estate. He would be glad, if his Bill got into Committee, that this provision would be reinstated, without prejudice to the retention of the estate. It was absurd to argue that the purchase of the living was contrary to Tancred's intentions. In the first place, Tancred wished the living to belong to his trust; and, in the second place, regarding the pension portion of it as a provision for meritorious gentlemen outworn by work, he would ask, who could be so meritorious a recipient of its benefits as a clergyman broken down by devoted services in some overgrown town or unhealthy colony? In fact, the vicar of Wixley might and ought to be the first Tancred pensioner. The Committee also struck out the extension of the pensions to women. Tancred, no doubt, was a misogynist; but he thought this a poor reason, now that the Hospital was to be extinguished, to refuse this concession. Such was the Bill of which he moved the second reading. All agreed that the Hospital, as it stood at present, was a crying evil. The Bill proposed a remedy for this offence. Its other details might or might not be open to discussion; they could, however, be taken in hand in Committee. For the sake, however, of abating the Hospital, he contended that the House ought to give the second reading now. If it refused to do so, it would render itself responsible for all the evils which were making Wixley a by-word.

Mr. Beresford Hope

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Beresford Hope.)

MR. BENTINCK seconded the Motion.

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE said, the hon. Member had not stated precisely the nature of the scheme recommended by the Charity Commissioners, which, although of a comprehensive character, did not go as far as he himself wished. The Charity Commissioners proposed that the Hospital should be done away with; that the pensioners should be increased from twelve to twenty-four; that women as well as men should be admitted to the benefit of the charity; that this should be thrown open to all British subjects; and that restrictions upon the religion of the pensioners should be wholly done away with. They further proposed that the allowance of the students should be increased to £100 a year each; that these should not be obliged to belong to any particular College or Inn of Court; and, further, that the estate, consisting of 2,500 acres in Yorkshire, and possessing a considerable residential value, which non-residential trustees were incapable of fully developing, should be sold, and the proceeds invested in Consols. A Bill for carrying out the scheme of the Charity Commissioners had been brought in last Session by the noble Lord the Vice President of the Council; in doing so, however, he never told the House that he disapproved of the provisions of that scheme, but referred the Bill embodying it to a Select Committee composed of five Members chosen from his own side of the House, and but two taken from the Opposition Benches. Bearing in mind that the Liberal party had a decided majority in the House, the preponderating influence ought to have been exactly reversed. The Committee at once proceeded to cut out all the liberal parts of the Bill, and so completely altered its character that nobody could any longer recognize it. On its return to the House he had endeavoured to restore it to its original condition, and gave notice of Amendments for that purpose. The noble Lord endeavoured to force the Bill through the House; but, in order to prevent its being discussed in a thin House, he (Mr. Lefevre) had stayed up night after night till three in the morning, and eventually the Bill was dropped. But now, in the present Session, his hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge, fresh from the honours of an Election, in which he had received considerable Liberal support, re-introduced the Bill in the same reactionary form, instead of leaving the matter to be dealt with by a Government measure, introduced with the concurrence of the Charity Commissioners. In its present shape he thought it was really impossible to amend the Bill. It would be better to throw it out, and to leave it in the hands of the Government to bring in a measure dealing in a wider spirit with this charity. Here was an estate, producing something like £5,000 a year, which might be turned to very useful purposes of an educational character, such as had been pointed to by a noble Duke (the Duke of Marlborough) in "another place" when he accounted for the delay which had taken place in producing the educational measures of the Government by the hope which he had entertained of getting hold of some of the waste foundations of the country. He thought that when there was such a cry for technical education this charity might be used for that purpose. He believed that, in Yorkshire, there was not at present a single school for technical instruction. The scheme of the Select Committee, as embodied in the Bill of the hon. Gentleman, was most illiberal; as he hoped the House would not sanction it, he moved that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Shaw-Lefevre.)

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE said, the hon. Gentleman had attempted to give this Bill a thoroughly party aspect, and had started some theories on the subject of endowment, which were almost as novel to Members of his own party as they were to those who sat upon the Ministerial Benches. He really failed to gather what were those "liberal provisions" which the Committee had so wickedly struck out. He found that widows and daughters had given way to decayed and necessitated gentlemen, and that the restriction to British subjects had been omitted. Was it part of the creed of the Liberal party that the widows and orphans of pensioners should share in the endowments? Had the Liberal party any objection to "decayed and necessitous gentlemen?" He was also puzzled by the statements which he had heard as to the party composition of the Committee; for, as it happened, the two Liberal Members did not vote upon the same side. If he were compelled to determine between the purity of water of the Liberalism of Gentlemen opposite, he should say that the Member for Scarborough (Mr. Dent) was, on the whole, more orthodox than the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe). The principle now laid down by the hon. Member for Reading (Mr. Shaw-Lefevre) could not be narrowed to a particular case. If the intentions of a man who made his will with the full knowledge that there were members of the Church of England, Roman Catholics, and Dissenters, and who discriminated between them, were to be deliberately set at nought, why, in fairness to testators at the present day, these principles of action ought to be declared. At one of those three o'clock sittings which the hon. Member had alluded to he startled the House by the declaration that it was ridiculous for anybody to suppose that the testator could care for the Church of his baptism. That might, of course, be the hon. Member's own view of the case. But there were, nevertheless, large numbers of individuals who did attach importance to their religious belief, and were prepared to help more earnestly those who agreed with them in religious belief than those who did not; and if that were the place to quote Scripture, passages might be adduced in support of that view.

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE begged the noble Lord's pardon. He had never used the words attributed to him on any occasion at three o'clock in the morning.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE: Well, then, it was at half-past one.

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE said, he had never, at any time, made use of any such expression.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE certainly had understood the hon. Gentleman to say that he felt no individual preference for those who belonged to the same religious body as himself; but was glad to find that he had misconceived what was actually stated. The hon. Member, however, must admit that he had now advocated the conversion of this endowment to purposes of primary education—purposes which were wholly foreign to those which the testator had in view.

MR. DENT had the authority of the Charity Commissioners for stating that they had never been consulted with regard to the Bill that was now before the House; and he certainly thought it a rash and hazardous proceeding, in a matter of this nature, for private Members completely to ignore the Commissioners, and take the disposal of the revenues into their own hands. He hoped the Bill would pass, and that such Amendments, as to the wisdom of the Committee might seem fit, would be introduced. Its broad features would, however, no doubt, remain as an embodiment of the will of a deceased benefactor, whose views they were bound to respect and give effect to. He therefore should vote for the Motion of the hon. Member for Reading, although unable to agree with him in all the views that he had expressed.

MR. POWELL said, he did not think that the present was the time in the history of the country when a desire to increase the comforts of old and decayed persons could be legitimately regarded as out of date. In Bradford there were collections going on in favour of various asylums devoted to the purpose. The question involved in the opposition to this Bill was, whether, when there was an endowment in favour of a religious communion, the members of that religious communion should be allowed to enjoy the property devised for their benefit. The issue at stake in this case did not affect one religion alone, but the endowments and bequests of all bodies of Christians in this country. He must adhere to the broad principle that a man could spend his money as he liked, and so leave it after his death. The Report of the Middle-class Schools Commission was in favour of this Bill, which, he trusted, would be read a second time. Any alterations which it was desirable to make in the details of the Bill could be effected in Committee, while its broad principles were preserved.

MR. THOMSON HANKEY thought the discussion showed the necessity there existed for some efficient representative of the Charity Commissioners in that House. There was at that moment no Member of the Government on the Benches opposite to say a word in favour of the Report of the Charity Commissioners, or to give any explanation with regard to the Bill. It would be more satisfactory if such measures as this were introduced by the Government, instead of being left to private Members. It could not, he thought, be said that the hon. Member for Reading (Mr. Shaw-Lefevre) factiously opposed the Bill. What the hon. Member asked was, that action should not be taken in the matter until the Charity Commissioners expressed their opinion with respect to it, and until the Government thought fit, on their own responsibility, to bring in a measure on the subject. He supported the Amendment.

MR. HENLEY said, there was a large charity to be dealt with. It was admitted that great inconveniences had arisen from its existing condition. In consequence of the state in which it was represented to be, Commissioners were sent to the spot to inquire, and upon their Report, which contained much valuable information, the Charity Commissioners framed schemes,—not, however, in strict accordance with the Report of the Commissioners who had made the inquiry—and submitted to Parliament a Bill to carry them out. The Bill was referred to a Committee, of which he had the honour of being a Member. It so happened that all the parties interested, without exception, were opposed to the scheme of the Commissioners. Those who were rich enough appeared by counsel; those who were not rich enough were allowed to appear and state their own case. It happened that one of the pensioners had been formerly a Member of this House. What had the Committee to do? They had to sit a few hours every day to devote to a consideration of what was just and liberal. The House had received that day a definition of what liberality, or rather Liberalism, really was according to the view of a Liberal Member. They were told upon that authority that it was a Liberal thing to do away with everything that a founder had in view when he made a specific bequest, and to substitute something entirely different. The hon. Member for Reading (Mr. Shaw-Lefevre) said the intentions of the testator should be disregarded, and that the revenues of the charity should be applied to general educational purposes. But the Legislature had come to the conclusion with regard to endowed schools that, if the words of the bequest were precise, the advantages of the endowment were to be confined to persons of that particular form of religion which the testator indicated. The same principle should be applied in the present case. It was quite clear that the testator had done all in his power to secure his charity for members of the Church of England; and another circumstance was, that if nothing were done there would be a Chancery suit to settle the different interests. The Committee shrunk from ordering a sale of the estate; and from doing this in order to obtain an increased present advantage with the certainty of a less income in the future. They thought that in reference to the questions that had been raised they should rather be dealt with by a general change in the law than by legislating for this particular instance. The Committee had come to the conclusion that the advantages of the charity should be confined to men, and not extended, contrary to the obvious intention of the founder, to women. They differed from the Commissioners also on this question. The founder said that his charity should be divided into two equal parts—one for pensions to needy persons, and the other for educational purposes; and the Committee saw no good reason why this limitation should be broken through; and they also saw no reason for extending the area beyond the locality to which the testator had limited it. Another thing that weighed much with the Committee was the consideration that the Bill would have to go to the other House; and they desired such a measure as would have a fair chance of passing there; and the more especially so when it was admitted on all hands that legislation was necessary to remedy the state of confusion into which the charity had fallen. If money left for one purpose was to be diverted to another it ought to be done directly, and not incidentally. He hoped that the House would agree to the second reading, and if any Amendment were thought necessary, that matter could be considered in Committee.

MR. BRUCE said, that, while he agreed in the desirability of removing existing inconveniences, he could not but think that the Bill could not be considered apart from the general principle which applied to endowments. The Legislature had committed certain duties to the Charity Commissioners, who were empowered to devise schemes for improving and promoting the efficiency of charitable institutions; and it was intended that such schemes, if they were approved of, should be submitted to the Legislature by some Member of the Government. It was the practice, in the first instance, to place them before the Vice President of the Committee of Council, whose duty it was, if he saw anything objectionable in them, to refer the measures back to the Commissioners for further consideration. In the present case no such objection was made to the Bill as prepared by the Commissioners last year; but when it came back from the Committee it was submitted by an independent Member, and not a word had been said in support of its principle by any Member of the Government. The question whether the recommendations of the Bill were such as should receive the approval of the House deserved much consideration; and he did not think it ought to be read a second time, unless the House was prepared to sanction the principle with respect to endowments, that, in all cases and under all circumstances, whatever restrictions were imposed, the will of a testator should be adopted and carried out. He did not deny that the first recipients of the benefits to be derived under the will in question should be members of the Church of England. They were to live together, and it was perhaps right therefore that they should belong to the same denomination; but the question was whether, now that they were no longer to live together, but to be scattered, the same restriction should be maintained. Again, they could not be quite sure that if Mr. Tancred had seen the ritualistic tendencies of the day, and the other alterations that had taken place, he would have been so anxious to limit the charity to members of the Church of England. And with respect to the scholarships, it was worthy of consideration whether, after the lapse of 100 years, the will of the testator should be in all respects adhered to. If the limitations with reference to residence were disregarded, why should not the limitations with regard to religion? At any rate the tendency of Parliament was now to take such restrictions into consideration; and the School Commissioners had recommended that every fifty years such endowments should be considered by some competent authority, which should determine whether the will of the testator should in all respects be adhered to. He thought that a Bill of this importance should be brought forward on the responsibility of the Government; and, under all the circumstances, he should support the Amendment of the hon. Member for Reading.

MR. ACLAND said, that he was by no means indifferent to the propriety of respecting the general intentions of testators who aimed at forwarding great and good objects; but it was quite another thing when the House was called upon to assist in placing restrictions around institutions, and where the testators were selfish men and wanting in natural affection for their relations. This Mr. Tancred had been described by the Judge who gave a decision in reference to his will, as a man who seemed to have cast off all natural affection; and the Judge regretted that he was bound by precedents to assist in carrying out his intentions. He had surrounded his estate with a wall, and had erected certain buildings and out-buildings, and he ordered that no one should pull down the wall or buildings, or should erect any new buildings. His first object seemed to be to cheat his sisters. He also ordered that forty deer should be kept in the park. Were those who opposed the extension of the benefits derived under the will to a few ladies anxious that those directions should be held sacred? He (Mr. Acland) thought that important principles and main objects should be respected and upheld; but that the whims and fancies of such a testator, at the moment of death, ought not to be allowed to prevent Parliament from applying the charity for the benefit of the greatest number possible. It was true that the testator named members of the Church of England; but circumstances had greatly altered since the founder directed that the residents in his cenobite house were to be members of the Church of England. His views about the Church of England might be very different from those which were now entertained; he might have looked upon the Church in a much wider sense than was supposed; and certainly they ought not to put the narrowest construction upon his words. What they were bound to do was to see what the main object was, and to give effect to it, and not to limitations which had a smack of religion about them, perhaps for the purpose of making them look respectable. It ought also to be considered that the testator was doing for persons, who lived 150 years after his death, what the law would not allow him to do if the bequest had been applied to his own immediate descendants—that was, regulate the terms upon which they should hold the property. He hoped the House would not adopt the broad principle involved in the Bill, which was one which should be dealt with on the responsibility of the Government, and that they would not allow the Bill to be read a second time.

Mr. Bruce

MR. SCHREIBER said: The hon. Gentleman who has just sat down has certainly formed no very high opinion of the character of the late Mr. Tancred; but I did not gather from anything he said that he felt the slightest objection to fingering the money of the departed; and I must say,

Sir, that it is rather hard to take a man's money for upwards of a century, and then abuse him at the end of it. At half-past one o'clock this morning, "while men slept," the Church of England was suddenly deprived by Bill of dues and rights she has enjoyed for centuries; on Monday next it is proposed to rob the Irish Church by Resolution; and to-day, I presume to keep the Liberal party in wind, the disposition is evinced of setting aside the intentions of a Church of England testator and diverting the uses of a Church of England charity. But hon. Gentlemen opposite should remember that, in thus acting, they are forging weapons which may be used against their own endowments, and which, if we cannot defend our own possessions, when the time comes, we shall not be slow to use against theirs. Motions and speeches of this kind are two-edged swords which will not always be allowed to cut one way. In the next place, Sir, if these endowments had their origin in the religious sentiment—if without it they would never have existed—I would ask, how much honesty there is in diverting them to uses secular, and disconnected with the profession of any religious faith? It seems to me, Sir, very like obtaining money under false pretences; but then we are told, Sir, that dead men should not be allowed to govern the living from their graves; but there is one thing, at least, you cannot prevent their doing—they can warn the living from their graves; and, unless this House more scrupulously respects the intentions of founders, we shall soon have heard the last, I fear, of bequests for religious and charitable uses. On general grounds, then, and because, as a Cambridge man, I feel a deep interest in this particular instance, I trust that the House will not refuse a second reading to this Bill.

Question put, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 69; Noes 83: Majority 14.

Words added.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Second Reading put off for six months.

MUTINY BILL.—SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH objected to the way in which the Bill was introduced, no one having heard the first reading. He admitted, however, that in accordance with his wish it was printed before the second reading. Still he considered it was objectionable that, without necessity, such a Bill should be so rapidly passed through the House. When this Bill was passed the Minister might dissolve Parliament if it did not act according to his wishes; and this indecent haste took place in consequence of party contentions which properly should have no relation to it.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow.

GRAND JURY PRESENTMENTS (IRELAND).—COMMITTEE.

MR. VANCE moved, that the Select Committee on this Bill do consist of nineteen Members, and that Colonel Stuart Knox and Captain Archdall be added to the Committee.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Select Committee on Grand Jury Presentments (Ireland) do consist of Nineteen Members."—(Mr. Vance.)

THE O'CONOR DON objected to increasing the numbers of the Committee.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

House adjourned at a quarter before Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, March 26, 1868.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Compulsory Church Rates Abolition* (55); Medical Practitioners (Colonies)* (56). Second Reading—(£362,398 19s. 9d.) Consolidated Fund*; Legitimacy Declaration (Ireland)* (27). Committee—Non-Traders Bankruptcy (Ireland)* (38); Fairs (Ireland)* (47). Report—Non-Traders Bankruptcy (Ireland)* (38); Fairs (Ireland)* (47).

ECCLESIASTICAL TITLES IN GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

EARL STANHOPE, in rising to move for the appointment of a Select Committee, to inquire into the Operation of any Law or Laws as to the Assumption of Ecclesiastical Titles in Great Britain and Ireland; and whether any, and what, Alteration should be made therein, said, that this question had given rise to a great amount of irritation. Being anxious to see it satisfactorily settled, he now asked their Lordships to grant a Committee, as the first step in their Lordships' House towards the attainment of such a result. As to the present state of the law, he must, in the first place, bring under their Lordships' notice a clause in the Act of 1829, called the Roman Catholic Relief Bill, in which it was enacted that a penalty of £100 for each offence should be imposed upon any person who should unlawfully assume to himself any title borne by any Archbishop or Bishop of the Established Church. The Roman Catholics of that time took very little heed of that clause, because it was comprised in a measure which gave them the great boon of equality of civil rights. Moreover, when that Bill was passed, no attempt was made to bring the clause into operation, and it remained a dead letter. But the case was far otherwise when, in September, 1850, the Pope thought fit to alter the mode of exercising his spiritual authority in England. Until then that authority had been exercised by means of Vicars apostolic; but in that year a brief was issued by the Court of Rome, which established twelve dioceses for the Roman Catholic Church in England, and gave to those dioceses titles which were not borne by Archbishops and Bishops of the Established Church, but derived from other towns or cities. Under that brief Cardinal Wiseman assumed the title of Archbishop of Westminster. This brief raised a great flame in the country, upon two separate grounds—first, it was regarded as an act of Papal aggression; and secondly, it was considered to be aimed at the authority of the Queen, who alone had the privilege of creating territorial titles in her own dominions. At the beginning of the next Session, a noble Earl not now in his place (Earl Russell), who was then Prime Minister and a Member of the House of Commons, brought in the Ecclesiastical Titles

Bill. But although he (Earl Stanhope) was about to find great fault with the provisions of that Bill, he by no means desired to impute it in terms of blame to the noble Earl. The statement made by one of the principal and most distinguished opponents of this Bill should always be borne in mind. Sir James Graham said—

“He must acknowledge that the feeling in favour of legislation on this subject was so strong and unanimous that no Prime Minister could disregard it.”

The Ecclesiastical Titles measure, after much debate, finally passed both Houses; and, in addition to the penalty of £100, it declared null and void all the briefs and rescripts that had been or might be promulgated by the Court of Rome in reference to this assumption of titles. This Act was proclaimed by its promoters as a great victory and triumph; but, alas! how vain and hollow had that victory proved!

“Upon his head they placed a fruitless crown,
And put a barren sceptre in his gripe.”

Last year, when some discussion took place upon the subject in that House, their Lordships were told by Lord Derby, in his capacity of Prime Minister, that if a Return were moved for of all the prosecutions instituted and all the penalties recovered under that Act, the Return must be nil. The fact was that not a single prosecution had been instituted, and not a single penalty had been recovered. In that debate of last year several noble Lords expressed their regret that they had been parties to the passing of that Bill. He, for one, joined in that regret; not that he or any other noble Lords need be ashamed of what they had done, for no one could take a more conscientious or honourable part than vote according to the best of his judgment at the time. But he thought that, guided by the lights of experience, they had reason to regret the course they had pursued. For himself, he regretted that he had departed from the guidance of those Gentlemen with whom he then usually acted—the followers of the late Sir Robert Peel—who, in his judgment upon this measure, and upon some others also, displayed a larger amount of foresight and sagacity than did at the time several other party chiefs who competed with them. The Bill, however, having now been the law of the land for many years, it became their duty to consider what had been its effect. Some people said that no harm could arise from a law which was not executed. For his part, he objected to any law that was not executed. It was most unfortunate when penalties were placed upon the statute book which they could not venture to enforce; and there could be no worse state of things than when there was a systematic violation of the law on one side and a systematic connivance at that violation on the other. The whole course of legislation of late years had been in opposition to such a system; and the Legislature had repealed scores of statutes that had fallen into desuetude. There were only two courses to pursue with regard to any law—either to enforce it, if it were deemed right, or, if deemed undesirable, then to repeal it. If there were any country in which it was desirable to promote respect for the law, it was Ireland. What, then, must be the state of things in Ireland, when the humbler classes saw those in whom they confided, and whom they revered—the prelates of the Church to which they belonged—pay no regard at all to those statutes which regulated their condition? Might not such a spectacle induce those persons to suppose that they also were absolved from the duty of obedience to the law in points upon which that law concerned them? He thought the fact that the statute had fallen into desuetude, or that it could not be enforced, afforded a very good reason why they should repeal it, or, at all events, why, at least, they should not refuse an inquiry into the question. Another objection to the Act was that it had caused considerable difficulty with regard to Roman Catholic bequests, and some information on this point would be found in the Report of the House of Commons' Committee of last year which had been communicated to their Lordships, and would be in their hands in a few days. It was true that it had not, as far as he was aware, led to the infliction of any substantial injustice. But under its operation Roman Catholics had been subjected to harassing proceedings in different courts, and that was manifestly a grievance which ought, if possible, to be removed. A further objection to the Act was that it did not deal with the question in an equal spirit. Had it rested on the broad principle that any person assuming a territorial title in the Queen's dominions without Her Majesty's permission should be liable to a penalty, much might be said in its favour; but how did it deal with the Bishops of the Episcopal body in Scotland? Bishop Forbes, with whom he had been in correspondence, and who was held in great honour and respect by all who knew him, had exactly the same right to take the title of Bishop of Brechin that Dr. Manning had to style himself Archbishop of Westminster; yet the Act expressly excepted the Episcopal body in Scotland from its operation. Surely, the penalty ought to be applied equally, or not at all. He found, too, that the Act exercised an evil effect upon the action of the Roman Catholic body in Ireland, as had been shown by the evidence adduced before the Committee of the House of Commons which had inquired into the subject last Session. Bishop Moriarty, in the course of his examination before that Committee, said—

"I know that before the passing of the Ecclesiastical Titles Act several Bishops were in the habit of attending the receptions of the Lord Lieutenant, and I know that, on many occasions, Bishops were consulted by the Government of the country, and that they freely gave their advice, and offered their advice, to the Government of the country. Since the passing of the Ecclesiastical Titles Act the Bishops think that it is their duty, or that it is becoming their station, to keep themselves altogether apart from any official connection or communication with the Government of the country."

That was a very important answer, and the Bishop also stated that the Roman Catholic prelates, acting on that rule, had retired altogether from the Board of National Education. When asked whether there was anything in the Act which required them to do so, he replied—

"No; but among the Commissioners of National Education you had the Archbishop of Dublin, you had the Catholic Dean of Dublin, and you had, I think, two or three other Roman Catholic Bishops sitting on the Board of National Education; they have all retired, and no Bishop at the present day would accept a seat on that Board."

The evidence of Mr. Justice O'Hagan, another of the witnesses of high authority examined by the Committee, was to the same effect, and he would read a question put to him, with his answer—

"Your opinion is that the main evil of that legislation is a matter of feeling on the part of the people of Ireland?—It is, no doubt, a matter of feeling, but of feeling issuing in fact, and in very formidable fact too. I think that the feeling of a Bishop which prevents him from having, in a position of perfect independence, which should always be maintained, the most cordial relations with the Executive Government of the country, and aiding it cordially and effectually by word and deed, in all proper cases, is a feeling followed by a fact of a very formidable sort."

Their Lordships, he thought, would admit that a measure which severed all ties between the spiritual heads of several millions of our fellow-subjects and the Government, and also all ties between those heads and the system of national education in Ireland, was a great evil. He (Earl Stanhope) had now pointed out the ill effect of having statutes which could not be enforced, and penalties which could not be recovered, the harassing operation of the Act on Roman Catholic bequests, its unequal application, and the alienation which it had caused on the part of the Roman Catholic Bishops with regard to the Executive and the Education Board. This being the price we had paid for the Act, he was entitled to turn round on its supporters and ask what equivalent we had received? Here was the loss, but where, he now asked, was the gain? Could it be said that a measure which had remained a dead letter afforded the smallest security to any of our Protestant Establishments? It had simply given us the pleasure, if pleasure it were, of forbidding what we were unable to prevent, and of declaring illegal what was nevertheless done every day and every hour before our eyes and in spite of our law. It must be remembered, moreover, that serious times were possibly at hand. While observing due reserve towards measures which were not yet fully developed, and which at all events were not yet before their Lordships' House, he might be allowed to say this—that many persons entertained apprehensions that proposals might be pressed upon Parliament by a numerous section of our fellow-subjects which it might be its bounden duty to refuse. In view of such a contingency his counsel was—“Make concessions when you can, so as to be able to make resistance when you must.” If we cleared our position of anything that was doubtful or ambiguous, anything that was ill-considered at the time and had not been attended with the expected results, we should be better able to refuse unreasonable demands. In the discussion of last year several Peers, who formerly supported the measure, admitted the evils which had resulted from it, and avowed their change of opinion, and with that change of judgment avowed by so many, and by himself among the rest, he maintained that reconsideration was required, and he hoped their Lordships would now grant the Committee for which he asked. He believed considerable progress might thereby be made towards the settlement of the question. It need not be a Committee of very long duration. He believed that all the facts which it was desirable to ascertain had been laid before the Committee of the House of Commons which had sat last Session, and he doubted whether it would be requisite that the Committee should call for any further evidence; but he thought that something might be gained by a careful consideration of the provisions of the Act, and by inquiring whether it would be possible to put an end to the present state of things, and at the same time to assert the Queen's undoubted authority as the source of all honours in this country. It appeared to him that the Bill which had been introduced in the other House did not deal with the subject in the most satisfactory manner, for it proposed the repeal of those provisions and nothing more. There were several other points also well deserving of consideration. He would mention one which was suggested by the Report of the Commons' Committee of 1867. That Report said—

Earl Stanhope

“Your Committee submit for the consideration of the House whether, for purposes of legal description, certain modes of designation applicable to Roman Catholic Bishops might not be adopted, whereby some inconveniences which have been pointed out to the Committee might be avoided.”

But nothing appeared in the Commons' Bill of 1868 to carry out that recommendation. That Bill proposed nothing beyond the repeal of the two enactments of 1829 and 1851. Again, the question as to the Queen's supremacy in this country was one which should engage attention. He thought the Committee would be materially aided by the presence of some Members of the right rev. Bench. He had the pleasure of stating that if the House should be disposed to grant this Committee, one most rev. Prelate (the Archbishop of York) had declared his willingness to be proposed a Member of it. He saw no reason why, in any point of view, this should be regarded as a party question. Most noble Peers who had taken an active part in politics on one side or the other had been concerned either in the framing or the support of the measure into the operation of which he proposed to inquire; he said so without intending to cast any imputation upon them, and now he thought it would be perfectly consistent with the course they had formerly taken if, without any admixture of party feeling, they should apply themselves to see, whether, without impairing the Queen's authority, they might not be able to redress the grievances of which so many of the Queen's subjects had now good reason to complain. It was with this view that he had introduced the subject to their Lordships' notice. He thanked their Lordships for the indulgence with which they had heard him. He begged to move that a Select Committee be appointed, and now, with entire confidence, he left the subject in their Lordships' hands.

Moved, That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the Operation of any Law or Laws as to the Assumption of Ecclesiastical Titles in Great Britain and Ireland ; and whether any and what Alteration should be made therein.—(The Earl Stanhope.)

LORD REDESDALE said, he thought the noble Earl had not fully considered the circumstances under which the law arose. The question was not a religious one, it was a purely ecclesiastical question and an Imperial question. It was not so much an assumption of certain titles that had led to the passing of the measure as the fact that these titles had been conferred by a foreign Power; and the Act was drawn up and remained as a protest against that proceeding. No foreign Sovereign had a right to issue any document or brief by which titles of authority were conferred in this country, and it was against that which the law protested. There was no more difference in the Pope creating an Archbishop of Westminster than in the Emperor of the French, or any other foreign Sovereign, creating the noble Earl Duke of Chevening. That was the case of a foreign Power interfering in the Government of this country, and that was the point taken up, and he held rightly taken up, by the Government in 1851. Their Lordships might make what alterations they pleased, and, at the same time, might do what they could to reserve the rights of the Crown and the independence of the country with regard to this matter ; but if, in any way whatever, they countenanced a foreign Power doing anything by authority in this kingdom, they would do that which would be contrary to the liberties of the country, and would lay the foundation of great and impending danger. Suppose their Lordships admitted the right of the Pope to create the Archbishop of a diocese in this country; in a short time it would be said that the same right ought to be given, which was acknowledged in other countries, of granting dispensations with regard to certain marriages. Why, it would then be asked, should not the Pope be allowed to grant, in the case of those professing his own faith, a dispensation to an uncle to marry his niece, and to do other things which were done every day in Roman Catholic countries? There was much more involved in that matter than those who only looked at it superficially might be supposed to think. The action of the Pope in that case had been utterly uncalled for; because since the time of the Reformation until 1851 the whole religious proceedings of the Roman Catholic population of this country, as distinguished from Ireland, were carried on without the necessity of having any bishop with an English territorial title. If such was the case during all that period, why were not things allowed to remain so? Why, instead of a Bishop of Ephesus, for example, or an Archbishop of Tarsus, who did everything necessary for the faith of that portion of Her Majesty's subjects, were bishops with English titles appointed? Why was it necessary to interfere with that state of things? It was done for a purpose; that purpose was oppression, and the Government of the day did right to interfere. The noble Earl had said that the Act was a dead letter. But even although nobody had thought it worth while to enforce the measure, it still stood as a protest against that foreign interference, and in that respect it had a value. The best proof that no injury was done by the adoption of the principle of the Act was to be found in the fact that a clause of a similar purport had been inserted in the Roman Catholic Relief Bill with reference to Roman Catholic prelates in Ireland; and that no one had complained of that provision. The Act was passed as a denial of the right of the Pope to issue any order that was to be obeyed in this country; and the Pope would have interfered less with our independence if he had created an Archbishop of Canterbury than he had interfered with it by creating an Archbishop of Westminster; because, in the former case, he would only have dealt with an existing diocese, and he could not have claimed a power of parcelling out the country into such ecclesiastical divisions as he might think fit. The sending of bulls and documents which came directly from the Pope was prohibited by law as old as the Plantagenets, and there had been a continued protest against such interference from the earliest days down to the present time. The noble Earl had moved for a Committee on this subject; but even according to his own admission a Committee was unnecessary, for he said that all the evidence on the question had been given elsewhere. It would be far better to have the question treated in a Bill, than to have a Committee in which a few Members, according to their bias, might prepare a Report which would, perhaps, rather tend to embarrass the House than to assist it. Now, whatever he had said on this subject had been uttered without the slightest feeling of animosity toward those who professed the Roman Catholic religion. On the contrary, up to a few years ago he was rejoicing at the good feeling which had arisen and was extending between persons of that faith and Protestants. Any one who remembered the religious contentions in which we had been involved at the time of the passing of the Roman Catholic Relief Bill, and again at the period of the passing of the Ecclesiastical Titles Bill, must have perceived that kindlier feelings had for some years sprung up among the professors of the Protestant and the Roman Catholic creeds. Within the last few years, however, things had been materially altered. There had been a degree of agitation on the subject of the claims of Roman Catholics on different points, which he was sorry had been pushed forward in a manner which had led to a great degree of ill-feeling, and which, if persevered in, would lead to a great deal more. The temper of this country was such that, if once excited, it might go to considerable extravagance. They might depend upon it that the Protestant feeling of this country was of such a nature that it was not desirable to excite it in any way, and he, therefore, sincerely regretted the moving of these questions. He confessed he did not think the appointment of a Committee on this subject desirable, and he should be sorry that their Lordships should agree to it.

LORD LYVEDEN said, their Lordships would recollect that when he brought forward this question last Session, one Peer after another rose to express his penitence for having consented to the passing of the Ecclesiastical Titles Act. The noble Earl on his left (the Earl of Kimberley) excused himself on the ground that he was very young at the time; and the noble Earl below him (Earl Granville) said that, as he was not then in the Cabinet, he was not responsible for the measure brought forward by the Ministry, though he had supported it, and the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Clanricarde) also regretted what he had done.

Lord Redesdale

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE: I did not say so. I said I would vote for it again under the same circumstances.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he thought his noble Friend (Lord Lyveden) had better consult Hansard on the subject.

LORD LYVEDEN said, it appeared that he had been mistaken with respect to the opinion of the noble Marquess; but many of their Lordships had certainly made their recantations on the occasion to which he had referred. He did not mean to cast any reflection on his noble Friends. He knew a very important question on which public men had changed their opinions over and over again in the course of one year. He would pass, however, at once to a consideration of the present state of the question. There was at that moment a Bill before the House of Commons for the Repeal of the Ecclesiastical Titles Act; and, as it was reported in the newspapers, the Prime Minister stated he would soon give the opinion of the Government upon it. That being so, a legitimate opportunity would perhaps be given to their Lordships of expressing their views on the subject in a short time. Into what was the Committee to inquire? The Report of the Committee of the other House had been presented, and they had recommended the repeal of the Act 14 & 15 Vic., c. 60, and of the 24th section of the Act 10 Geo. IV., c. 7, and they submitted for the consideration of the House whether, for the purposes of legal description, certain modes of designation applicable to Roman Catholic Bishops might not be adopted, whereby some inconvenience which had been pointed out to the Committee might be avoided. That was a matter which might properly come before the House in discussing a Bill in Committee, and if the noble Earl had confined his request to that there might have been some object in it. But the noble Earl desired to discuss the Acts referred to themselves; but what object could he expect to attain by that? The Committee asked for would only reproduce the evidence already given in the House of Commons, or comment upon what was already before them, or add the testimony of similar witnesses. Among the witnesses examined before the House of Commons Committee were Mr. Justice O'Hagan, Mr. Hope Scott, Dr. Manning, Dr. Ullathorne, and Sir George Bowyer, than whom men more competent to give an opinion upon the subject could not be obtained. Unless, therefore, their Lordships wished for some harmless occupation for their leisure hours, he could not imagine what good would result from the appointment of a Committee. Lord Derby had said that it was not well to moot a subject which would only excite religious discussions and religious differences. Would there not be enough of religious animosity next week without such a Motion as this? Perhaps the noble Lord wished to know what decision the Government had come to; but after ascertaining this a Committee would be unnecessary. If the House assented to the Motion of the noble Earl, he hoped care would be taken to so limit the inquiry as that it should not be allowed to interfere with the passage of the Bill for the Repeal of the Ecclesiastical Titles Act if it came up to that House in time. He had no great objection to the Committee asked for; but he had the strongest possible objection to the Ecclesiastical Titles Act, which was one of those obnoxious measures, to a large body of people, which had made us to an extent unpopular with the Irish Roman Catholic Population. Acts every one of which we should wish to see removed.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, he did not see what advantage was to be gained by the appointment of the Committee which had been asked for. Having formerly voted for this Ecclesiastical Titles Bill, he wished to say that he had not changed his opinion upon the subject. This assumption of titles was, under the circumstances of the time, an outrage upon the dignity of the Crown and upon the Protestant feelings of the country. He believed that the country so regarded it, and that a protest was absolutely necessary. He was glad that the Act had had no further consequence; for he did not wish to impose any penalties upon religious opinion, nor did he think at the time that it would be possible to enforce the penalties. The protest embodied by the Act was all that was valuable in it. Their Lordships would remember the circumstances under which the Bill was brought forward. Both sides of the House, before this assumption of titles, had shown their anxiety to conciliate the Catholics, and to bring them into amicable relations with the Protestants. But when such a step was taken as this assumption of titles the Government were bound to meet it. At present we were very liberal on all sides, and, with a generosity, which people often showed in giving away what did not belong to them, Parliament was going to give away the Prerogative of the Crown. The Crown, as the fountain of honour, had the prerogative of bestowing titles. If the rights of the Crown, in this respect, were given away with the assent of the Crown and of the Government, of course there could be no objection; but he believed that the step would be offensive to the people of this country. There was a very strong Protestant feeling in this country, and it would be very unwise to disturb this question for a small purpose. This was only one of many questions, and it was both unnecessary and useless to take it by itself and disturb the country with it. All these questions should be dealt with at once. He thought the Committee asked for would be perfectly useless, and that when the Bill now before the other House came before their Lordships, would be the proper time to make such alterations and amendments in the existing law as should be fairly consistent with the authority of the Crown.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE thought the Ecclesiastical Titles Act ought to be repealed, for his noble Friend who made the Motion showed clearly that the Act was of no use whatever for good. But it was quite another thing to have been a party to the Bill when proposed. It was brought forward in consequence of an invasion of Her Majesty's authority on the part of the Pope, in the creation of ecclesiastical titles. At that time, rightly or wrongly, wisely or unwisely, there was a strong feeling in this country on the subject, in consequence of that assumption on the part of the Pope, and of the Tractarian controversy which was then going on, and the country was amazingly excited. It was not at all advisable to rouse the Protestant feelings of the people, and to swell the "No Popery" cry; and the Government of the day took what they thought was a safe and moderate course to prevent this, and to protest against the act of the Pope. For this object the Bill was perfectly successful; but, while the Bill had otherwise been useless, he had not anticipated the effect it would have of creating a practical evil. At this moment it was a grievance, and a serious grievance, to eminent Roman Catholics; for there were cases—with reference, for example, to wills and bequests—in which, in Courts of Justice, it might be absolutely necessary to ascertain who were the individuals exercising certain ecclesiastical functions, and by signing certificates in the names by which they were recognized in their Church they would be compelled to violate the law. While, therefore, the Act now did no good, it was not wholly harmless, and ought to be repealed. He agreed, however, with his noble Friend who spoke last, that no good would result from the appointment of a Committee. The matter was ripe for decision now. To say that a return to the state of things which existed before 1851 would imply the giving of more power to the Pope in this country than he ever possessed was to attach exaggerated importance to the Act. The Pope might exercise his powers of dispensation, and so he might now. He might grant a dispensation for the marriage of an uncle with his niece, as was apprehended, and so might any of their Lordships, or any man in the streets ; but that would not make such a marriage legal, and would not entitle any one to inherit property under it. No such dispensation could affect a legal title or right. It was perfectly consistent in those who supported the law in question when it was passed, to be anxious now that it should be repealed, and that nothing more should be heard about it, seeing that the titles of the Roman Catholic prelates were not put forward in a manner such as to give offence to those who were not Roman Catholics.

EARL GREY said, he did not think full justice had been done to the noble Earl's Motion by those of their Lordships who had spoken upon it. He thought it might be questioned whether, having passed the Ecclesiastical Titles Act as a protest Act, under the circumstances which seemed to call for it, the simple repeal of the protest would leave us in precisely the same position we occupied before the passing of the Act. It would be taken to imply that we had made a protest that we ought not to have made, and that for that reason we withdrew it. He did not think that the question was so simple as it was assumed to be. The list of witnesses read omitted some persons whom it would be proper to hear before we came to a final conclusion on the subject. He wanted some good ecclesiastical lawyers to explain what would be the effect of a simple repeal of the law, and so to indicate the proper course to be taken with regard to all these ecclesiastical titles. They ought to adopt the same course with respect to the Scotch Episcopal Bishops that they did with respect to the Roman Catholic Bishops.

The Marquess of Clanricarde

They ought to allow either or to allow none to assume territorial titles. But he thought an exaggerated importance had been attached to the whole subject. What real harm did it do to anyone that the Pope authorized Cardinal Wiseman to call himself Archbishop of Westminster? It gave him no power or jurisdiction whatever, and if he had gone to a Court of Law he would be told that he had no ground for the assumption of any power of jurisdiction. But with regard to his moral power and jurisdiction over his own flock, no Act of Parliament could alter that ; and he possessed it just as much after the passing of the Ecclesiastical Titles Act as he did before it. Prejudice and passion on both sides had raised this question to undue importance, and, under the circumstances, he (Earl Grey) considered that the Motion before the House was a very judicious one.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR : Nothing could be more at variance with your Lordships' usual practice than for your Lordships to grant a Committee that is moved for, and assume in doing so that you had arrived at a foregone conclusion, as to what the Report of that Committee should be. The conversation that has taken place in this House to-night will have satisfied your Lordships how widely different are the opinions entertained on the subject of the Motion of my noble Friend. It appears to me that all we can at present do is to consider whether my noble Friend has or has not made out a case for a Committee upon the subject. I will say that in my opinion my noble Friend has fully made out a case for a Committee. In the first place, without entering into a detailed examination of the circumstances under which the Act of 1851 was passed, I think that those who, like myself, consider that that Act was, at all events, valuable as a protest, are compelled to admit that the protest contained in that Act was made in the most inconvenient form, and in a manner which, while, perhaps, it secured in some way the end of a protest, has accompanied the protest with consequences which experience has proved eminently undesirable. More than that, my noble Friend has referred to a Select Committee of the other House of Parliament which sat during the last Session upon the subject, and it is quite true that that Committee presented a Report which has already been referred to ; but it should be remembered that that Committee was so evenly divided in opinion that the Report was carried simply by the casting vote of the Chairman. There was a discussion in this House last Session, when various Members of your Lordships' House again took different views upon the question of the repeal of the Act of 1851 and the section of the previous Acts, some of your Lordships expressing the opinion, contrary to opinions previously entertained, that that repeal should take place, while others were of opinion that the Act should be continued unchanged. With these differences of sentiment in both branches of the Legislature, I cannot but think, if there are facts to be inquired into, and if there be law to be considered, nothing can be more convenient than a Committee of this House for that purpose. I own I do not quite take the view of my noble Friend (Lord Lyveden) who said, that in the evidence taken by the Committee of the other House he should find all the information upon this subject which could be required. I think that that evidence might be very usefully enlarged. There are many points connected with this subject as a whole which were not inquired into by that Committee. Let me point out what advantage it seems to me may result from inquiry in this House. My noble Friend has done well to give his proposition the breadth and scope which it derives from the words of his notice of Motion. No greater mistake could be made than to suppose this is simply a question connected with the Roman Catholic Church; and that it is not a question which goes very much further, and involves the whole law with regard to the Prerogative of the Crown, and the assumption of titles of the kind which has been referred to by any Church or by anybody. My noble Friend, therefore, has proposed that a Select Committee shall be appointed to inquire into the operation of all the laws of the country with regard to the assumption of ecclesiastical titles, whether the laws be written or not written, and, moreover, whether any alteration should be made therein. It has been urged in objection to the Motion that there is no Bill before the House, and a noble Lord appeared to think that that was an objection to the appointment of a Committee. I own I think, on the contrary, it is a great advantage to the Committee. If there were a Bill before the Committee simply repealing one or both of the Acts which had been referred to, there would be very considerable danger of the Committee raising upon that Bill more or less of a struggle, and there would be a desire either to pass the Bill or reject it; and it would not have that cool and disembarrassed consideration which, in a Committee of this kind, may be given to the law apart from any measure that may be pending. I think, moreover, if there is any place where this subject can be considered dispassionately and, I might almost say, in a judicial spirit, it is before a Committee of this House. We can approach this subject without any of those prejudices or passions which surround the discussion of it "elsewhere." We may hope to have the assistance of the right rev. Bench, whose authority on subjects of this kind must carry the greatest weight. If a Committee be appointed, although I do not anticipate what conclusions it may come to, I certainly trust one result, at all events, will be that the law upon this subject in whatever enactments contained, will be put on a clearer, a better, a more definite, a more consistent, and a more satisfactory footing than it is at present.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY: Your Lordships will have gathered from the statement of my noble and learned Friend (the Lord Chancellor) that the Government, as a Government, have no objection whatever to the appointment of this Committee; but that, on the contrary, they think it will be rather useful than otherwise. I wish, however, to say a word with respect to my own conduct. I certainly was one of those who voted in favour of the Ecclesiastical Titles Bill in 1851, though I was prevented by domestic reasons from being present when the matter was discussed in this House last Session; but had I been present I certainly should not have cried "Peccavi" as some of your Lordships have done. I am not at present prepared to say that I regret the vote which I gave in 1851; but, at the same time that circumstance only makes me the more anxious to investigate and thoroughly understand the change of feeling which has occurred since the passing of the Act and the causes which have induced many of your Lordships, and a considerable portion of the people of this country, to alter their minds on the subject. I must protest against what has been said by the noble Baron on the back Benches (Lord Lyveden) as a reason for not discussing this question; for I think your Lordships will agree with me that it is not our business to be biassed by what is going on in the other House of Parliament, but that we ought to do our duty in an independent spirit. A measure has, I believe been laid upon the table of the other House of Parliament in reference to this question ; but, at present, it is not our business to go into that at all. The probability that that measure will be sent up to us is an additional reason for appointing a Committee, in order that we may be thoroughly informed on the subject. I very much regret that the noble Earl (Earl Russell) is not present, and also the cause of his absence from the House this evening ; for he certainly bore a very prominent part in passing the Act of 1851, and I should have liked to hear his opinion respecting the advisability of stirring up the subject again, and bringing it before your Lordships' consideration. I trust my noble Friend who has proposed this Committee will take some pains to constitute it in such a manner as to make it impossible for anybody to suppose that it was biassed by any political or party feeling, and that with this end in view he will invite such Members to sit on it as are best able to investigate this question calmly and with experience. I also think it essential that some of the right rev. Prelates should be appointed Members of the Committee.

Motion agreed to.

And, on March 30, the Lords following were named of the Committee : the Committee to meet on March 31, at Four o'clock, and to appoint their own Chairman :

Ld. Chancellor	E. Russell
Ld. Abp. York	L. Bp. London
Ld. Privy Seal	L. Bp. Oxford
D. Somerset	L. Redesdale
E. Stanhope	L. Colchester
E. Carnarvon	L. Somerhill
E. Harrowby	L. Lyveden.
E. Granville

COMPULSORY CHURCH RATES ABOLITION BILL.

Brought from the Commons ; read 1<sup>a</sup>.—(The Earl Russell.) (No. 55.)

MEDICAL PRACTITIONERS (COLONIES) BILL [H.L.]

A Bill to enable Colonial Legislatures to enforce Registration of Medical Practitioners in the Colonies—Was presented by The Duke of Buckingham and Chandos ; read 1<sup>a</sup>. (No. 56.)

House adjourned at half-past Six o'clock till To-morrow half-past Ten o'clock.

The Earl of Malmesbury

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, March 26, 1868.

MINUTES.]—SELECT COMMITTEE—On Sale of Liquors on Sunday nominated ; Public Schools nominated.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee—ARMY ESTIMATES.

PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—Local Government Supplemental.*

First Reading—Local Government Supplemental* [77] ; Boroughs and Divisions of Counties* [78].

Second Reading—Perth and Brechin Provisional Orders Confirmation* [74] ; Ecclesiastical Commissioners Orders in Council [69].

Committee—Election Petitions and Corrupt Practices at Elections (re-comm.) [63]—[R.P.] ; Mutiny ; Consolidated Fund (£6,000,000)* ; Inclosure* [73].

Report—Mutiny ; (£6,000,000) Consolidated Fund ; Inclosure* [73].

Considered as amended—London Coal and Wine Duties Continuance [43].

Third Reading—Oyster and Mussel Fisheries* [54] ; Indian Railway Companies* [55] ; Court of Appeal Chancery (Despatch of Business) Amendment* [68], and passed.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT ACTS.

QUESTION.

MR. PIM said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the working of "The Local Government (England) Act, 1858," and "The General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862," and to the facilities afforded by those Acts to corporate and other towns in Great Britain to obtain power for the better execution of the Local Improvement Acts in force in such towns, without incurring the costs and expenses attendant upon Private Bill Legislation ; whether it is his intention to propose any similar Act for Ireland, by which the advantages now enjoyed by the cities and towns of England and Scotland, and which have been so largely availed of, be extended to the cities and towns of Ireland ; whether the Laws which provide for the keeping, for the auditing, and for the publication of the accounts of the municipal corporations, the boards of town commissioners, and some other public bodies in Ireland, are not very defective, and whether he intends to propose any remedy therefor ; whether it is not the case that, in respect to the election of commissioners under "The Towns Improvement (Ireland) Act, 1854," equal facilities are not provided for the exercise of the Franchise as are provided for the election of the English local boards under "The Public Health Act, 1848," and "The Local Government Act, 1858;" and, whether he is prepared to take this subject into consideration, and propose a remedy?

THE EARL OF MAYO, in reply, said, he quite agreed with the hon. Gentleman that the Irish Law in regard to the matter in question was defective, and it would be a great public advantage if the same facilities for obtaining provisional orders which existed under the Local Government (England) Act were provided for Ireland. He also thought that the mode of taking the polls at municipal elections for Ireland was very defective, and ought to be remedied. It would also be a great public advantage if a more effective mode were adopted for auditing the accounts of local bodies acting under the Municipal and Towns Improvement Acts. He had given directions that the Towns Improvement Act generally should be very carefully considered, for the purpose of making some amendments in it; and he hoped shortly after Easter to lay on the Table a Towns Improvement Bill which would deal with the questions to which the hon. Gentleman had referred.

ARMY—COOKING APPARATUS.

QUESTION.

COLONEL SYKES said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether the application of Captain Warren, R.N., whose patent cooking apparatus has been adopted for use in the Army by War Office Memorandum, dated War Office, 21st August, 1867 [B/a—1741], will be referred to the "Standing Committee for the consideration of the claims of inventors to rewards," in conformity with the War Office Circular, dated 28th June, 1867 [84 Gen. Nos. 1571 and 1601]?

MR. THOMSON HANKEY said, he also wished to ask, Whether a cooking apparatus of a similar character had been patented by Mr. Jaques?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON, in reply, said, it was quite true that Captain Warren had claimed to have invented such an apparatus; but he believed that Captain Warren had been sufficiently rewarded by having his apparatus purchased from his own agents, and he (Sir John Pakington) certainly had no intention to refer the question to any Committee. With reference to the Question of the hon. Member for Peterborough he really was unacquainted with the merits of Mr. Jaques' invention; but if the hon. Member would renew his inquiry he (Sir John Pakington) would afford any information which he might be able to obtain.

POST OFFICE—EASTERN MAIL SERVICES.—QUESTION.

MR. CRAWFORD said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether the sums, amounting in the whole to £27,643, stated in a Return dated 7th December, 1867 (Parliamentary Paper, No. 68, of the present Session), to be the estimated receipts in respect of the Eastern Mail Services outwards and inwards for four weeks, are calculated at the rates of postage in force at the time when the Return was made up, or at the present increased rates; and, in the former case, what may be the sum by which the Estimate of £27,643 may be expected to be augmented by reason of the increased charge; whether the sums receivable in India or elsewhere out of the United Kingdom are included in the estimate in question, so as to come in further diminution of the sum which may be voted for the conveyance of the Eastern Mails; and, whether an exact account is kept of the postages received or chargeable in respect of the said Services?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH replied, that the receipts were calculated on the rates in force at the time when the Return was made up. If the increased rates now in force had been taken into consideration, there ought to have been an increase in the estimate of £2,900 per month. The whole of the sums receivable in India, as well as elsewhere, were taken into account in this estimate, and a separate account of the outward and inward postage was kept.

RATES FOR SANITARY IMPROVEMENTS.

QUESTION.

VISCOUNT ENFIELD said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether any defect exists as regards the levying of Rates for Sanitary Improvements in the provisions of the forty-ninth Clause of "The Sanitary Act, 1866," and of the second Clause of "The Sewage Utilization Act, 1867;" and, if so, whether he proposes during the present Session to bring in any measure to remedy the same; and, whether any steps have been taken, under the provisions of the above-mentioned Acts, to remedy the imperfect state of the drainage of Acton, Chiswick, and a detached part of Ealing, as reported to the Home Department in October, 1866, by Mr. Fulton, the engineer?

SIR JAMES FERGUSON, in reply, said, he was not prepared to admit that there were defects in the Law to which his noble Friend pointed. Where the Secretary of State had reason to believe there was any disinclination on the part of the local authority to execute necessary drainage operations, he sent down a person to inquire into the case; if he found the local authority disinclined to perform the necessary works, he ordered them to be carried into execution, and he had power to recover the cost of the works. The remedy was by attachment of the property of the defaulting parties. In the case of a vestry there was no personal property; and it was a question, whether the Secretary of State could oblige the overseers to pay. The Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown had been taken last year, and, from their Opinion, it appeared doubtful if the Act of 1867 gave powers to the Secretary of State to issue a precept to the overseer to levy additional rates. But, believing that the Legislature intended to give him the power to enforce his order, his (Sir James Fergusson's) right hon. Friend intended to try to enforce it, and if he found that he had not that power, he would apply to Parliament for additional powers. The parishes in question had failed to execute the necessary works because the Metropolitan Board declined to allow them to drain into the only available outfall, on the ground that it was insufficient for the purpose. They would therefore have to take other steps.

IRELAND—TREATMENT OF PRISONERS. QUESTION.

MR. STOCK said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether the Law in Ireland is the same as that in England with regard to the treatment of prisoners convicted of seditious libel?

THE EARL OF MAYO said, in reply, that he did not know whether this was quite a Question which he should be called upon to answer; but he might state shortly what he believed to be the difference of the Law in England and Ireland. In Ireland the Law did not provide for the classification of prisoners convicted of misdemeanour; but in England the Prison Act of 1865 contained this provision—

"And whenever any person convicted of misdemeanour is sentenced to imprisonment without hard labour, it shall be lawful for the Court or Judge before whom such person has been tried to order, if such Court or Judge think fit, that such person shall be treated as a misdemeanant of the first division, and a misdemeanant of the first division shall not be deemed to be a criminal prisoner within the meaning of this Act."

The treatment of persons undergoing sentences for this description of offences was that of first-class misdemeanants, which was regulated by Rules made by two Justices at Quarter Sessions, subject to the approval of the Secretary of State. He would hand a copy of those Rules to the hon. Member.

ARMY—GRANT FOR FORTIFICATIONS QUESTION.

COLONEL SYKES said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether the Treasury Minute, dated the 16th August, 1867, for the audit of the sums granted for Fortifications annually has been carried into effect; and whether the results will be laid upon the Table?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, in reply, that the annual audit of these sums had been carried into effect in accordance with the terms of the Treasury Minute, and the results of that audit would be laid upon the table of the House as soon as possible. He could not promise, however, that they would be ready by a very early day.

THE SURVIVORS OF THE "ST. ABBE." QUESTION.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, If it is the intention of the Government to send out any person to the East Coast of Africa, to inquire into the truth of the report that there are detained as prisoners, by the Somali tribe, some survivors of the ship St. Abbe, which was wrecked off Tenadi Nuova in 1855?

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, in reply, that a deputation, consisting of members of the Royal Geographical Society, including Sir Roderick Murchison, waited upon him at the India Office some time ago, and represented that steps should be taken to inquire into the truth of the report relative to the supposed survivors of the ship St. Abbe. It was suggested by the deputation that the Government should give facilities to a gentleman well acquainted with that part of Africa to make inquiries respecting those persons. The matter was considered by the Council of India, who did not think it right that any facility of that kind should be given, or that the Government should pledge itself in any way, and make such inquiries through an authorized agent of the British Government in a country with which we had no diplomatic relations. However, another suggestion was made, which was that there was a great fair being held at Berbera about this time of the year, and that among the large numbers of persons present there might be means afforded of making inquiries as to the existence of these alleged survivors, and it was suggested that a reward might be offered which should have the effect of bringing the required information. He had communicated with his noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs upon the subject; and, with the noble Lord's concurrence, he had communicated with the English Resident at Aden, authorizing him to offer a suitable award for any information respecting the subject of the report.

INDIA—THE BONUS COMMITTEE.

QUESTION.

MR. BRUEN said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, When the Bonus Committee sitting in India are likely to come to a settlement of claims to compensation made by Officers in the late East India Company's Army?

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE, in reply, said, several Committees were sitting upon this subject. Inquiries had to be made into the particulars of each case, and in a great number of instances an award had been made of the sums payable to the Officers. As fast as the awards were made the money awarded was paid over to those entitled to receive it.

DR. ROGERS, MEDICAL OFFICER OF THE STRAND UNION.—QUESTION.

SIR JOHN SIMEON said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Poor Law Board, What were the grounds on which the Board accepted the resignation of Dr. Rogers, the late Medical Officer of the Strand Union; and, whether that resignation implied anything unfavourable to the character or to the professional ability of Dr. Rogers?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, in reply, that the circumstances of the case referred to by the hon. Member were these:—In December last the Board of Guardians of the Strand Union called upon their medical officer, Dr. Rogers, to resign, and the matter coming before the Poor Law Board, they asked for an explanation of the reasons for such a step being taken. The Board of Guardians returned for answer that Dr. Rogers had, for a long time past, committed a series of indiscretions which rendered it impossible for them to work harmoniously together, and exhibiting a great want of courtesy in his communications with the Officers of the Board. The result was, that the Board thought it necessary to suspend him from his office. With respect to the second part of the Question, he could not do better than read the concluding paragraph of the Board's letter on the occasion, which stated—

“The Board are happy to be able to add that no blame can be imputed to you in reference to the discharge of your strictly professional duties, and the Board do not doubt that you have shown zeal and ability in the performance of them. This adds to the regret of the Board that you should, from other causes, have rendered it necessary for them to accept your resignation.”

INDIA — RELIGIOUS PROVISION FOR SOLDIERS IN INDIA.—QUESTION.

MR. O'REILLY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether an order has been issued by the Governor General in Council in India—

“Relative to providing a room in the Lines of European Regiments in India to which the men can resort for private reading and prayer, and for holding prayer meetings and other meetings of a similar character, and directing that a room of a suitable size, with such furniture as may be deemed to fit it for the purposes above-mentioned, shall be considered one of the recognized requirements in the barracks of every British Regiment or considerable detachment of British Troops; and further that a residence will be assigned to a Scripture Reader in the married quarters.”

Whether the rooms contemplated in the above order will be available for the Roman Catholic Soldiers for similar purposes of united and public prayer and other devotional exercises consonant with their religion; and, whether in cases where Roman Catholic Soldiers comprise the majority or or other large portion of the troops, a residence will be assigned to a Roman Catholic Catechist or religious teacher, as in other cases to a Protestant Scripture Reader?

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE, in reply, said, he had received no information on the subject of this order, although he had seen some reference to it in the newspapers. If such an order had been issued he would no doubt receive official information respecting it in a few days.

ARMY—DAILY PAYMENT OF MEN.

QUESTION.

COLONEL W. STUART said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether the Order for the daily payment of Men in the Army after Morning Parade in the presence of an Officer under Queen's Regulations 1859, page 132, sec. 65, is continued in the same way by the Queen's Regulations 1868, page 90, paragraph 387, which states, "that the issue of pay is to be made punctually, in accordance with Royal Warrant, Part I., paragraph 534," this paragraph not being set out in the Queen's Regulations; and, whether the Order for the daily payment of Men in the presence of an Officer renders it necessary to pay the Men on Sunday, in the presence of an Officer after Morning Parade, there being no other Parade except Church Parade, which does not always take place at the same hour for all the Men of a Regiment?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, in reply, that he had written to the Adjutant General with reference to the Question of the hon. and gallant Member, but he had not yet received a reply. He would give an answer to the hon. and gallant Member's Question on a subsequent day.

PETIT JURIES (IRELAND) BILL.

QUESTION.

MR. ESMONDE said, he wished to ask Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Whether he intends to proceed with the Petit Juries (Ireland) Bill that night?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WARREN) said, in reply, that if there was any objection to proceed that night with the Bill, which was similar to the one introduced last year, it should be taken the next day.

PARLIAMENT—ARRANGEMENT OF BUSINESS.

MR. GLADSTONE: I think it would be convenient that the House should know the business it is intended to take this evening. There are four or five subjects of great interest and importance set down—Supply, the Mutiny Bill, the Controverted Elections Bill, and the Capital Punishments Bill.

Mr. O'Reilly

MR. DISRAELI: Of course the arrangement of business for this evening will be greatly dependent on those Gentlemen who have Motions upon going into Committee of Supply, and if a considerable time is occupied with these, I must modify the proposed arrangements. In that case I shall not be able to proceed, as I could much have wished to do, with the Controverted Elections Bill, as I understand there is to be considerable discussion in Committee on the Mutiny Bill, and that is of so pressing a character. But if we go into Supply and obtain some Votes, then I shall avail myself of the privilege of going on with the Controverted Elections Bill. With respect to the Motion of which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has given notice on the subject of telegraphy, we anticipated that probably the House would be satisfied with hearing his statement, and that there would be no discussion on it, and therefore that it might be made at a very late period of the evening.

MR. GLADSTONE: I beg to ask, what is to be done with the Capital Punishment Bill? I would also take the liberty of suggesting, with reference to the Telegraph Bill, that the subject is one of such novelty, and involving a number of complex details, that it would hardly be desirable for the House to proceed with it at a very late hour.

MR. DISRAELI: With respect to the Capital Punishments Bill, if it comes on late—and of course discussion is anticipated upon it—we shall not press it. If it is the wish of the House that the Telegraphs Bill should not be brought forward, of course we are in their hands, and shall not press it. In answer to Questions, the right hon. Gentleman added, that neither the Capital Punishments Bill nor the Controverted Elections Bill would be brought on after half-past ten o'clock.

THE REV. MR. WILSON.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

MR. GREGORY asked leave to make a brief personal explanation, and to do justice to a gentleman to whom he had unintentionally done injustice. In the discussion which took place the other night on the Motion of the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Maguire), he (Mr. Gregory) alluded to the language used by some clergymen at the different Church defence meetings held in Ireland, and, amongst others, referred to the language used by the Rev. Mr. Wilson, at Limerick, whom he incorrectly described as Moderator of the Presbyterian Assembly of Ulster. He was informed, and, at the time, he unquestionably believed it to be true, that the Mr. Wilson who made the speech was the Moderator of the General Assembly of Ulster. He now found he was in error, and as the statement had given that rev. gentleman very great pain, he took that opportunity of correcting the mistake.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

BANKRUPTCY LAW.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. MOFFATT, in rising to call attention to the position of Parliament in reference to the amendment of the Law of Bankruptcy, and to the expediency of introducing a Bill into the House for that purpose without delay, said, that the law as it now stood gave immense privileges to debtors, restrained greatly the rights of creditors, and vested large discretionary powers in the Judge. He ventured to say that the Law of Bankruptcy was one of the most important of laws in a commercial community like that of this country. The Bankruptcy Law was amended by Lord Westbury's Act in 1861, and in 1864 the number of bankruptcies had increased from 1,432 to 7,224, whilst the amount of assets had decreased about 50 per cent. In 1867 the number of bankruptcies had increased to 8,994. By Lord Westbury's Act it was provided that persons might become bankrupts on their own petition; and in 1864 there were of these 5,260, and in 1867 the number was 6,532, showing an increase of gentlemen who, having nothing to pay, chose to become bankrupt, of 25 per cent. In 1864 there were discharged without any punishment 5,335 bankrupts, and the number in 1867 was 6,902; but the amount collected had shrunk from £677,000 to £583,000. The number of bankrupts who had paid no dividend was no less than 5,876; and this, he submitted, could not be considered a satisfactory state of things. He indeed believed that the whole system had fallen into such a state that it was as bad as it could be. The figures to which he had referred did not at all show the extent of the evil; for the facilities given by the Act of 1862 for private arrangements had led to gross abuse, which reflected the greatest possible discredit upon the legislation of the country. Under the Act of 1862 composition deeds became a part of the Bankruptcy Law; and the number of them had since very largely increased. Their number in 1862 was 698, and in 1867 3,971, giving a gross amount of unsecured debts of £373,000, as against £8,246,432. The number of the deeds of assignment registered in 1862 was 1,886, in 1864 2,284, and in 1867 2,803; but the gross amount of unsecured debts had risen from £1,013,000 in 1862, to £5,725,592 in 1864, and £10,642,646 in 1867. The same result had occurred with deeds of inspectorship, which from 46 in 1862 had increased to 138 in 1867, showing a gross amount of unsecured debts of £190,400 in the former year as against £10,753,550 in the latter. No man could go into any counting-house in the City without finding the present state of the law strongly reprobated. It really would almost appear that the House of Commons had successfully endeavoured to invent some system by which creditors should be mulcted of the money to which they were entitled. Seeing how the Act of 1862 was working, the House in 1864 appointed a Committee which inquired very carefully and fully into the question, and afterwards made a Report, recommending the establishment of some cheap and simple mode of administering bankrupts' estates, such as the Scotch system. The Committee endeavoured to disentangle the question of punishment of debtors from that of the distribution of their estates, and they recommended the abolition of the Bankruptcy Courts, both the London and the District Courts. He could not say that these recommendations had been productive of much good. It was quite true that they caused the introduction of a Bill in the following Session; but that Bill was of so cumbrous a character and so little regarded the recommendations of the Committee that it soon ceased to exist. The Bill of 1866, though more formidable in appearance than its predecessor with its 480 clauses, required two Bills to prop it up, and was now considered useless. He thought that the House of Commons should be specially charged with a subject which was so intimately connected with trade, and he found with deep regret that this great question was relegated to the other House. He could not refer to what had occurred in "another place"; but he hoped to receive some information as to the principles of the Bill which the Government intended to bring before the House of Commons. The present law was a remnant of the old system of protection which governed all our commercial dealings two centuries ago. We began by protecting the creditor, and then went on to protect the debtor. The result was that we had a system of protection so perfect for the debtor, and so adverse to the creditor, that it was as discreditable to fair dealing as any of the worst cases of protection in the matter of trade which had long ago ceased to exist. It might be described as giving immunity to fraud, and as confiscating the assets of creditors. In 1865 the amount divided among creditors was £450,000, and to divide that sum it cost £375,000. When they coupled this with the fact that every man could make himself bankrupt and get discharged from his debts with the greatest immunity, he thought that it must be felt that there could not be a worse system. A debtor who did not want to pay his debts frequently said, "I court inquiry, and I will put my affairs into the Court of Bankruptcy," and under this threat creditors took anything they could get rather than lose the whole. When these matters were considered they could scarcely be surprised at the distress which paralyzed the country, and the effect of this vicious legislation had been greatly increased by the facilities given to Limited Liability companies. In his opinion the sooner they abolished the whole system of the Bankruptcy Law the better. He hoped that they would adopt the Scotch system, modified to suit the wants of this country. Small changes would be of no use, and whilst they retained the present staff of Bankruptcy officials the Bankruptcy system would never have the public confidence, and would not deserve to have it. He wished to know the principles upon which the proposed Bill was founded; whether it was in accordance with the recommendations of the Committee of 1865; and further, whether, instead of a Bill framed in cumbrous and tortuous language, it would not be possible to bring in a short and simple measure? If they did not do this they had better at once repeal the existing Bankruptcy Law, and do for one year without a Bankruptcy

Mr. Moffatt

Law; for he was satisfied that this even would be a great relief to the commerce of the country.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that it would be very inconvenient for him to state the principles of the measure. The House was perfectly aware that a Bill had been brought in and read a second time in the House of Lords; and, in due course, he hoped it would come before the House of Commons, when they would have the advantage of the hon. Member's knowledge of the subject in discussing the measure.

Motion, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," agreed to.

SUPPLY—ARMY ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

- (1.) £322,900, Clothing Establishments.
- (2.) £506,300, Barrack Establishment.
- (3.) £26,800, Divine Service.
- (4.) £13,000, Martial Law.
- (5.) £280,800, Hospital Establishment.
- (6.) £686,800, Militia and Inspection of Reserve Forces.
- (7.) £58,000, Yeomanry Cavalry.
- (8.) £285,100, Volunteer Corps.

COLONEL BARTTELOT expressed a wish to make some remarks upon this Vote. An influential deputation, composed of Volunteer commanding officers, had recently waited upon his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War. The deputation was most courteously received, but its prayer was not granted—that prayer being that some increase should be made in the amount of the Grant voted for the Volunteer service. He (Colonel Barttelot) believed that, in the opinion of that House and the country, the Volunteer force was considered a most valuable though inexpensive one, and that it ought to be maintained in an efficient state. The question for the House and the country to consider was, whether such efficiency could be secured by a small addition to the existing Grant, or whether, by the refusal of the application made, they were running the risk of diminishing the force or causing it to dwindle away. It might be said that the force had not fallen off in numbers; but had, on the contrary, increased, and was increasing. That was no doubt true; but, nevertheless, subscriptions to the force were gradually declining; and the consequence was that a great amount of expense was thrown upon the force, and especially upon its officers. It was not, he believed, the wish of the House or of the country that that should be the case. If the force was to be kept up as a Reserve force some additional Grant must be made to it. All the Volunteers required was, that all expenses connected with drills away from head-quarters should be paid by the country. The Volunteers were willing to give their services to their country; but they considered that if they went to different places for the purposes of drilling for their country, that their country ought to pay their expenses. He thought that a Royal Commission ought to be issued to inquire into the whole question of the Reserve forces, of which the Volunteers were a valuable auxiliary.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH felt that the Volunteer force must have been greatly disappointed at the answer given to the deputation the other day. The impression created in the minds of hon. Members, by the language used by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War last year, was that this subject would be well considered and that some addition would be made to the resources of the Volunteer corps. The Yeomanry force was actually paid while out for training. That was not required by the Volunteers; but he thought, if the public provided the funds for prizes to stimulate rifle-shooting, all other necessary expenses ought to be borne by the State, and especially that of clothing, which was a necessary article of Volunteer equipment.

COLONEL SYKES, though not anxious to increase the public expenditure, thought that the Volunteers ought to receive something more than they did. The majority of the men composing the Volunteer ranks were workmen receiving weekly wages averaging from £1 to 30s. per week; and in their case, after three or four years' service, when their clothing was worn out they were unable to replace it, and were consequently lost to the service. The regimental subscriptions were always considerable, and the officers in command deserved the greatest possible credit for the pecuniary assistance they rendered. In India when men were specially employed they received an increased allowance. And he thought that when the Volunteers went to such places as Brighton or Portsmouth, it would be well to pay for their transit. Such casual allowances might be made without imposing any serious burden on the country.

COLONEL C. H. LINDSAY: Sir, I rise in the position of a Volunteer commanding officer, and as a duty which I owe to the service in which I am engaged; and I cannot help remarking that the question of an increase of the Capitation Grant is a much more serious one than many people seem to think. I shall, therefore, divide the remarks that I think necessary to make into three parts—namely, the past, the present, and the future, of the Volunteer movement. It is not difficult to describe the two former. With regard to the past, I will simply date back to the year 1859, and ask the Committee to remember what was the feeling which existed upon the question of invasion by France. It was, no doubt, an uneasy one, and one that was derogatory to the character and position of England; and if it had continued, most injurious to the interests of her trade and commerce. A remedy for this state of feeling was wanted. It was found by the bone and sinew of the country, who commenced the great national movement of defence; but which, for a time, did not inspire the necessary confidence. It must be, however, in the recollection of the Committee, that the movement did before long gain the approval and confidence of the country; and, from that time to this, a valuable and necessary armament has been recognized, possessing a great moral effect over Europe, settling the question of invasion, and dispelling alarm and panic, which would have been so destructive to every interest. So much for the past. With respect to the present position of the Volunteer service, it continues to exist. It exists partly upon the inadequate support it receives from the Government; partly, upon the support from private sources, and partly upon its own merits. It is more efficient than at any other period of its history. It has been mainly instrumental in the introduction of rifle shooting throughout the country. It has been instrumental in advancing science, in the manufacture of small arms, and it has produced the most remarkable skill in the use of those arms. Its discipline, its prestige, its morality, and its social element, are in a higher state of action than at any other time; and it is ready and anxious to continue to preserve those attributes, provided the Government of the day is willing to support it, and provide for its requirements; and this brings me to the important subject of the desired increase of the Capitation Grant, which is not going to be given. Now, Sir, as a Volunteer commanding officer, I have received in common with every other commanding officer in the country, that ultimatum, and I have, therefore, no hesitation in saying that the axe has been laid at the root by that ultimatum; and that its continued existence and efficiency are endangered by it; and that we, as commanding officers, will be placed in a very awkward and delicate position. The time has arrived when some clear understanding is necessary, so that there may be no mistake as to the position in which we are, as the nation's guard of defence. This is the serious and natural view to take, and it bears especially upon the future position of the movement. Now, it has frequently been remarked that the Volunteer movement has taken deep root in the country. Sir, no institution can be said to have taken root at all, if it is neither self-supporting nor adequately supported by the Government; and it is partly for that reason that we have, on two or three occasions, recorded our almost unanimous opinion that the requirements of it cannot be much longer met with success, unless the Government consent to increase the Grant, for the purses of those who have always been friends of the movement are wearied out. Sir, that significant deputation which waited upon the Secretary of State for War, a few days ago, informed him, through the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire, what we, as commanding officers, considered to be necessary: that we did not ask as a favour, or a right, but that we considered our duty, both to the Government and the country, was to inform them of our opinion; and the noble Lord made it clearly understood that, in the event of an unfavourable reply, we should consider ourselves relieved from any responsibility should the Volunteer service collapse for want of support. We consider our opinion, as commanding officers, to be entitled to the fullest respect; and we cannot agree that the flourishing state of the service should be used as an argument against further aid from Government, for it would be a premium upon inefficiency and languor; and it is an unjust acknowledgment, after the extraordinary exertions that have been made to keep up the service in high efficiency and discipline for the honour and credit of the country. If the Volunteer movement is not worth any additional support from Government, it would be better that that policy should be declared, so that our position may be clearly understood. But, unless something more be done in support of the movement, we may all find ourselves in a serious scrape; some eight or ten years hence, when the present dynasty of France may have passed away, when our army may be engaged in some European war, and our shores denuded of the British bayonet, owing to the Volunteers of the country having dwindled down to a myth. We cannot now expect any additional Grant this year, owing to the heavy expenditure required by the army; but we ought to receive some assurance that our necessary requirements will receive the favourable consideration of the Government next year; for unless it can do so, consequences much to be regretted might ensue, against which our efforts would be powerless.

MR. DENT, in answer to the hon. Member for Devizes (Mr. D. Griffith), said he supposed that the reason why the Yeomanry were paid and the Volunteers were not was, that the Yeomanry had to be away from home with their horses for eight days, while it seldom happened that the Volunteers were absent for a single night.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, he had always been in favour of economy; but he thought it barely respectable for the country to take services which were admitted to be very valuable, and, at the same time, to allow poor men to put their hands into their own pockets for the purpose of rendering those services.

MR. OTWAY contended that all men performing the same service should have the same rate of pay. When he had asked whether the serjeant-instructors of Volunteers were to have the additional 2*d.* as the same class of men received in the army, he was told that the matter was under the consideration of Government. He wished now to ascertain whether that question had been settled?

MR. AYRTON said, that the other evening, while he was calling attention to some remarks made by the Secretary of State for War, the right hon. Baronet had interrupted him for the purpose of declaring that he had not made the statement attributed to him. Since then he had enjoyed the advantage of reading a very accurate report of the speech made by the right hon. Baronet, and found that it exactly corresponded with the views which he had expressed, and that the right hon.

Colonel C. H. Lindsay

Baronet did, in fact, inform the House that it was his intention to put the Militia and Volunteer forces under the command of general officers of high standing in the different districts of England. He should therefore like to have some clear and specific explanation of the views of the right hon. Baronet on this point. In his reply, at the close of the evening, the right hon. Baronet stated that it was his intention to appoint officers of rank, who, in some way or other—he did not make it very clear how—were to have control over the Militia and Volunteer forces. Did he contemplate any proceeding which was to interpose any general officers, or any officer at all, with authority over those forces, between the Volunteer corps and Militia, and the Secretary of State for War? If he did, the matter ought to be very formally and distinctly brought under the consideration of the House. He apprehended it would be a wholly unconstitutional proceeding to divest the Secretary of State for War of any part of his official responsibility in relation to the Militia or the Volunteers; and if any attempt were made, directly or indirectly, to place the Volunteer force under the control of general officers of the army, it must end in the total destruction of that body. The very essence of the Volunteer movement was that it was a spontaneous movement of the people, which should be carried on under the direct authority of the civil, without any intervention of the military power.

LORD ELCHO said, the intention of the Secretary of State for War was excellent—that of placing the Volunteers and other Reserves under a distinguished general officer, in order to effect as far as possible unity of action in the place of the present divided authority; but he did not see that the right hon. Baronet would be able to do more in time of peace by the change than was at present done by the inspectors. The Militia and Volunteers would never be required to be called out in the time of peace, and in time of war, then, ipso facto, they passed from these generals of Reserve to the complete control of the Commander-in-Chief as any other part of the regular army. There was a rumour abroad—he could not say whether it was correct or not—that Colonel Erskine had been, as it were, superseded; and that that gallant officer, who had been eight years intimately connected with the Volunteers (three or four years under Colonel M'Murdo) had been treated in this matter with scant courtesy by the right hon. Baronet. The change had been made without his knowledge, or any previous consultation with him; and the first notice he received of it was an intimation from the Secretary of State for War of a new appointment of an inferior character, and between £300 or £400 per annum less in amount. He very much doubted whether, in the interest of the corps, it would not have been advisable, if the Secretary of State for War, before making so great a change, would have taken so old an officer into his counsel, more especially as he knew from personal knowledge that Colonel Erskine had some scheme in view for brigading and otherwise re-organizing the force. As regards the Parliamentary Grant, he wished to observe that the deputation who had an interview with the Secretary for War on the subject did not apply in formâ pauperis. Neither did they profess to agitate on the question, or desire to come to Parliament to ask for an increased Grant; but it was his conviction that there was danger of the necessary expenses not being covered by the present Grant, and of a very large portion of the force falling away in consequence. It was thought right to make known that danger, leaving the Government and Parliament to decide whether it was necessary to take any steps in the matter. The Secretary of State for War had informed the House that the Government did not consider themselves justified in proposing this year an increase in the Grant; and what he (Lord Elcho) would suggest, was that the present state of the Volunteer corps with that of our Reserves in general, should form the subject of inquiry under a Royal Commission, and he intended to bring the subject before the House after the Easter Recess.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, he should not then consider whether the whole question of our Reserve force should be referred to a Royal Commission; but it would be very desirable to make the grievance of the Volunteer corps the subject of such an inquiry. The difference between the Volunteer and Militia forces was such that the inquiry into one ought to be to a certain degree independent of the other. He hoped, therefore, that the Secretary of State for War would not consider himself precluded by the answer he gave the other day, from allowing this question to undergo a strict inquiry. The time had arrived when the inquiry of 1862 ought to be resumed, because at that time the Volunteer force was so young that it was impossible to test the amount of expenditure that would be required by the officers and men in keeping up the force, and how far the Parliamentary Grant then proposed would meet it. He had received a memorial from 8,000 Volunteers in Scotland for presentation to the Secretary of State for War; but he had not presented it, because they were willing that their claims should merge into those of the general body. Many of the corps were now in a position which made it very uncertain whether they would be able, in consequence of the difficulty they experienced in obtaining officers, to keep up their efficiency. No doubt there were many officers who, by the same public spirit as led them to engage in the service, would be prevented backing out of it when they found the obligations falling on them rather too severely. Therefore they had a strong claim on the Government; and he hoped the House would not allow the matter to be settled by the declaration that, as long as the Volunteer force kept up their numbers, there was no occasion for any additional Grant.

MR. ACLAND hoped that the Secretary for War would give the House a fuller explanation than had as yet been afforded, respecting the scheme for the organization of the Reserved forces. He hoped the right hon. Baronet would state his views clearly and fully on that subject. His impression of what the Secretary of State said on a former occasion was that he had found it expedient for administrative purposes to concentrate certain offices in the hands of one general officer; and that he quoted a letter from the general commanding the forces in the North, to show that certain inconvenience arose from the present relations between the generals of districts and this auxiliary force. For his own part he must say—and his experience dated from the very commencement of the Volunteer movement—that a good deal of inconvenience now arose from the undefined relations between commanding officers of Volunteers, Volunteer associations, who endeavour not very successfully to provide the corps with locomotion, the assistant inspector, and the general of the district. It was quite true that, under the Act of Parliament, there was a line that might be drawn, which did clearly define their respective duties. But he could give very strong instances to show that great inconvenience did arise from this source. He had had to deal with three successive generals at Plymouth; and if there was one thing more than another that characterized them it was their extreme unwillingness to assume authority over the Volunteers, or do anything to complicate relations with their officers. Many things were now done by a kind of tacit understanding between the parties, which it would be better to put upon a certain footing. But these things required to be looked into, and it was possible the difficulties might be got over. After the reference which had been made by the noble Lord (Lord Elcho) to the case of an individual officer, whom he felt pride in calling his personal friend, he must be allowed to say that he hoped the right hon. Baronet would be able to show that Colonel Erskine had been treated in this matter with proper courtesy. He had heard nothing from Colonel Erskine; but the report alluded to by the noble Lord certainly was widely current, and he must say, if it should turn out that a Minister occupying the high position of the right hon. Baronet had treated Colonel Erskine with any want of courtesy, there never was an officer whose character and services less deserved such treatment. He believed there was no individual in the country to whom the whole Volunteer force owed so much as to Colonel Erskine. He did not know whether it would be better that the whole force should be under one general, or under respective inspectors; but if Colonel Erskine had incurred a loss of income to the extent of some £400 a year, and if, instead of being promoted, he had been placed in an inferior position, he hoped the right hon. Baronet would at least be able to show that he had made an economical arrangement, which, from present information, he very much doubted. It would be premature to express any opinion with regard to the proposal of the noble Lord for a Royal Commission to inquire into the state of the Reserve force generally; but, as colonel of an administrative battalion, he was able to state on the authority of his adjutant, that the ten corps under his command were in a good state of equipment, and if they had not a balance in hand they had not anticipated their future resources. Many of the gentlemen who commanded them had acted liberally, and he believed that the Volunteer force was most effective when it had partly relied on local pecuniary support. A relation of his, out of the ordinary resources, had been able to give his men great coats, and another captain had supplied his men with capes out of the ordinary resources of the regiment. The country corps were at present allowed 5s. per head for battalion drill, but none was made to the town corps; and, in that respect, he thought a change ought to be made, and some such allowance given to the town corps to go to the butts and qualify for the position of extra proficient. But he did not think that for equipment and the ordinary expenses of the corps it was necessary to raise the allowance. The Volunteers had been a good deal petted by public confidence, and care must be taken lest people should begin to think that they were making themselves too expensive. He thought it very desirable that they should, if possible, increase their efficiency and discipline before asking for much more money. If they could not obtain money for brigade meetings he hoped the case would be considered before another year. But still he had great doubt as to the expediency of an indiscriminate increase of the Capitation allowance to any very large extent.

Sir Edward Colebrooke

MR. DILLWYN said, he was of opinion that unless some aid was afforded to the Volunteers they could not be kept at their present state of efficiency. The legitimate expenses of the Volunteer corps very much exceeded the amount they received from the Capitation Grant, and the commanding officers of regiments had generally a considerable amount to pay out of their own pockets. Even with the increased sum which was asked from the Government, he (Mr. Dillwyn) knew that he would still have to put his hand in his pocket, though not to the same extent. It was in fact a question, whether the Volunteer force was to be maintained on an efficient footing.

SIR ROBERT ANSTRUTHER observed that the Secretary of State for War had informed the House the other night that it would be impossible to increase the Grant as a whole; but the Government should recollect that the object was not to increase the numbers of the force so much as to render the force efficient. For this end no arrangement was likely to be so serviceable as keeping them in the field with regular troops, and it would be worth while to allow them a field allowance for this purpose.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, he thought that the time had arrived when no antique jealousy of the Crown should be allowed to interfere with the efficiency of either the Volunteers or the Militia. He understood the Secretary for War to propose that the Militia and the Volunteers should be under the command of one general officer; but he should suggest that both forces should be under the command of the general officer commanding the particular district. In the event of war, the Volunteers and the Militia must be brought into the general military organization of the country, and they must, in that case, be placed under the command of the officers commanding the various districts; and if they were now to be placed under separate command and kept distinct from the rest of the army great difficulties would be incurred in effecting the change at the time of the breaking out of war. By putting the Volunteers and the Militia under the command of the generals of districts those forces would be brought into more perfect union with the regular military service of the country, and would render them more like soldiers than they were at present, while it would greatly increase their general efficiency.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he not only could have no objection to what had been said by his hon. Friend behind him, but he could not dissent from a word he had heard on the subject, with the exception only of what fell from the hon. and gallant Member for Abingdon (Colonel C. H. Lindsay), who went so far as to state his opinion that, because the Government had declined to accede to the propositions which had been made to them, they were indifferent to the success of the Volunteers. He was anxious to say that there was no foundation whatever for such an assertion. As far as he was personally concerned, he could only express his regret that the hon. Member should have made a statement in support of which he could give no good reason. Those who were members of that most important deputation, and those who heard his statement on Monday night could not accuse him of having giving utterance to any remark that would justify such an accusation being brought against him. In his opinion the Volunteer movement was a very noble one, and he appreciated most highly the value of the fine body of men it had placed at the service of the country. His Colleagues entirely concurred with him in looking upon the movement as the most striking and successful one that had taken place in any country in Europe for a long time. From the time of its commencement it had had a great effect upon the Continent; and it was a proof of the power of this country that it had been able almost in a moment to produce a defensive force of such great strength and efficiency. Under these circumstances it was clear that he could have had no intention to under-rate the importance of the Volunteer force. Her Majesty's Government had, however, to consider whether they could, consistently with their duty, accede to the request of the Volunteer officers for an increased Capitation Grant. He stated to that deputation that, so far as he had been able to form an opinion, the question was one that varied in different localities, and that if there were many places where an additional Grant would be convenient to the officers there were other places not thus situated. On Monday night he stated what were the facts and what was the reason why the Government could not, at this moment, grant the increase of the Volunteer expenses which they had asked. An hon. Member had spoken of the smallness of the increase asked for, and said it was a thousand pities that the Government had not increased the Grant. But the money was not small. The expense of the Volunteer movement, whatever might be its value, was £385,000 a year. Add £185,000 to the expenses, and, whatever might be his personal feeling to the Volunteer force, his belief was this, that if he had come down to the House and asked for an increased Vote of £185,000, numbers of Gentlemen opposite would have started up to ask upon what grounds he made such a proposal. He would have been asked whether the Volunteers were falling off in number; whether they were increasing their efficiency; and whether it was impossible that the movement could be supported by the allowance already made to them? He must remind the House that there had been a considerable change in the nature of the Volunteer movement since its commencement. The Volunteer force was originally intended to be a self-supporting force, and that it should consist of a class of men every one of whom should provide himself with uniform, and should pay his own expenses. He thought that, as far as the defence of the country was concerned, the Volunteer movement was worth all the money that it had cost us, and that it would be only advisable to give any moderately additional assistance which could really be shown to be necessary. His hon.

Sir John Pakington

Friend the Member for Devonshire (Mr. Acland) had referred, as he presumed, to the increase in the allowance which he had proposed in order to enable members of administrative battalions in the country to meet together for the purposes of battalion drill.

MR. ACLAND said, he intended to refer to the Grant made for that object, and he had suggested that money should be granted for the purpose of enabling battalions to take part in brigade field days.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he had proposed that increase because he thought that the case was one in which it might reasonably be given; and he should be ready to give his consideration to any case in which it was thought that a similar course might be attended with advantage. He would now turn to another matter, and he trusted that the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton) would not impute to him any disrespect when he stated that the hon. Gentleman had entirely mistaken what he had said on a former occasion. The hon. Gentleman had said that he had referred to his speech. The hon. Gentleman had in that case done more than he himself had done; but, whatever report the hon. Gentleman had consulted, he could only say that he was misinformed when he stated that it was his intention to place the Volunteers and the Militia under the general officers commanding in districts. He had not the slightest idea of doing anything of the kind. His hon. Friend the Member for Devonshire had rightly interpreted his intentions, which, however, appear to have been misunderstood by several hon. Members. Hitherto the Volunteers and the Militia had been placed under the command of three different persons. The Volunteers had been commanded—or rather, placed under the supervision of an officer of the rank of a colonel or lieutenant-colonel. The Militia were also placed under the superintendence and charge of an officer of the rank of a colonel or lieutenant-colonel; and the Army of Reserve were similarly commanded. His belief was, that it would be better to place these bodies under the direction of one instead of three distinct officers, and that that officer should possess a higher rank than that of colonel or lieutenant colonel. He had therefore placed these bodies under the supervision of a general officer of high rank; but he had not intended to carry the change any further, or to alter the relative authority of the commanders of the different corps, or their relations to the civil power. Under the new arrangement, the Secretary of State would be able so to improve the organization that the local authority would not, as hitherto, be deprived of the assistance of these forces in case of need. He would now turn to the remarks which his noble Friend the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho) and his hon. Friend the Member for Devonshire (Mr. Acland) had made with regard to Colonel Erskine; and he regretted that he should be accused of a discourtesy, which he trusted was entirely alien to his nature or his character. His noble Friend had alluded to a circumstance which was the result of an accident—a mistake which was corrected and explained fully and frankly to Colonel Erskine himself, and he trusted, therefore, that he should not hear of it again. It had also been stated by the noble Lord that Colonel Erskine, on being deprived of his position in connection with the Volunteers, had been placed in the same position as the one which he had previously held.

LORD ELCHO said, he did not consider it a promotion; because, whereas Colonel M'Murdo had been promoted to the office of Inspector General of Volunteers, Colonel Erskine was only placed in the same position as that which Colonel M'Murdo previously occupied.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, that his desire had been throughout to treat Colonel Erskine with the greatest possible fairness and consideration, and it was in that spirit that he was led to offer Colonel Erskine the command of the Military Train, which had been rendered vacant by the lamented death of Colonel Kennedy, who had fallen a victim to the exertions in connection with the Abyssinian war. He had been sorry to hear the hon. Member for Devonshire say that he had fined Colonel Erskine £400 a year. He did not know what the difference was between the value of the two appointments. [Mr. ACLAND said, that the effect of the change was to decrease Colonel Erskine's income between £300 and £400 a year.] Whatever it was, it was only a matter of two years; for at the end of that time Colonel Erskine's command as Inspector-General of Volunteers would have come to a termination. He believed, however, that he had appointed Colonel Erskine to a superior position; and if anything should occur to interfere with the permanence of the present arrangement, it would of course be their duty to make some provision for its effects as far as Colonel Erskine was concerned. He had not proposed the new arrangement with any special view to economy; but its results would be to produce a slight reduction of expense. The hon. Member for Lanarkshire (Sir Edward Colebrooke) had suggested an inquiry into the present state of the Volunteer force; but it was not necessary for him then to enter into that question, because the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire had given notice of his intention to bring forward the same subject, though in a larger form, and when the noble Lord did so he should, for his own part, be prepared to give his best attention to the matter.

MR. ACLAND explained that, in the remarks that he had made, he had spoken not for the Volunteers generally, but only for his own battalion.

LORD ELCHO felt very strongly that it was not desirable it should go forth in any way to the public that the Volunteer commanding officers came to the House of Commons asking for money in forma pauperis. He protested against any such impression getting abroad, as it was possible it might do, when the hon. Member for Devonshire (Mr. Acland) said it was very likely that some officers might want more money to spend. They had heard a good deal about Government by minorities. Well, it looked to him very much as if on that question of the Volunteer force they were carrying on Government by a minority, because his hon. Friend who had spoken represented a small minority of that force. Both last year and this year every means had been taken to ascertain the real opinion of the force on that point, and he now ventured to say, speaking not as an individual or in the name of the London commanding officers only, but speaking advisedly in the name of the Volunteer force in general, that their deliberate opinion was that that force could not be maintained at its present strength with the present Capitation Grant. A commanding officer was sitting near him who spent a large sum annually upon his corps; and another Gentleman, also a Member of that House, informed him that his regiment cost him £200 or £300 a year. Their point was this, that in their opinion it was requisite to call the attention of the Secretary of State for War to the fact that the necessary expenses of Volunteer corps were not covered by the Parliamentary Grant, which had to be largely supplemented by the subscriptions of the officers and men, and also, at the same time, to express the strong feeling which they believed to pervade the Volunteer force that those who freely and without pay gave their services to the State should be relieved from the necessity of incurring such personal expenditure. His right hon. Friend said the original intention of the force was that every man was to bear his own expenses. That might have been the theory; but in practice it could not be carried out, and a Commission in 1862 recommended Parliament to give the Volunteer corps a Capitation Grant of £1. It was proved before that Commission that two-thirds of the force were composed of artisans and men of the labouring class. Therefore, if they wished to keep up that force, and to relieve the officers from the unfair expenditure to which they were now put, Parliament must, sooner or later, be prepared to increase the Grant. But he might state that the officers had made up their minds to do nothing further—never to send another deputation to the War Office—never to make another appeal in that House; that having now finally laid their claims before the House and the country, they left it to the Government to say what steps they would take to recognize them. If it could be shown that the existence of the force depended upon whether 20s., 30s., or 40s. was sufficient, he believed, in opposition to his hon. Friend, that the country would deem that a sufficient ground for an inquiry. At any rate, in 1862, it was deemed sufficient ground for an inquiry. But he did not propose that the inquiry should be limited to so small a point as that; but that it should be full and complete, embracing our whole system of military organization, with reference to its capabilities for expansion in time of war and for home defence. That was the question which he intended to bring before the House after Easter, and the incidental point now raised might fairly form part of the inquiry.

SIR T. F. BUXTON said, he thought it was desirable to have a wider range of selection for the commanders of Volunteer corps than they had at present. At present the class was extremely limited, because the commanding officer must not only have some knowledge of military matters, but he must be able from his own means to keep a horse, and to be prepared to spend from £300 to £600 a year upon his regiment. He thought this limitation was a very serious one, and one that ought to be abolished.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he believed that, under ordinary circumstances, the House would be disposed cheerfully to vote any reasonable amount that might be requisite for the Volunteer force; but he thought it might be preferable to give them the clothing, and leave the Capitation Grant as it stood.

Vote agreed to.

(9.) 39,600, Enrolled Pensioners and Army Reserve Force.

SIR WILLIAM GALLWEY wished to know, when the instructions relative to the Army Reserve and to the Militia Reserve would be issued; as it was very important that they should be issued before the Militia were called out.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, perhaps the right hon. Gentleman would take this opportunity to tell them what had been done, up to the present time, with the Army Reserve; and, whether anything had been done, or was presumed to be done, with regard to the Militia Reserve. Last year the right hon. Gentleman took a Vote of £30,000 for Volunteers in the Militia engaging to serve in a Militia Reserve Force, and £20,000 for men volunteering by commutation of service for enrolment in the Army Reserve Force. They had heard a great deal last year of these Reserve forces; but he could not hear that anything had been done.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, the noble Lord referred to this question on Monday last, and had charged him with having made no reference to this subject in his general Statement. The noble Lord was mistaken. He stated then—that what he was prepared to repeat now—that one very important step had been taken, and that in accordance with the plan of the right hon. Member for Huntingdon (General Peel), the Government had decided that the entire corps of the Militia should be raised up to its increased quota—half the battalions in the present year and the other half next year. Last year, before the change was decided on, the Militia regiments were 5,000 below the strength of their reduced quota. But when the order was given to raise the regiments to their full quota recruiting commenced, and was so successfully carried on, that, instead of the force being 5,000 below the reduced quota, it was now only 2,300 below the increased quota for the present year. With regard to the issue of the regulations to which the hon. Baronet had referred, the only reason why they had not been laid upon the table of the House was that before doing so he wished to have the opinion of General Lindsay respecting them, as he would have so large a share in carrying them into effect. The men were allowed to commute a portion of their army service for service in the Reserve; and the Vote of £7,000 for the probable number of men who would engage under the Army Reserve Act, 1867, was intended to cover the expense of whatever men they were able to obtain. But General Lindsay would enter upon his duties in a few days, and the regulations would be laid on the table of the House immediately after Easter. The noble Lord did not appear to be sanguine, and he could not say that he was sanguine either, as to the success of the scheme of a Reserve force.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, it seemed to him that the original intention of the Government on that subject had not been carried out. It was the intention of the right hon. Gentleman to commence the formation of the two forces last year; but he gathered from his statement that not a single man had yet joined either the Militia Reserve force or the Army Reserve force.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, that the first step he had taken to carry out the Act was to increase the number of the Militia.

Vote agreed to.

(10.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £768,400, be granted to Her Majesty (in addition to the sum of £200,000 already voted on account), towards defraying the Charge of Superintending Establishment of, and Expenditure for, Works, Buildings, and Repairs, at Home and Abroad, which will come in course of payment from the 1st day of April 1868 to the 31st day of March 1869, inclusive."

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, that certain charges for police, &c., were transferred from Votes 3 and 12 to this Vote, and they swelled the Vote in appearance, although the sum asked for was not greater in reality. The Vote included a proposal to spend £20,000 upon hospitals for contagious diseases.

MAJOR ANSON called attention to the increase that had taken place in the establishment charges. In 1863 these charges amounted to £78,000, and they had risen to the present charge of £100,544. In 1859-60 we did work amounting to £1,455,000, and the establishment charges for that year were only £56,526. In 1860 we did work to the amount of £1,752,000, and the establishment charges were £62,500. This year the Estimates for work to be done amount to £867,000, yet the establishment charges exceed £100,000. That seemed to him a most unnecessary increase, and he hoped that some explanation would be given. From a comparison of Returns which had been obtained in the years 1857 and 1867 respectively, he found that there had been a decrease in the barrack accommodation to the extent of accommodation for 2,000 men. Yet, in the intervening ten years, we had spent in brick and mortar, in one way or another, no less than £9,583,000. Naturally, one would have imagined that the barrack expenditure in colonial and tropical climates would have been very heavy compared with the outlay at home. But he found that we had spent during that period four times as much upon barracks at home as we had done in the colonies. With regard, again, to married soldiers' quarters: it was proposed now to devote no less a sum than £935,000 towards that object, in addition to £240,000 already voted; but it seemed that it had taken no less than ten years to spend that sum of £240,000; instead of providing, as seemed the natural course, whatever accommodation was required for married soldiers at once. At the same rate of expenditure it would take twenty-two years to expend this Vote of £935,000 upon the housing of married soldiers; and it seemed doubtful whether the expenditure was necessary when they could spread it over thirty years — at all events the House ought to be informed in this and every other case what increase of accommodation is secured for the money spent.

MR. CHILDERS called attention to what, he said, formed a serious departure from the usual mode of stating some of the items of the present Vote. In the case of any Vote proposed for the first time and involving further liability, it was usual to set out in the first column of the Estimates the total amount which the Department had it in contemplation to expend upon that particular object. And having dealt thus frankly with the House, the Government were able to come down in any subsequent year, when a further instalment of the money was asked for and objected to, and say that, to some extent, an implied sanction has been given by the House to the total expenditure when the matter was originally broached in the Estimates. This year, however, items, which last year gave no indication of being parts of a great whole, were stated in the Estimates as forming part of a total estimated outlay of £1,416,000, of which part had been voted in previous years. This would throw anyone off his guard, and was a very improper way of stating the items. Again, with regard to the two items of £75,000 each, for alterations to works for a revised armament in the principal sea batteries at Gibraltar and Malta, he thought it should have been stated that these sums were in excess of the original Estimate of £470,000, whereas he found no reference to past expenditure under this head. As to the proposed expenditure for additional barrack accommodation at Chelsea, such accommodation was probably wanted; but an explanation should have been given on the subject. The expenditure at Woolwich of £70,000 for storehouses for miscellaneous stores from the Tower he held to be perfectly unnecessary; for abundant accommodation might be placed at the disposal of the War Office by the Admiralty, as the abandonment of Deptford dockyard was contemplated. He did not know whether the Vote of £3,000 now proposed would pledge the Committee to the expenditure of the remaining £67,000.

LORD ELCHO, calling attention to the charges attending the camp at Aldershot, urged the desirability of adopting the recommendation of the Royal Commission by dispensing with a permanent encampment. The buildings were liable to constant expenditure for repairs, and it gave great dissatisfaction, both to officers and men, to be kept in camp during the winter. It would be much better to keep the troops in barracks in different parts of the country, and march them to these places temporarily, keeping them under canvas there. It was also desirable that as many officers or generals as possible should have the opportunity of commanding large bodies of troops, and such appointments should therefore be made yearly, instead of only once in five years.

COLONEL SYKES called attention to the charge for the surveyor, deputy surveyors, &c., of the Royal Engineers. He objected to an increasing establishment as an insidious thing which they could not get rid of. He remarked that while there was a decrease in one Department of the least paid officials from twenty-seven to twenty-two, there was an increase of the higher paid from twenty-nine to thirty-two. He called attention to the increase, not only of the clerks, but of military foremen, and asked why it had taken place. He hoped the right hon. Baronet would, at his earliest convenience, give some explanation of the increase in the establishment to which he referred.

CAPTAIN VIVIAN wished to say a few words about the camp at Aldershot. He had the honour of sitting in the House when the camp was first projected, and he then raised his voice against it. They had been told, with great truth, that one of the causes of the great losses which our troops suffered in the first Crimean campaign was that they did not know how to kill their meat, to forage, or to perform the other duties incident to the position in which they were placed; and the French troops had a great advantage over them because they had been instructed in routine field work. It was proposed, therefore, to form a camp at Aldershot to give a training to our soldiers, and that was all very well. But in a short time those large barracks were built at immense outlay. He would venture to say that it would have been infinitely better to have spent the money on improving the various barracks in London, some of which were a disgrace to the army. Aldershot, instead of being a camp, was now a large military town, and a military town of the worst description, and was extremely unpopular among the men. When a soldier came home from foreign service, instead of being allowed to go into country quarters or to see his friends, he was sent to Aldershot. He hoped that Aldershot would not be so much used as a winter quarter for the future. It might be available, however, in the summer months. He quite agreed with what had been said by his hon. Friend about the change made in the Estimates. It was a dangerous change. Close upon £40,000 had been spent, and spent wisely, on the establishment at Pimlico, and a large yearly rent was now paid for it. There was no doubt that there would be ample room for all the Woolwich stores in Pimlico.

MR. OTWAY said, that whenever he attempted to cut down a Vote for works he was always told that the works were in progress, and that it would be impossible to make any reduction. Last year, when a new item crept into those Estimates, he and his Friends thought they should make an effort to reduce the Vote ; but when they went to a division, they were, of course, beaten, the House being always in much the same condition when they were voting away millions, and there being always a number of Members ready to rush in from the gastronomical Department to support the Minister. In this Vote 14 there were some most objectionable items. The other evening they had a debate as to the military cost of the colonies ; but the Vote taken on that occasion by no means represented the whole cost, because in this Vote would be found very large items with reference to those very colonies. For instance, it was proposed to spend £202,000 for the defence of the Mauritius. He doubted whether anyone was ever going to attack the Mauritius ; but, in any case, the money would be only thrown away. It was utterly impossible to defend that island by any such expenditure, and by retaining in it two battalions of troops. Mauritius, if to be defended, must be defended by sea, and to spend so much money upon works there was to throw a great burden upon the taxpayers of this country. The whole of the columns of the Estimate book contained similar extravagant charges ; and he could wish that some gentleman of military position, like his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Lichfield (Major Anson), would take the sense of the Committee upon it. That would be the only way to prevent such an outlay in future. He had no hesitation in saying that a great portion of the expenditure upon barracks and works was caused by the erroneous system that was pursued. There was no man in the House that had a greater respect for the Engineers than he (Mr. Otway) had ; he looked upon them as an unsurpassed corps, but they were the most expensive and extravagant set of men in dealing with public works that could possibly be found. They were greedy, not of money, but of work ; they tried to monopolize everything, and the consequence was that the country was put to vast expense for repairs which it would be spared under a different system. Let the Committee conceive the idea of an officer in a barrack who had the lock of his door out of repair. Before he got it repaired he had to apply to an Engineer officer, who had to speak to the contractor ; and it could not be put to rights without the contractor's permission, or by any man not employed under the Engineer. The colonel of a regiment was intrusted with the happiness not alone of the 600 or 800 men whom he commanded, but of their wives and children, and yet he could not be intrusted with the ordering of a lock out of repair to be set right. They had all heard of the story about the bellows ; but there was a similar story about a pump, concerning which a correspondence had been going on for years, and was, he believed, still going on. He had asked the commander of a foreign regiment if a pump was out of order what he would do, and he said he would of course direct that it should be mended. When asked by whom ? he answered, " By my soldiers." And when the case was put—" Suppose there were no soldiers that could do it," he seemed to think that an absurd supposition, because a regiment contained artificers of every class ; but he replied he would order a proper workman to go and do it. Now what he wanted to impress upon the right hon. Gentleman was the necessity for a greater employment of military labour. If the right hon. Gentleman would consult the most distinguished Engineer officer this country had possessed for many years, Field-Marshal Sir John Burgoyne, he would find that a great economy might be effected by the employment of military labour. He was told that the experiment was now being tried in the Isle of Wight. All that was wanted was to develop the system, and he ventured to say that a very large reduction would soon be made under the head of barrack repairs.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, that soldiers really required something to do. The other day a deserter was brought before him when sitting as a magistrate, and he said to the prisoner, " You are an intelligent young man—why did you leave the army ?" The answer was, that he hated the army—that there was nothing but drill, drill, everlasting drill, day after day, and that it was perfectly intolerable.

SIR HARRY VERNEY was of opinion that nothing tended so much to make the army unpopular as Aldershot. It would be very well to send men to encamp there occasionally ; but to condemn them to winter quarters in those vile huts had a very mischievous effect.

COLONEL NORTH concurred with the hon. Baronet as to the effect of Aldershot as winter quarters. He could not expect men returning from twelve or fifteen years of foreign service to like being sent to Aldershot or the Curragh. It was a mistake, however, to suppose that soldiers had nothing to do in connection with their military drill, and that they had much time at their disposal for the work which had been alluded to.

MAJOR ANSON asked for some explanation of the item of £10,000 for old forges and shops.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK inquired how much it was proposed to spend on military billiard-rooms this year? [An hon. MEMBER: £3,000.] If that is so, I shall move an Amendment to it.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, there had been a great many inquiries and criticisms on this Vote; but he could not help expressing his sense of the courtesy with which they had been made. As to the remarks of his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Lichfield (Major Anson) and the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Aberdeen (Colonel Sykes) on the establishment charges, he had to say that the increase to which they referred was to be attributed to the transfer to that Vote of charges previously made in other Votes. With respect to what his hon. and gallant Friend had said on the great expense for barracks as compared with the accommodation afforded, this was the result of the anxiety manifested by the House for the health and comfort of the soldiers. Under existing regulations one-third more cubic space was provided for the soldier than had been hitherto afforded to him. He believed that this was a very great improvement; but the House would at once see that one of its consequences must be that the expense, as compared with the actual accommodation of a given number of troops, must be greater than it had formerly been. His hon. and gallant Friend had complained that the War Department was not proceeding as rapidly as it ought to do with the married soldiers' quarters. This showed how careful they had to be in preparing these Estimates. On the one hand, they were liable to be accused of extravagance; and on the other, they were open to attacks for not doing this and not doing that. He was as conscious as his hon. and gallant Friend of the importance, for the propriety and respectability of the Army, of providing a sufficiency of married soldiers' quarters as soon as possible. But this was attended with very considerable expense, and therefore it had been thought advisable to proceed gradually. The sum voted this year was £30,000 for this purpose, and he believed that that sum would be asked in succeeding years, although, as far as he was concerned, he was sorry that he could not ask double that sum. He was afraid that they must look forward to even a larger expenditure than that which now existed. With regard to the comments of his hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) on the exceptional form of the Estimates, it would be very presumptuous in him to criticize the decisions of high authorities at the Treasury, of whom, but a short time ago, his hon. Friend was not the least distinguished; and he (Mr. Childers) knew that in these matters the other Departments had to pay some deference to the opinion of the Treasury.

Colonel North

MR. CHILDERS said, he had not objected to the form of the Estimates; but had said that so great a change as had been introduced that year ought to have been noticed.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he was not the champion of the form in which these Estimates appeared, and admitted that his difficulty in explaining the Estimates was much increased by not bringing the charge of the current year in close juxtaposition with the charge of last year. With regard to the estimated expenses in the last column, he did not at all intend thereby to involve the House in any pledge. He very much doubted whether it did pledge the House; it was intended only as a frank statement of the final cost of the works commenced. As to the charges for Malta and Gibraltar, they were only to defray a particular outlay; and he would not disguise from the Committee that, in all probability, if these two fortresses were to be placed in a proper state of defence, they must look forward to a much larger expenditure than anything entered either in the present Estimates or in those of last year. Another item alluded to by his hon. Friend was the expenditure proposed on account of Chelsea Barracks, and here his hon. Friend was under some misapprehension. It was thought desirable to extend the barrack accommodation at Chelsea, with a view to set free the St. George's Barracks, behind the National Gallery, for a recruiting dépôt. In carrying out the new regulations with regard to recruiting, and those improvements in the system which were mentioned in the Commissioners' Report, a good recruiting dépôt in London was found indispensable, and the most convenient place was the St. George's Barracks, which would accordingly be appropriated for that purpose, while the Chelsea Barracks would accommodate the Guards heretofore quartered there. Then there was the proposed new store accommodation, and he doubted whether any one charge in all these Estimates was of more pressing necessity than this. Ever since the Crimean War our stores had been huddled together in a ditch at the Tower in the most unseemly, inconvenient, and extravagant way. Hon. Members would recollect the painful alarm that arose some months ago as to the possibility of acts of outrage in London. He did not feel at liberty to disregard the remonstrance, pressed upon him from the highest quarters, lest damage should be done to these stores. They were close to the east angle of the Tower, exposed to injury by fire thrown over the wall; and upon representations made by competent officers whom he had appointed to inspect the Store Department, he ordered the stores to be at once removed. They were very large in quantity and very valuable; and, having no place to put them, he was obliged to distribute them all over the country—a measure not only inconvenient, but costly. Under those circumstances, he arranged for the purchase of a large building on the banks of the Thames, opposite Woolwich, but legal difficulties unfortunately occurred, and he was unable to proceed with the purchase. His hon. Friend said, “Why did you not put them at Deptford?” He was desirous to put them there, and sent to inspect the site. But it was absolutely necessary to have a water access, and the Admiralty would not part with any portion of the yard which had a water access. The only remaining point he had to notice was the reference that had been made to Aldershot. On this point, he (Sir John Pakington) thought there was some misapprehension. He was asked to relieve the soldiers from the inconvenience and annoyance of being quartered there in the winter. Now, the reports which reached him were that regiments returning to this country were far from objecting to Aldershot. For the sake of the soldier and of the country, however, he thought it was desirable that considerable portions of the troops should be sent into barracks in country quarters; and had it not been for the unfortunate outrages which occurred in connection with Fenians, arrangements would have been made with this view. But great expense arose in moving soldiers about the country, and he wished to check the expense of unnecessary marches. He would not therefore venture upon pledges which he might not find convenient, or, perhaps, even agreeable to the soldier, to carry out; and he could only assure the hon. Baronet that he thought the recommendations of the Committee worthy of careful consideration.

MR. CHILDERS concurred in the wish that the Estimates had been more clearly prepared. He trusted that the Civil Estimates when produced would be found to be arranged, not after the fashion of the Army, but of the Navy Estimates. He wished to say a word about the storehouses at Woolwich. He was far from saying that more store accommodation was not needed at the Tower. But the Admiralty had valuable property at Woolwich and at Deptford suitable for storing purposes; and he did not see why the Admiralty and the War Office might not have referred the matter to the Treasury for settlement. The First Lord of the Admiralty had stated that he would abandon Deptford, and, after a time, Woolwich, as far as shipbuilding was concerned; but Deptford was the best store receiving place in the Kingdom; and it would therefore be a great waste of money to spend £70,000 for new storehouses at Woolwich. He trusted that the Admiralty and the War Office would come to some arrangement in regard to this matter.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON reminded the hon. Gentleman that he could not prepare these Estimates in reference to an opinion uttered by his right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty only a few days ago. He should be glad, however, to come if possible to an arrangement with the Admiralty, in which event the proposed expenditure would of course be unnecessary.

SIR HARRY VERNEY remarked that the right hon. Gentleman had adverted to the possibility of sending a portion of the Guards away from the middle of London to a most inconvenient barrack at Chelsea. Two years ago, indeed, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Hertford (Mr. Cowper) suggested that the barracks behind the National Gallery might, perhaps, be done away with at some future time. On the very night that suggestion was made he chanced to walk from the House to Hyde Park, and there found a mob busily engaged in knocking down the railings. That circumstance plainly showed the impolicy of carrying out the suggestion, as these barracks were of great importance for securing the tranquillity of the metropolis in the event of disturbances breaking out.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, the whole matter had been duly weighed and considered before it was determined to remove the barracks to Chelsea.

MR. CHILDERS said, he hoped that the sum of £3,000 proposed for the new storehouses would be omitted.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON assured his hon. Friend that no premature step should be taken; and that he would make inquiries to see whether there could be any arrangement which would render the proposed expenditure unnecessary.

MR. CHILDERS said, he had intended to move the omission of the item of £3,000; but would not do so if he received an assurance that the matter should be decided by the Treasury.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he intended that the matter should be referred to the Treasury.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK moved to omit from the Vote £3,000 for billiard tables. He did not see that we were bound to provide the officers of the army with billiard tables, any more than we were bound to provide them with card tables, fowling pieces, or horses for fox-hunting. It was also desirable for the sake of the young men themselves that they should not be encouraged to frequent billiard rooms, which were often so full of tobacco smoke that one could hardly see from one side to the other. This created lassitude, and the frequenters of the rooms could not always very well tell what they were about. It was too much to ask the public to find amusement for young men who entered the army. If their wages were too small, let them ask for more.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Item of £3,000, for Billiard Rooms in Barracks, be omitted from the proposed Vote."
(Mr. Lusk.)

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON remarked that the worthy Alderman had fought this battle of the billiard board last year with great gallantry, and had been defeated. The item for billiard tables was inserted last year for the first time by the right hon. and gallant Member for Huntingdon (General Peel) and the worthy Alderman could hardly have forgotten the grounds on which the Committee allowed it.

Sir Harry Verney

The Committee was influenced by these two considerations—first, that the officers' pay was very small, compared with the position they occupied, and secondly, that it was of great importance that officers in the various stations should have every inducement held out to them to engage in innocent recreation and amusement. Upon these considerations the Committee determined, by a considerable majority, to promote their amusement by providing billiard tables. He trusted the Committee would see the force of the arguments adduced last year, and not refuse to grant this Vote.

MR. CANDLISH said, he should vote with his hon. Friend (Mr. Alderman Lusk) if the Motion were pressed to a division.

Question put,

The Committee divided:—Ayes 24; Noes 72: Majority 48.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

House resumed.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow.

Committee to sit again To-morrow.

ELECTION PETITIONS AND CORRUPT PRACTICES AT ELECTIONS (re-committed) BILL—[BILL 63.]

(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Secretary Gathorne Hardy, Sir Stafford Northcote.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. A. MITCHELL said, he rose to move the Resolution of which he had given Notice. He was sorry that the task of bringing forward this Motion had not been undertaken by some Member of more experience; but, no one else having taken it up, he felt it his absolute duty to do so. He thought local investigations into corrupt practices at elections would be more satisfactory than as they were now conducted. Investigations should be more rapid, and should be made by one who was intimately acquainted with the law—a man of honour, capable of sifting evidence; but, at the same time, he was convinced that the retention by the House of its own jurisdiction and the right of determining who were its Members was essential to its dignity and independence. There was to be no appeal from the Judge who tried the petition. The proceeding of the Judge was to be final, and his order was to be carried into execution. The present Bill proposed to introduce a power between the House and the electors, which had never before been heard of in the history of this country. Before 1770, election petitions were decided by the whole House; but between that date and the year 1828 these petitions were referred to a Committee of fifteen Members. In the beginning of the reign of Her Majesty Queen Victoria great alterations were made, and Bills upon the subject were also passed in 1854 and 1860, the last Act which regulated elections being passed in 1863. In the Bill of last year, which bore the same names upon its back as the present, the most careful provision was made for the protection of the rights and privileges of the House of Commons. The present Bill completely destroyed the privilege of the House of Commons to determine who its own Members were. This was a most miserable and vicious attempt to deal with this question. If he might without presumption suggest a plan by which the object of the Bill could be obtained, he should propose that a Committee of the most important Members of that House — men of the highest position and highest honour — should be appointed to draw up a list of barristers of seven years' standing, one of whom should be sent down to the spot with full powers to conduct the investigation, accompanied by two Members of that House, one from each side, who were to represent that House, and who, on their return, would be able to state whether, in their opinion, the investigation had been full and fair. That Commission should make a Report to the House; and the recommendations in that Report should be carried into effect within a week, if the Report were not objected to by a Member of that House. His plan, if adopted, would preserve the right and privilege of that House to say who were its Members, and would settle controverted elections in the best possible manner. In conclusion, he implored hon. Members to recollect that the privileges of the House had been of old, highly valued by its most important Members; and that, if they assented to the Bill, they would be placing the power of the Crown between the electors and that House.

MR. KINGLAKE seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House, while earnestly desiring to provide the best tribunal for the trial of Controverted Elections, to reduce the cost of such trials, and to ensure the detection and punishment of bribery and corruption, is not prepared to assent to any measure which aims at the destruction of its ancient right and privilege to hold in its own hands the power of determining who are its Members, a right which the House has asserted and exercised, to its great advantage, for several hundred years, and upon the possession of which the dignity and independence of this House and the constitutional freedom of the electors greatly depend,"—(Mr. Alexander Mitchell,)

—instead thereof.

MR. WHITBREAD said, that having been a Member of the Committee, which last year recommended a Bill something in the nature of that now under the consideration of the House, he wished to be allowed to state some of the reasons which had induced them to come to the conclusions at which they ultimately arrived. Before doing so, however, he must remark that the hon. Member who had just sat down (Mr. A. Mitchell) had, by the terms of his Notice, led the House to believe that he desired that the trial of election petitions should remain as at present; but, on the contrary, when he came to make his speech, he had proposed, as an alternative to the scheme of the Bill, a plan which was open to two or three grave and fatal objections. In the first place, the hon. Gentleman proposed that two Members of that House should accompany a certain set of lawyers, who were to be barristers of seven years' standing, down to the spot from whence the petition emanated to try the election petition. If that proposition were adopted it would often be impossible that the trial of election petitions could be entered upon immediately; because, if the House were not assembled, whence would they get the two Members who were to form a portion of the Commission? In the next place, if the House were sitting, it might place the Members selected to go down to the country in a most inconvenient position as regarded their respective constituents, who would naturally find fault with them if they were absent when grave and important questions were under the consideration of the House. The third objection to the hon. Member's plan was the most fatal of them all. The Grenville Act had been passed for the purpose of getting rid of the horrible system of bringing discussions on election petitions upon the floor of that House; but the hon. Member proposed, in contravention of the spirit of that Act, to bring the Reports of the Commissioners under the cognizance of the House on the Motion of any hon.

Member who might object to decisions at which they had arrived. It would almost appear, from the manner in which this question had been argued both in that House and in the Press, as though their only object was to substitute for the Election Committee another tribunal; but, for his own part, he would not have consented to part, with the power of that House with respect to elections petitions upon that ground alone. The two great objects to be kept in view were to secure an immediate trial; and to secure that the trial should take place on the spot. By trying the case immediately they would get rid of the disgraceful system, which he was given to understand prevailed to a large extent, of pairing off one petition against another, by which the worst cases of corruption were prevented from coming before the public. It was, of course, difficult to procure evidence upon this point; but he was afraid there was but too much truth in the charge. Then, as to the advantages to be derived from a trial upon the spot, most hon. Members had been present during the time that one of those disgraceful scandals—the trial of an election petition—was going on, and one of the worst features of those trials was that frequently answer after answer was given which everyone present knew was untrue. This would not be the case if the evidence were given in the face of those who were fully acquainted with the facts, and at the place where the witness lived. The trial of elections as proposed by the Bill would be surrounded by circumstances similar to those attending ordinary trials by a Judge in an open court. The trial of a charge of bribery could not, therefore, fail to be associated in the minds of the people with the trial of other criminal offences; and would, in time, induce the belief that, after all, bribery was a serious offence of which an honest man should be ashamed. It was said, however, that the House was unwilling to part with its jurisdiction. But what was the jurisdiction of the House in that matter at present? He said that the House as a House had no more jurisdiction in the case at present than it would have under the Bill. The House had no voice in the constitution of the Election Committees, and it had not reserved to itself the right of questioning the decisions of those Committees. As Sir Erskine May had accurately said, it was impossible to conceive a Legislative Assembly more strictly bound by a public law over which it had no control, and in carrying out which it had little or no discretion. The moment the House had allowed the General Committee of Elections to be appointed unchallenged it had no more voice in the matter. Another illustration of the erroneous impression existing with regard to the jurisdiction of the House was to be found in the case of a bankrupt Member. If after a year that Member's bankruptcy was not reversed, the House did not think its jurisdiction encroached on because the seat was vacated without a Parliamentary inquiry into the solvency of its Member. All that was wanted in the trial of an election petition was to ascertain a matter of fact—whether A. B. was guilty of tendering a bribe or not. That was not the province of a Legislature, but eminently within the province of a Judge. Some hoped to see bribery die out as constituencies were enlarged; but he had little faith in that prophecy. It was true the smaller constituencies had furnished cases of most flagrant corruption; the obvious reason being that it was easier and cheaper to buy a small constituency than a large one. Others had directed attention to the West, and perhaps an hon. Member experienced in United States elections would furnish the House with trustworthy information on the subject. His belief, however, was that any person in the streets of a United States' city during a closely contested election would soon be asked whether he had voted, and, if not, would be informed that a sumptuous breakfast and a ten dollar bill were at his disposal in a neighbouring house. Still, it could not be denied the changes proposed by the Bill were very great, and it too often happened that it was only when a change had been made that the wisdom of the original practice was discovered. But, notwithstanding this, the House should inquire under what circumstances the Bill had come before it. Two years ago the table of the House was laden with petitions, and, from time to time, hon. Members had received the records of the disclosures to which those petitions led. Another General Election was impending, and if some such Bill as the present were not passed a repetition of these unwelcome proceedings must necessarily follow. He therefore contended that some change was demanded by the necessities of the times; and, in his opinion, the changes proposed by the Bill were one and all sound in principle. He would have been unwilling to refer the trial of election petitions to any tribunal which had not the full confidence of the country; but the scheme of the Bill left no room for criticism on this head. The new franchises conferred by the Act of last year, if used honestly, would be a source of strength to the House; but, if they became wares to be bought and sold, they would undoubtedly be a source of great weakness. If corruption entered largely into the composition of the next Parliament the money-elected would find that it was one thing to buy the suffrages of the people, but quite another to secure their confidence. Such a Parliament might well and fairly represent the heaped-up wealth of the country; but it would fail to feel the pulse which stir those working millions who go to make the real life-blood of the nation.

Mr. Whitbread

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, he feared some misapprehension existed regarding the constitutional question involved in the Bill. It seemed to be assumed that the jurisdiction of the House of Commons over its election petitions was a part of the ancient Constitution, and of the liberties of Parliament; but it could be traced back no earlier than Elizabeth's time, and originated in an anomalous usurpation by the House of Commons contrary to the common law of the country; though probably it was necessary, considering the influence of the Crown at that time, that Parliament should vindicate its right to say who should and who should not sit in the House. No such vindication, however, was necessary in these days. What, then, was the common law on the subject? Before that usurpation to which he referred, the common law was that a return to a writ, if triable, had to be invariably contested in the Court from which it had issued, and to which it returned. The writ for the election of Members of Parliament issued from the Court of Chancery; and the return was still made to that Court, and no Member could take his seat until the return had been so made. If questioned, the validity of the return was tried in the Courts of Law; if impeached by a demurrer, it was tried in the Court of Chancery, sitting as a Court of Common Law; if impeached by a traverse, the Lord Chancellor delivered the record into the hands of the officers of the Court of Queen's Bench, and the trial was made by that Court and a jury. This was the more worthy of remark because the Judges had lately declared themselves incompetent to decide any election questions; whereas, by the common law of the country, the Judges were bound to decide such matters when they rested upon questions of fact. In cases of bribery, the Lord Chancellor, not being able to decide questions of fact, would in former times send the traverse to the Queen's Bench as a matter of course, and then it would be tried. So that it would appear that by the ancient common law every question of fact with regard to the validity of the return to the writ for the election of Members of Parliament was triable by the Judges with a jury, and not by the House of Commons, and that, when the validity of the election depended upon a question of law, it was decided by the Chancellor without a jury, sitting as a Judge at common law on the Common Law side of the Court of Chancery. So if the election of a Coroner, under the writ De Coronatore eligendo, or a Verderer, were impeached questions of law were decided by the Chancellor sitting on the Common Law side in Chancery, while questions of fact were triable by the Judges with a jury in the Court of Queen's Bench. The present anomalous power of the House of Commons had been assumed for political reasons; and he did not think that the House of Commons, in abandoning this jurisdiction, could fairly be charged with sacrificing any portion of its independence, especially when they remembered the great power which the House of Commons possessed and the diminished importance of the Royal Prerogative. Though he approved, however, the principles on which this Bill was founded, he doubted whether the mode selected was the one best calculated to carry out the objects which they had in view. He understood the Bill to provide that two Judges should be drafted from the Superior Courts, to decide upon this question of contested elections; but he much doubted whether they would be able to determine all the questions that would be raised after a General Election, while, at other times, they would have little more than sinecure appointments. He would recommend, instead of this proposal, that power be given to the Crown to issue a Special Commission whenever elections were to be decided upon—a plan by which the services of the most competent persons could be secured; while, when no election inquiries were pending, they would not have officials receiving salaries without rendering any services in return.

MR. BERKELEY said, this was a Bill which had come down to the House by lineal descent. A measure of this kind was first introduced during Lord Aberdeen's tenure of office after an election of more than usual vicious character, from a conviction that the electoral system might very well be altered for the better. The Earl of Aberdeen, however, shrunk from adopting the only remedy—the ballot—and the Bill was referred to a Committee composed principally of lawyers, and they as usual made a mess of it. The measure which that Committee brought forward was analysed by the late Mr. Coppock, in The Times, who concluded by saying, "When the House of Commons passes such a Bill as this, we all know what it means," and the Editor endorsed Mr. Coppock's opinion by this just remark: "This Bill is a pompous profession meant to be inoperative." The Bill found favour with the House because it contained one or two good clauses—such as doing away with bands and colours at elections. Every Member had felt the inconvenience and expense of such things, and so they passed the Bill. The result, however, was, that the measure was found to be inoperative—nay, positively mischievous. It was, in fact, an Act passed to protect the candidates, and to punish the least guilty parties. The clauses against intimidation were a perfect farce; and those against bribery laid hold of the poor man, whilst the candidate passed by unscathed. The measure, however, died a natural death, and they then came before Parliament again for its renewal, but without the true remedy—the ballot. When the Bill went to the other House, Lord Derby gave it his parting blessing, and said that it was not worth more than so much waste paper. With that recommendation, however, it went to the country, when again, it was found inoperative, and to be, in fact, no more than so much waste paper. The First Lord of the Treasury had reproduced that Bill with a still more objectionable clause, and which proposed to give them a complete leap in the dark at the cost of £10,000 per year. The Committees of that House had not failed in their duty; the failure is in the law they are armed with. They might have passed candidate after candidate who had been guilty of bribery; but, with such a law for their guide, they could not find them guilty. The Government did not attempt to deal with corruption or intimidation; but they passed a law to punish some wretched tailor or shoemaker who accepted £10, whilst they turned their back upon the candidate from whom the £10 came. It had been throughout a mere tub for the whale, and they evaded the great and broad question of giving protection to the voter by the means of the ballot. Nothing but that would protect the voter, and cause purity of election. It was coming to that; but, according to the trick of the times and the fashion of the day, it would appear in that House as a Conservative measure.

Mr. Berkeley

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he thought that what the hon. Gentleman who spoke last had said made, to a considerable extent, a case for the introduction of that Bill. He perfectly agreed with the hon. Gentleman that since the recent changes in the constitution of the Election Committees of that House it would be difficult, perhaps impossible, to point to any case in which those Committees had failed to do their duty; and that, nevertheless, in spite of the purity and efficiency of the Committees of that House, the system of bribery, as they very well knew, prevailed to a scandalous degree. Well, the hon. Member had a nostrum of his own, and said, "Don't introduce anything to improve the present state of things till you give us the ballot." That, of course, was a fair line for the hon. Gentleman to take if he was anxious to recommend his own peculiar remedy to the exclusion of all others. [Mr. BERKELEY: I never said that.] That, however, was what the hon. Member's argument pointed to, because he contended that unless they gave the ballot it was of no use trying anything else. It was all very well for Gentlemen who believed the ballot was an invaluable, if not the only effectual, preservative against electoral corruption to argue in that manner. But those who were of a different opinion on that point, and who wished to consider whether there was any other way of grappling with that evil, were naturally led by their conviction that the Election Committees had done all that could fairly have been required of them, but without effect, to inquire whether it was not necessary to take a step further, and go beyond the precincts of the House itself in order to accomplish that at which they all professed to aim. He had listened to the speech of the hon. Member for Berwick-on-Tweed (Mr. A. Mitchell) expecting to hear from him a stronger case than he had presented. Of course, it was easy to say they all had the same great object in view, that they all desired to promote an efficient inquiry, and so forth;

but when the question came how that was to be done, the hon. Gentleman gave them a most vague and shadowy plan. And as to the hon. Gentleman's objection to the plan of the Government, he must say he never heard a more miserable objection; because, when reduced to its elements, it amounted to this, that, in his opinion, apparently, it was the House of Commons only that was interested in the character of the elections to that House, and that it would be a crying sin and shame if the House of Commons were to surrender its right to control and regulate the elections of its own Members. Now, he entirely disagreed with the hon. Gentleman at the very foundation of his argument; because he said it was not the House of Commons only that was interested in the purity of the elections to that House, but the whole country was interested in it. [Mr. MITCHELL here made a remark which did not reach the Gallery.] The hon. Gentleman might say it was an affair that rested with the constituencies and the House; but he held that the whole country was interested in the matter; and if by any particular system they could secure greater electoral purity, and could provide a better remedy against the evils which unfortunately crept into the election of Members of Parliament, he maintained that any attempt to resist that upon the ground that it involved an interference with certain imaginary privileges of the House of Commons was an objection to which the country would never listen, and ought not to listen. Of course, if he could show that the particular proposal contained in the Bill would be inefficient for its purpose, that was a valid objection; but the main ground on which the hon. Gentleman put his argument was that they would have another power in the State interfering between the electors and the elected. The hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread) had answered the hon. Member for Berwick-on-Tweed extremely well, and had shown that there were now various instances in which another power interfered between the electors and the elected. The hon. Member for Bedford noticed the case of a Member of that House who might be adjudged a bankrupt; but he mentioned another and more frequent occurrence of the interposition of another power—namely, in the very settlement of the list of electors themselves. Who was it that adjudged whether an elector had or had not a right to his vote? Why, the Revising Barrister, a power not appointed by that House at all—but as the hon. Member for Berwick-on-Tweed would say—by another branch of the Legislature; and they might as well say it was an infringement of the privileges of that House that Revising Barristers should go round the country to decide whether a man had a right to his vote as that a Judge or any other tribunal should go to decide whether he had rightly exercised his franchise. He did not wish to occupy the time of the House by discussing that matter. It seemed to him that, if they were really in earnest about it, they do much better by proceeding to consider the Bill submitted to them by the Government, and not only by the Government, but by the careful Report of a very well-selected Committee of that House, comprising the most important Members chosen from all parts of the House, who gave great attention to that subject last Session. The Government when they brought in their measure last Session, did, indeed, proceed tentatively and cautiously, and it was true, as the hon. Member for Berwick-on-Tweed said, that that Bill, as originally introduced, preserved the right of the House of Commons to review the decisions which another tribunal might come to on these matters. What the Government had felt was, that it was important they should introduce a measure which would be efficacious, and which would also be accepted, and that it was of no use bringing in one that might look well, but that would be exploded. Therefore, they proposed a measure which, in the first instance, was very carefully prepared, to preserve the ultimate control of that House over these cases. But the moment that Bill was introduced, Member after Member rose and said, if they were to make the attempt they should do it on sound principles, and not seek to bring the decisions of the external tribunal under the review of that House; and when the Bill came before the Committee, there was found to be almost an unanimous opinion there that it would be better to intrust that jurisdiction to a tribunal which would command confidence, and with which they could leave the final decision. The Government accepted the decision of the Committee, and the Bill had been brought in in accordance with that decision. If they went into Committee he should be prepared to discuss the particular framework of the tribunal; but he thought, if the House was really in earnest in its desire to check bribery at elections, that it would fairly grapple with the question, and that it was, he might almost say childish, and certainly futile, to be raising these objections as to an unwillingness to part with an imaginary privilege of that House which stood in the way of serious improvement.

MR. P. WYKEHAM-MARTIN said, he approved of the suggestion of the hon. Member for Dundalk (Sir George Bowyer) that the old common law practice should be reverted to, and the evidence on election petitions be heard before a Judge and jury. It was proposed to inflict a very heavy penalty on a man for bribery—no less than making him an outlaw for seven years, which was a great deal worse than the punishment which would be inflicted on him if he had robbed a hen-roost. And yet the man might have been guilty of no crime at all. They proposed not to subject him to the opinion of the country—to which there was no objection—but to the caprice of a single individual. He did not, in the least degree, impute any impropriety to the Judge, who would, no doubt, try the case conscientiously; but the opinion of Judges on the moral guilt of bribery varied, for he had himself heard one Judge assert that, in his opinion, there was no moral guilt to be imputed to a candidate for the former borough of St. Albans, because it was the custom to give the voters £10 a head all round, therefore, a man gained the same whichever way he voted; and another assert that, in his view, it was bribery on the part of a candidate to subscribe to the local charities, and even to the local rifle corps. If, as was said by the right hon. Baronet, bribery was an evil which it was to the interest of the whole country that anyone practising it should be subjected to the penalty, then the accused person ought to be tried by a jury of his countrymen. So strong were the opinions of some men as to what was bribery, that he remembered on the occasion of one of his elections giving a dinner to his own father, and the solicitor who was the agent came in, and insisted, under the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, that his father should pay for his share of the dinner. His father had to pay, and the solicitor saw a regular receipt given for it before he went away. Now, was that an act of bribery or not? This Bill ought not to be made a trap involving the most fearful penalties for what might be a perfectly innocent act. He was told a few days ago by a most eminent counsel and solicitor, both of them opposed to him in politics, that frightful extortion might be committed under this Bill. The hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread) said that time was a great element in the matter; but in twenty days a man might be able to make up something that would extort a very considerable sum from an unfortunate Member. There was his hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, who would not give sixpence away improperly, and who would yet go the length of subscribing to the Nottingham Rifle Corps. [Mr. OSBORNE: Yes; or a dinner to my father.] Suppose a man went in twenty days after an election to his hon. Friend, and said, "Your Friend, Mr. Wykeham-Martin, has been down to Nottingham, through his great zeal for you, and he, having come down on your account, having walked out with you frequently, and being, in fact, your agent, has given a quart of beer to one of the electors." [Mr. OSBORNE: He would not care much for a quart.] In that case there would be no suspicion of bribing; but there would be the offence much more difficult to avoid, of treating. If the man in that case did not have matters squared with him, the Member's career might be cut very short, and he would be made an outlaw for seven years. His hon. Friend might not, under such circumstances, submit to extortion; but many timid Members might. If this Bill only had those offences which constituted bribery properly defined, it might be made a very valuable measure; but if not it might become a most iniquitous one. If Her Majesty's Government would satisfy him that the Bill was bona fide, and not to be made into an engine of tyranny and oppression, he would cordially support it; but if not, he should be inclined to vote not with the hon. Member for Berwick-on-Tweed but against the Speaker leaving the Chair.

MR. J. STUART MILL: Sir, if the question were solely between the Bill of Her Majesty's Government and the Amendment, I should have no hesitation in at once deciding for the Bill. Not that it corresponds or comes up in all respects to my notion of what such a Bill should be. Nor do I believe that by any one expedient—and there is only one expedient in this Bill—we can hope to put down corrupt practices. If the House are in earnest in their desire to put down corrupt practices at elections—and I am bound to believe that they are, however little credit they receive for such earnestness out of doors—I apprehend they will be obliged to have recourse, not to one, but to several expedients. Nevertheless, I think favourably of the Bill, because though it does in reality only one thing, that thing is a vigorous one, and shows an adequate sense of the emergency. It shows a sense that, in order to put down this great evil, it is necessary to go out of the common path. The truth is that, however possible it may be for Committees of this House to be impartial on the question to whom the seat shall be given—and I do not deny that they are often impartial in that respect, nor is it hopeless that they might be always so—nobody out of this House, and I think I may almost add in it, believes that so long as the jurisdiction remains in this House the penalties against the giver of the bribe will ever be seriously enforced. There are several reasons for this, some of which, perhaps, had better be understood than expressed. To confine myself to what may be said with safety; any tribunal that acts only occasionally as a tribunal, still more any person called for the first time so to act, as is often the case with Members of Parliament, has naturally a very strong indisposition to convict: and still more is this the case when those who have to decide are men of the same class, and the same general cast of feelings, and subject to the same temptations as the accused, and men of whom it must be said that hitherto they have been disposed to consider a scrape of this sort as much more a misfortune than a crime. I think that there is, after all, something in the objection to the proposal for giving the ultimate decision to a Judge not appointed by the House. There is some reason against their handing over their jurisdiction at once and for ever to a functionary appointed solely by the Crown; but there is an easy mode of getting rid of that objection—namely, by making the Act temporary. I am not sure that it should not be annual—that it ought not, like the Mutiny Act, to be renewed every year, so that there should never be any long time during which evil consequences need be suffered. And although I do not myself think that any evil consequences are likely to follow, still, as where there is a bare possibility there is always apprehension, I hope that, if the House adopts the Bill, the Government will see the propriety of introducing some limitation such as I have suggested. There is another point on which I wish to say something. Great objections appear to be felt to turning over these inquiries to the Judges of the land. Would it not be a suitable way of meeting these objections if this tribunal were to be only a tribunal of appeal? Indeed, even if the House should not choose to adopt this tribunal—if they should keep these matters in the hands of a Committee of their own Members presided over by a legal assessor—and few, I think, will now deny that there must at least be a legal assessor—whether the House adopt this way, or whether they adopt the proposal of the Government—there are very strong reasons for making the tribunal only a tribunal of appeal. It is only by enquiry diligently made on the spot, that the truth in such matters can be discovered. I will make one suggestion, which will be found in a pamphlet which has attracted a good deal of attention, and has been read, I know, by Members of the Government. It is written by Mr. W. D. Christie, formerly a Member of this House, and who I hope may be so again. It is that there should be a local inquiry by a person of competent legal qualifications after every Parliamentary election, whether there is a petition or not. ["Oh, oh!"] Notwithstanding the dissent with which this proposition seems to be met, much may be said in its favour; for the very worst cases are invariably those in which petitions are either not presented, or, having been presented, are afterwards withdrawn, because it is found that an inquiry would be equally damaging to the case of the petitioner, both parties being tarred with the same brush. These are such flagrant cases that I am sure it must be admitted that, unless they are in some manner provided for, it will be impossible effectually to put down bribery. The officer whom I suppose to be appointed would proceed after every election to the spot, and there sit in public to receive any complaints that may be made. Of course it is a necessary consequence that this officer should have the power, where the complaints are frivolous, of throwing the expense on the complainant. And whatever expenses would not thus be met, should be defrayed by the locality—should be, in fact, a public charge. There is the more reason for appointing such an officer, as it is indispensably necessary that there should be an inquiry, not only into Parliamentary, but into municipal elections, which are the nurseries of Parliamentary bribery. Mr. Philip Rose, a Conservative solicitor, well known to many hon. Members opposite, has expressed an opinion on this subject which is well entitled to attention. Mr. Rose says, in his evidence before a Committee of the House of Lords, that in a vast number of places, illegal practices are carried on at municipal elections by a regular machinery, which is also made use of at Parliamentary elections. He adds that great pressure is brought to bear upon Members of Parliament to contribute towards the expenses of municipal contests, because it is held out to them that £10 spent upon one of these is better than £100 spent in a Parliamentary contest; and that it is an axiom among agents—"We were able to return our municipal candidate, and we shall therefore be able to return our Parliamentary candidate." After such testimony, coming from such a quarter, it is plain that, if you really wish to put down bribery and corruption at Parliamentary elections, you must extend your interference to municipal elections also. In addition to the duties which I have suggested that the Commissioners of Inquiry should perform after each election, there are a number of other duties which might well be performed by those functionaries. They would naturally act as election auditors; and, in places from which no petition proceeds, their principal business will probably consist in scrutinizing the accounts which Members are already obliged to render, and which ought to be required from them with greater accuracy and completeness. Belonging to the same class from which revising barristers are taken, there will be an obvious propriety in their acting also in that capacity; and they might even fulfil the duties of returning officers. ["Oh, oh!"] Whatever functionaries of this description may be appointed, no fear need be entertained that there will be any want of work for them. If you feel that the control of all these matters ought not to pass out of your own hands, you might leave the nomination of these functionaries in the hands of the Speaker; but any difficulty on that score will best be got rid of by making the legal authority proposed by the Bill of Her Majesty's Government the tribunal of appeal. These are the suggestions which I have felt it my duty to offer in reference to the measure brought forward by the right hon. Gentleman the Head of the Administration. The reasons in support of them will be found at length in the very able pamphlet to which I have referred.

Sir Stafford Northcote

MR. SERJEANT GASELEE said, however unpleasant the proposal of the hon. Member for Westminster (Mr. Stuart Mill)

Mr. J. Stuart Mill

might be to the House and to the country, which would have to pay for it, he thought one set of gentlemen, at all events, would owe him a debt of gratitude—he meant the revising barristers and barristers of seven years' standing. The scheme was so chimerical that he should not, at that time of night, waste the time of the House by answering it. There was to be, it seemed, a Court of Appeal, so that there would be two trials instead of one, which would perpetuate and increase the very objection now made to our present election tribunals, that they were so expensive. He quite agreed with the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread), who had given reasons which it was impossible for any man to answer, that so far from the dignity of the House being concerned in retaining its jurisdiction, it was rather a point of weakness and dissatisfaction throughout the country to see the present unsatisfactory way in which Committees discharged their duties. He was surprised to hear the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. E. P. Bouverie) lately say that the issues before the Committees were so simple that any body of men could easily decide them. One of the most complicated questions was that of agency. If the House gave up their jurisdiction, as he thought they would be quite right in doing, they ought to transfer it to the highest possible tribunal. He had as great respect for the dignity of the Judges, with whom he was more nearly connected, as the noble Lord opposite, and he put it to him, whether it would not be possible to get this jurisdiction undertaken by them? When this House gave the Judges the appointment of revising barristers they did not object that that patronage would destroy their independence and render them political. He recognized no right in the Judges to decide upon their duties; if they objected to discharge them, the course open to them was clear. In the words of the excellent prayer which they used to repeat in College, there would always be a supply of men duly qualified to serve in Church and State. The duties of the Judges had been very much diminished of late by two Acts transferring a large share of the business which formerly came before them to the County Courts on the one hand, and to the masters and clerks on the other. And further than this, it was proposed that three Judges should be allowed to sit in banco instead of four. The fourth, when he did sit, was always an outsider; for the Chief Justice sat in the middle, with a puisne on either side of him, and the fourth was unable to communicate with anybody. With every possible respect for the Judges, they should be invited to re-consider their decision. It might be necessary to add two or three to the total number, and when a necessity arose for sending down a special Commission connected with elections all the names might be put together and a couple of Judges chosen by ballot. The Scotch Judges had very little to do, and they might be got to try the Scotch petitions. The Irish Judges also, his friends told him, had a great deal of leisure on their hands; and if they were called upon to take cognizance of the Irish elections, that would be only "justice to Ireland." With a little coaxing and encouragement on the part of the Prime Minister, backed by an expression of opinion on the part of the House, the Judges, he was convinced, might be induced to undertake the duties which it was sought to intrust to their hands.

MR. BOUVERIE said, that one suggestion made by the hon. Member for Westminster, to the effect that any transfer of jurisdiction to an external tribunal should be temporary in its character and renewable from time to time, was well worthy of favourable consideration. The experiment was a bold one, and he entertained great doubts whether it would succeed. The House seemed hardly to attach sufficient value to the constitutional privilege which, to a great extent, it still retained of appointing its own tribunal to try those important questions concerning the seats of its own Members. The hon. Member for Rochester (Mr. P. Wykeham-Martin) had very properly objected to the proposal to place the trial of controverted elections in the hands of a Judge without a jury. For what was the present tribunal but a small jury selected with care by the House, and composed of men in whom it could trust, to try the question of facts, whether the sitting Member by his agents had or had not been guilty of bribery? Let the House bear in mind that this privilege had been only won from the Crown after a great struggle 250 years ago. It was thought then by our ancestors, who were as wise, perhaps wiser, than ourselves upon these matters, that it was essential to their independence that they should have the trial of these questions in their own hands. And if hon. Members thought fit to look back to the Great Remonstrance presented by the House of Commons to King James at the commencement of his reign, they would find that this was one of the points most strongly insisted upon by the Commons. What was the proposal now made by the Government, with the sanction, apparently, of many hon. Members present, and with the approval of the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread)? It was to transfer to one person nominated by the Crown the trial of controverted elections. The nomination of the Crown now-a-days was the nomination of the party commanding a majority in that House. And when party spirit ran high—and they knew that Judges, before their appointment at any rate, had not been untainted with party spirit—how long did the House suppose that the decision of a single Judge sitting to try, without appeal, the character of hon. Gentlemen and of constituencies, would continue to be regarded with respect? However pure and upright a single Judge might be they might rely upon it that, after a time, there would be, rightly or wrongly, a weight of odium accumulating against his decisions, rendering it impossible for such a tribunal to continue. He did not say that the present tribunal was a perfect one; but, like a jury, it ceased to exist as soon as it had given a decision, and though that decision might be found fault with by people out-of-doors, no personal imputation rested upon those who had composed it. They were in the long run admitted to have acted honestly, even if imperfectly, and no odium attached to them. But would this be the case with a single Judge? If a gentleman of the long robe who had taken a warm part in Parliamentary conflicts became a Judge, as often happened, and if he had to decide absolutely upon the seat and the character of the Leader of the House or the Leader of the Opposition, would his decision be accepted as a pure and impartial one? He had spoken with eminent men of the legal profession on the subject; and they had urged with much force that such a jurisdiction involved an amount of odium and an imputation of party spirit which in the long run would assuredly destroy its weight and character. Lord Chief Justice Cockburn, than whom there was no more competent authority, had stated this objection very forcibly, showing that Judges were now free from such imputations because they had not to try questions of this kind, and the argument was no mere ad captandum one, but was entitled to great weight. His hon. Friend (Mr. Whitbread) had urged that the plan proposed would secure a trial on the spot and an immediate decision; but if, as the hon. Member for Westminster had suggested, there were a fishing inquiry into every election, there would be little prospect of an immediate decision, and even if only returns that were petitioned against were inquired into, he questioned whether the dilatoriness of the new tribunal would not far exceed that of the present one. Indeed, one of the advantages of Parliamentary Committees, whether with regard to election petitions or Private Bills, was that their administration of justice, however rough and unskilful, was rapid. A decision was given within a reasonable time, whereas, if forty, fifty, or sixty petitions had to be tried by two Judges in all parts of the country, with the host of witnesses which a local inquiry would produce, he doubted whether the proceedings would be completed in less than two or three years. He thought that a great deal of the public feeling which existed as to the unsatisfactory nature of the present tribunal was due to a misapprehension. The popular notion was that a Committee sat to try the corruption of a constituency; but in truth the simple issue to be tried was whether the sitting Member had been guilty, personally or by his agents, of bribery or treating, and the amount of evidence adduced by the petitioners was generally the smallest which could be adduced with safety to their cause. A Committee had not to inquire into the general corruption of a constituency, over which, indeed, all parties were more or less interested in drawing a veil; and the simple issue presented to them was one which a jury of English gentlemen were perfectly competent to determine. Moreover, the expense, unless from an unforeseen accident the proceedings were unusually delayed, was not excessive. An inquiry on the spot would, he believed, be more costly—["Oh!"]—because the expensive part of the machinery would have to be taken down to the inexpensive part. He believed it would be dearer for the counsel and agents to go down from London than for the witnesses to be brought up. However that might be, he thought the local inquiry should be confined to the charge of corruption against a constituency; and if the Bill provided a permanent tribunal for the investigation of such charges, whenever made, without the cumbrous preliminary of an Address by both Houses to the Crown, it would be much better than the present proposal. While trusting that the House would weigh well the importance of parting with a privilege wrung from the Crown by our ancestors, he would recommend the hon. Member for Berwick-on-Tweed (Mr. A. Mitchell) not to divide the House upon his Amendment, since it was not favourably viewed, and he thought that in Committee the practical difficulties of the Government scheme would be so evident as to necessitate a preference for something like the existing system.

Mr. Bouverie

MR. AYRTON said, that the House was now discussing for the first time a measure of great importance, and, before going into Committee, they ought to know how Scotch and Irish petitions were to be tried. Were they to be tried in the same manner, or were they to be tried in Scotland and Ireland by the ordinary Judges? He would not attempt the disagreeable task of persuading hon. Members to retain an authority which they felt themselves conscientiously unfit to exercise; but he doubted whether this measure would improve the administration of the law. It had, apparently, two objects—first to deprive the House of its jurisdiction, in regard to the right of Members to sit in it, and secondly to repress electoral corruption. Now, would it not be better to pursue the latter object alone, without dealing with the question of jurisdiction? That question had important constitutional bearings; and its transference to the Judges might raise the question whether a seat had been vacated, or whether a writ had been properly issued, leading, perhaps, to a conflict between the House and an authority beyond its walls. It had been said that there was a law of the land as administered in Westminster Hall, and a law of Parliament administered in this House, and that a Judge thoroughly conversant with the former might be profoundly ignorant of the latter. Now, a Judge vested with this authority might enforce what he held to be the law of the land without taking due cognizance of the law of Parliament. So far from their being likely to repress bribery, he believed these provisions were artfully conceived for the purpose of encouraging bribery. ["Oh!"]. He would tell the House why. A Judge of Assize was to go down, with all the dignity of his office, to try a charge of electoral corruption. He would not go down like those ferrets, the Commissioners, who had no dignity to uphold, and who could pursue their inquiries when and where they pleased, and ascertain the truth. The Judge was to try an issue technically raised under an Act of Parliament. Well, the parties prosecuting might not appear, and then the Judge could do nothing; his functions were practically at an end. In order to ensure that the Judge should have as little as possible to do, what did the Bill propose? It proposed that a man should be compelled to give such a security as would make him very unwilling to act at all. And, then, in order to insure a full disclosure of corruption, the Bill provided that, in the case of an inquiry into the general corruption of a constituency, the expenses of the inquiry should fall upon the inhabitants of the place. He could not conceive any expedients better devised to render the inhabitants indisposed to a full and searching inquiry. Besides, the Judge would confine himself to trying the one simple and narrow issue—the right to the seat; and, the moment a single act of bribery was proved, the Judge would be called upon to decide the question of the seat, as it was not for the interest of any one to expose general corruption or to risk the disfranchisement of the borough. He was perfectly ready to go into Committee for the purpose of seeing whether they could discover a mode for putting down bribery and corruption, though he held that the Bill would wholly fail to effect the main purpose for which it was said to have been introduced. He recommended the hon. Member for Berwick-on-Tweed to withdraw his Amendment.

MR. WALPOLE said, he believed the answer to the first part of the hon. Gentleman's speech was very easy—namely, that, by the very provisions of the Bill now before the House, Her Majesty's Government must almost of necessity bring in a measure which, regard being had to the different circumstances of the country, would establish as nearly as possible the same system for Scotland and Ireland. The objections taken to this Bill were of four kinds. The first objection insisted on in the Amendment, and still more strengthened by the argument of the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie), was that it was proposed to take away the jurisdiction of the House. But the Secretary of State for India had shown very clearly that the privilege supposed to belong to the House was clearly imaginary. It was very true, as the right hon. Gentleman had reminded them, that the House had 200 years ago extorted this privilege from the Crown. But the state of things was very different 200 years ago from what it was now. Then it was the law and custom of Parliament to determine the right of the different electors to vote for the different places, and that law and custom of Parliament could not be interpreted by any authority but that of Parliament itself. But the moment they turned the right of election into statutory law, then it was no longer a question for the House of Commons to determine, according to the custom of Parliament, but according to the rules by which Courts of Law decide that and other questions. The question which was sent to a Committee upstairs to decide was not what the Parliamentary custom might be, but what the statute law was. Then, the second objection taken by the hon. Member for Westminster (Mr. Stuart Mill) was to this effect, that they were about to transfer to the Judges of the land a power which they might exercise in a manner not satisfactory to the House, inasmuch as they were appointed by the Crown. Such an objection as that would also have been very good 200 years ago, when the Judges were removable at the pleasure of the Crown; but when once the Judges were made independent, they were as independent of the Crown as of that House in administering the law. The next objection was one that was urged by the hon. Member for Rochester (Mr. Wykeham-Martin), and there was some force in it—that they were giving power to a single Judge to try questions affecting the character of individuals, and to inflict upon them very heavy penalties. Now, the Bill dealt with two different subjects—the one a question of law, the other of fact. With regard to the question of law, that would be referred back under the Bill to more Judges than one. But with regard to the question of fact, it might be worth while to consider in Committee, whether in some cases it might not be the privilege and right of persons whose interests were affected to insist upon having the matter tried by a jury under the direction of a Judge. The last objection was raised by the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton)—namely, that they would by this Bill increase, instead of diminish, corruption and expense. But how could that be proved? The fact was, that if they sent these matters to an independent tribunal, where the Judges were not interested in the least degree in upholding corruption or in screening it, the probability was that they would do more to put a stop to the vicious practices than if they were to keep the inquiry in the hands of those who might come personally into contact with the gentlemen implicated in the alleged crime, and who, therefore, might be disposed to be more lenient than a Judge of the land would be. On the subject of expense, his hon. and learned Friend could hardly be serious in arguing that to try these questions where the witnesses were not brought from a great distance, where large fees were not paid to counsel, and where constant adjournments would not take place, could be more expensive than it was at present where such inconveniences also necessarily occurred. It is true that by this Bill the alleged corruption of any particular constituency would not be investigated, because the issue would be raised not with regard to the general constituency, but with regard to the particular seat, and, in such cases, recourse must be had to a petition presented to that House, and the matter must be tried by a different tribunal when the charge of corruption was distinctly brought against a whole constituency. For these reasons he hoped the House would go into Committee, in order to constitute a better tribunal than that which they had been hitherto able to obtain.

MR. HENLEY said, he was anxious to say a few words on this Bill. He thought it was incumbent on those who wished to make a great change—to take away a privilege of 200 years' standing—to show distinctly that what they proposed would be an improvement, and that it would stop that corruption which it was its professed object to put down. Let them look to the tribunal constituted under the Bill. The House was now discussing a second proposal. The first proposal was for Judges of a certain standing; but now they had got to Judges of higher salaries and greater honours, and not only that, but his right hon. Friend (Mr. Walpole) said that they must have a jury also. But where were they to end? Now he, for one, was of opinion that they were departing from the old principles of our law and jurisprudence in putting crimes of such vast consequence not only to individuals, but to the country, upon the judgment of a single man. He cared not who that man was for; they could not show, in the whole range of our law, an instance in which issues of this kind were placed at the will of a single man without appeal. For what were they doing? They were not only depriving the individual of a seat; but they were putting it in the power of this Judge to stamp with infamy for seven years, any man whom he might condemn honestly, no doubt, but perhaps mistakenly. If the case were a simple one, where there was no conflict of testimony, it was not of much consequence what kind the tribunal was, for justice was sure to be done. But in these cases there was always a great conflict of testimony from the mouths of witnesses not the most reliable; for, generally, the class of witnesses on election petitions was tinged with party feeling. He did not mean that they said what they knew not to be true; but in the heat of elections people acted under the influence of strong feelings, and the most contrary evidence of what took place was given. The proper tribunal for such cases was a jury; and if the House wanted to have justice done they would take care to have juries where men helped one another to come to a right conclusion. Juries would do justice where a single Judge would not do it. In the conflict of testimony a single man would shrink from coming to a hostile conclusion. And why did they say that cases where a man's life, or character, or property was at issue should come before a jury, and not merely before a Judge? Well, if they were right in that, on what principle would they hand cases of contested elections over to a single Judge? At present a Committee of five was a jury composed of a man's equals, and that was the principle of our law from beginning to end. He thought it was incumbent on the Government to show that the Court which they proposed to establish would be better, more in consonance with the usages of this country, and more likely to stop corruption. He did not believe it would be. He gave the Government great credit for endeavouring to deal with this very difficult subject; but he did not believe that their plan would be an improvement on the existing system. If this were so, it would be better not to proceed. He did not think that abstract Resolutions were convenient. It would be far better to have no abstract Resolution at all on the matter. He was sure that the House would even give up a privilege if by so doing they could stop bribery and corruption; but he repeated that he did not think this Bill would have that effect.

Mr. Walpole

Mr. CRAUFURD opposed the progress of the Bill, on the ground that it would, by its operation, entail as much expense as, or more expense than, was caused by the present system. He thought that it was due to the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down and to the House that the Head of the Government should meet the objections which had been urged against the Bill. He begged, therefore, to move the adjournment of the debate.

This Amendment met with no Seconder.

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question," put, and agreed to.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee.

Mr. DISRAELI moved that the Chairman report Progress.

Mr. AYRTON hoped that before the Motion was agreed to the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury would state the intentions of the Government with respect to Ireland and Scotland.

Mr. DISRAELI: We propose, when this Bill is carried, to introduce Bills for Ireland and Scotland analogous in their nature to this, though not exactly the same. We do not contemplate that it will be necessary to increase the number of Judges either in Ireland or in Scotland.

Motion agreed to.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

MUTINY BILL.—COMMITTEE.

(Mr. Dodson, Sir John Pakington, The Judge Advocate General.)

Order for Committee read.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clauses 1 to 21, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 22 (Providing for the infliction of corporal punishment).

Mr. OTWAY said, that this question had been so often argued in the House that he should not dwell upon it at any length. Last year he showed that corporal punishment had failed as a remedial measure; that those soldiers who had been subject to it had become worse men; and that, in modern armies, with one exception, corporal punishment had been abandoned. In the Russian army he believed the lash was still administered; but even there it was more equitable than with us, seeing that not only private soldiers, but officers, and even noblemen, were occasionally subject to the infliction. The question had very much progressed since it had last been discussed in that House, although in the House itself the cause had retrograded; their proceedings with respect to the practice having been something like the Pyrrhic dance—a step forward and then another backwards. Although flogging had been abolished for certain offences, the distinction which had before prevailed was abolished. Formerly all soldiers when first enlisted belonged to the first class, on which corporal punishment could on no pretence be inflicted; but, in a weak moment, the Minister for War yielded to the representations of Gentlemen on that (the Opposition) side of the House, and abolished the distinction of classes which Lord Herbert had pronounced to be the great protection of the soldier. It might be said that this question should not be discussed now, because the larger question of Courts martial was submitted to a Royal Commission. Of late an extraordinary theory of Government had been acted upon when difficult questions were for settlement, which was to relieve the Executive of its responsibilities by referring the matter to a Royal Commission. Passing that by, the Royal Commission in question could not command the confidence of the country. With the exception of the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread), until the hon. and gallant Member for Truro (Captain Vivian) was appointed the other day, the Members of that Commission had, by voice or vote, expressed themselves in favour of corporal punishment. Yet he assumed that the most important thing to be decided by the Royal Commission was this very question of corporal punishment. Pending the decision of this Royal Commission, he maintained that it was important that the punishment of the lash should be suspended. What would be the feelings of any man who was punished while the question was under consideration? And who were the men on whom we inflicted this degrading punishment? In all times, from the days of Cressy and Agincourt to those of Waterloo and Lucknow, the British soldier had been a model of valour and discipline, and yet he was to be subjected to the same degradation as a cowardly garotter or a convicted felon. Parliament had recently admitted the fathers and brothers of British soldiers within the pale of the Constitution; let them do one thing more—let them endeavour to elevate the soldier rather than degrade him; let them make him feel that he was the armed citizen of a free country. In conclusion, he moved to omit part of the clause, and to insert—

“No court martial shall for any offence whatever committed under this Act during the time of peace, within the Queen’s Dominions, have power to sentence any soldier to corporal punishment.”

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word “any,” in line 36, to the word “shall,” inclusive, in line 40, in order to insert the words “no court martial shall for any offence whatever committed under this Act during the time of peace, within the Queen’s Dominions, have power to sentence any soldier to corporal punishment,”—(Mr. Otway.)

—instead thereof.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, that considering the present position of the question, he should not think it necessary to follow the hon. Member at any length. He would merely remind the Committee that very great concessions were made upon this subject last Session. Corporal punishment was now in a very different position from that in which it had ever been before. The Government had recommended the appointment of a Royal Commission, which was to inquire not only into the constitution of Courts martial, but into the whole system of military punishments. Under these circumstances, he hoped the hon. Member would not press his Motion.

MR. HEADLAM said, he rose to correct two inaccuracies of the hon. Member for Chatham. Before last Session men might be flogged for mutiny and insubordination, whether they were in the first or second class, and that rule was continued; and besides the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread), there was another unpledged Member of the Royal Commission, and that was himself. Last year he expressly guarded himself against giving any opinion as to whether corporal punishment ought to be done away with or not. As the subject was now before a Commission, of which he was a Member, he must abstain from taking part in any division upon it.

CAPTAIN VIVIAN said, last year he voted against the continuance of corporal punishment, and he held the same opinion still; for he believed it would be a good thing if the right hon. Gentleman would state that it should be abolished—that would, he thought, tend to increase the morale of the army more than anything else; but the House had been informed that he had been appointed a Member of the Royal Commission; and, after consulting the other Members of it, he felt it was a delicate matter to give a vote upon a question which that Commission had to try. Therefore he trusted that the question would not be pressed to a division.

Mr. Otway

COLONEL WILSON-PATTEN said, that having the honour of being Chairman of the Commission which had been alluded to, he also should refrain from voting on the present occasion.

SIR CHARLES RUSSELL observed, that last year it was said by the hon. Member for Chatham (Mr. Otway) that men were deterred from entering the army by the existence of corporal punishments. Now, the fact was that, during the last year, 26,000 men had re-enlisted; and this was a larger number than those for the whole seven years before amounted to, and recruiting had during the year enormously increased. The cases of corporal punishment had also during the year amounted in number to only seventeen for the whole army. They, at this time of day, were rather in favour of jumping to conclusions all of a sudden. Much improvement had taken place in the army, and this was caused to a great extent by the measure of the right hon. Member for Huntingdon (General Peel), who increased the pay of the soldier 2*d.* a day, and the consequence was that they were getting better and more contented men. As a proof of this, he might mention that out of the 812 men who composed his own battalion, there were only two who could not sign the pay-book. He hoped that corporal punishment would grow less yearly; but his own opinion was that, for the ruffians who were in the army—for there were some such—there ought to be retained the power of inflicting corporal punishment, which power should be exercised with discretion and with great reluctance.

MR. TREVELYAN said, that the strongest statement in favour of the Amendment was that there had, in the year, been only seventeen cases of corporal punishment, whilst enlistments were largely increased by the extra 2*d.* a day. This being so, there was no reason why they should not send the seventeen bad bargains packing, and do away with this degrading punishment.

Question put, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause.”

The Committee divided:—Ayes 127; Noes 152: Majority 25.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 23 to 31, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 32 (Expenses of confining military prisoners in county gaols).

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH moved an Amendment. The hon. Member explained that, according to the present regulations, Government only allowed 1s. a day for the maintenance of military prisoners in county gaols, which, in many cases, was not sufficient to cover the expenses. He moved that words be added to the clause enacting that a sum equal to the expense which each prisoner might occasion for maintenance and establishment charges in such prison should be allowed by the Government.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON resisted the Amendment, on the ground that 1s. a day covered all expenses in the case of military prisoners.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 33 to 66, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 67 (Interpretation).

LORD OTHO FITZGERALD moved an Amendment, with the view of placing Ireland in the same position as England and Scotland with respect to the billeting of soldiers. In the latter two countries private individuals were exempted from having soldiers on the march billeted upon them, and what he wanted was that Ireland also should be included in the exemption, which could be effected by leaving out of the clause the words "in Great Britain." The noble Lord moved accordingly.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WARREN) opposed the Amendment. The grievance complained of was seldom experienced, and limited to a few persons. The fact was that the scarcity of public-houses in certain parts of the country in Ireland rendered it necessary to billet soldiers upon some private houses.

CAPTAIN VIVIAN said, that having exempted England and Scotland from this grievance, the Government sought to impose it upon Ireland. This, then, might be considered one of the causes of Irish discontent.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, that having made inquiries upon the subject, he found that, from the scarcity of public-houses on certain roads in Ireland, it became necessary sometimes to billet soldiers on private houses.

MR. CHILDERS believed that the same reasons precisely had been urged in favour of the power of billeting soldiers in Scotland. In spite, however, of such reasons, Scotland was exempted from this annoyance, and no inconvenience had been experienced in consequence.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause agreed to.

Remaining clauses agreed to.

Preamble.

MR. OTWAY said, that words were inserted in the Preamble which were not true—namely, that the British army was kept up for the purpose of "maintaining the balance of power in Europe." If he wanted an authority upon this point, he need only refer to the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, who stated that the British army, which consisted of only 40,000 or 50,000 men, could have no effect upon the balance of European power. He therefore proposed in lines 7 and 8 to omit the words "for the preservation of the balance of power in Europe."

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON, though not concurring in the reason urged by the hon. Gentleman for the omission of the words, nevertheless did not consider them of sufficient importance to contest the point.

Preamble, as amended, agreed to.

House resumed.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered upon Monday next.

LONDON COAL AND WINE DUTIES CONTINUANCE BILL—[BILL 43.]

(Mr. Dodson, Lord John Manners, Mr. Hunt.)

CONSIDERATION.

Order for consideration of the Bill as amended read.

MR. AYRTON moved the following clause:—

"The accounts of the Coal and Wine Duties shall be audited by the auditor appointed by the Secretary of State under the Act of the eighteenth and nineteenth of Victoria, chapter one hundred and twenty, in the same manner as the accounts of the Metropolitan Board are directed to be audited under that Act, and the mayor, aldermen, and commons of the city of London shall lay before the auditor all the accounts and vouchers relating to the said Coal and Wine Duties, and the auditor shall have and exercise in regard to such accounts all the powers that he has in regard to the accounts of the Metropolitan Board."

Clause brought up, and read the first time.

Mr. CRAWFORD objected to the clause.

Mr. AYRTON said, that he should persist in moving the clause. It was one that ought really to be adopted. There should be an independent and efficient audit.

Mr. GOSCHEN did not see why in a Continuance Bill a different audit should be established from that already provided.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, that when the matter was first mentioned to him he saw no particular objection to the appointment of an independent auditor; but he had not then heard the objections of the City authorities. As no charge was made against the mode in which the accounts had hitherto been audited, he hoped the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets would withdraw his clause.

Question put. "That the Clause be read a second time."

The House divided:—Ayes 28; Noes 82: Majority 54.

Bill to be read the third time To-morrow.

ECCLESIASTICAL COMMISSIONERS ORDERS IN COUNCIL BILL (Lords).

[BILL 69.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Mr. MONK asked for some explanation of the legal difficulties which had rendered such a measure necessary.

Mr. GATHORNE HARDY said, the Bill was essential in order to establish the validity of certain sales of capitular property under Orders in Council, on the legality of which some doubt had been thrown by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

Mr. BOUVERIE expressed a hope that the measure would not only establish the validity of what had already been done; but would provide for the commutation of other ecclesiastical estates not already commuted.

Mr. BENTINCK intimated his intention to oppose the Bill on its next stage.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Wednesday next.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT SUPPLEMENTAL BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Secretary GATHORNE HARDY, Bill to confirm certain Provisional Orders under "The Local Government Act, 1858," relating to the districts of Workington, Walton on the Hill,

Mr. Ayrton

West Derby, Eton, Llanelly, Oxenhope and Stanbury, and Keighley; and for other purposes relating to certain districts under the said Act, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Secretary GATHORNE HARDY and Sir JAMES FRASERSON.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 77.]

House adjourned at a quarter before Two o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, March 27, 1868.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Indian Railway Companies* (57); Oyster and Mussel Fisheries* (58). Committee—Railways (Extension of Time)* (58); Consolidated Fund (£362,398 19s. 9d.)*; Legitimacy Declaration (Ireland)* (27). Report—Consolidated Fund (£362,398 19s. 9d.)*; Legitimacy Declaration (Ireland)* (27). Third Reading—Fairs (Ireland)* (47), and passed.

SCOTLAND—POOR ASSESSMENT.

MOTION FOR RETURNS.

THE EARL OF AIRLIE said: I think that the Returns which I propose to move for will throw some light on a measure that is likely to come before the House this Session—I mean the Bill to Amend the Representation of the People in Scotland. As that Bill is not now before your Lordships, of course I do not mean to discuss its provisions; and I shall not refer to it further than to say that I understand it is the intention of the Government to propose for Scotland the same occupation franchise in counties that was embodied in the Reform Act of last year—a franchise based on rateable value. As a general rule, I am strongly in favour of placing England and Scotland as nearly as possible on the same footing; but I think if we can show that there are circumstances in the case of Scotland which make it inexpedient to adopt a franchise founded on rateable value, that we are fairly entitled to press that consideration upon the Government. Perhaps, for the sake of strengthening my case, I may be allowed to refer to what has lately taken place. A very short time ago, the Prime Minister addressed a letter to the newspapers in which he laid down the principles on which a Conservative Reform Bill should be founded. One of those cardinal points was that no place should be wholly disfranchised. But I understand that in the case of Ireland the Government propose wholly to disfranchise five or six boroughs. I understand also that the much-abused "hard and fast line," which the right hon. Gentleman denounced last year as wholly inadmissible, is to be adopted in the Irish Reform Bill. I refer to these circumstances not for the sake of taunting the Government with having abandoned some of those Conservative principles which the Leader of the Party invented for them last year, and which he affirmed again this year, some ten days before he threw them over, but because I wish to point out that the Government are not exactly in a position to require us to accept any provisions which they may choose to put into the Scotch Reform Bill, merely because they happen to have been inserted in the Reform Act of last year. In the few observations I am about to make, I shall confine myself entirely to the county occupation franchise, because I take it for granted that the burgh franchise in Scotland will be the same as the English borough franchise—that is, that it will be simple household suffrage. We have in Scotland that which you have not in England, a valuation of the whole property of the country, founded upon that which, after all, is the true measure of value, the rent actually paid by the occupier. On that valuation all rates are assessed with the exception of the poor rates, and, in some counties, of the rates levied for keeping up the roads. Nothing would be simpler than to make the valuation roll the register, as practically it is now. The figure to which you should reduce the franchise so as to make it equivalent to a £12 rating in England would be a fair subject for discussion. But when you come to deal with the rateable value on which the poor rates are assessed, and seek to found a franchise on it, you get into all sorts of difficulties. In the first place, there are about a hundred parishes in Scotland where the occupiers are not rated for the relief of the poor. If you say that rateable value is to be the basis of the franchise, you cannot leave the state of things in those parishes exactly as it is at present, because the result would be not only that there would be no enfranchisement in those parishes, but that the occupiers who now have votes would actually be disfranchised; and, of course, that is too absurd a conclusion to be contemplated. There remains, then, only one alternative—you may force an assessment for the relief of the poor on those parishes where it does not now exist. I cannot imagine that the Government will bring forward so mischievous a proposal. Why are there no poor rates in the parishes I have referred to? Because there is full employment for the able-bodied men, and the sick and infirm are supported mainly by their relatives, who, from a feeling of honourable pride, are not willing that they should be dependent upon strangers. Any small deficiency there may be is made up by collections in church, supplemented by voluntary contributions from the proprietors. To force an assessment on these parishes would go far to demoralize and pauperize them. The only course, then, open to you with regard to these parishes is, that the assessor should be called upon to make deductions from the rents paid by the occupiers, for the sake of establishing what you may call a rateable value, but which really is not a rateable value because no rates are assessed on it; there are no poor rates, and all the other rates are levied on the gross rental. You are going to establish a fictitious valuation, not for the purpose of rating, but merely to ascertain the occupier's qualification to vote, when you might arrive at the same result by much simpler means. I come now to those parishes—the great majority—in which the occupiers are rated for the relief of the poor. In these parishes, the valuations are made by the parochial boards, who are authorized to make deductions, and those deductions are not made on any uniform principle. They vary greatly, not only as between different kinds of property, but as between property of the same kind in different parishes. I have had occasion to look into this matter of parochial assessments, and I find that in the county of Forfar the deductions vary from nothing at all to about 40 per cent—that is to say, in one parish an occupier who pays £12 is rated at £12, while in other parishes a £12 rating is equivalent to a rent of about £20. I believe that as great discrepancies exist in the other counties which are included in the Return moved for. I have here a Return made up by those persons whose duty it is to collect the poor rates in the county of Renfrew. I find that the deductions allowed to occupiers of the same description of property vary in different parishes from nothing at all up to 75 per cent. As to dwelling-houses, in five parishes there is no deduction made, and in them a £12 rental and a £12 rating are synonymous; in one parish a deduction is made of 33½ per cent, and there a £12 rating is equivalent to a rental of £18; in other parishes the deductions vary from 10 to 25 per cent, and the amount of gross rent required to give a £12 rating varies from £13 to £16. But in the case of lands, the discrepancies are much greater. In three parishes no deductions are made; in two parishes a deduction is given of 75 per cent, and in those, to get a £12 rating an occupier must pay a rent of £48. Between these limits there is almost every conceivable variety in the amount of deductions allowed. If, then, you found the county occupation franchise on the rateable value on which the poor rates are assessed, and if you fix the figure at £12, the result will be this, that in one parish an occupier who pays a rent of £12 will have a vote, while his neighbour, perhaps in the next parish, will not be qualified to vote for the same county unless he pays a rent of £48. This is an inequality too monstrous to be endured; the county franchise must be established on a basis which shall approximate at least to justice and equality. But I do not understand that it is the intention of the Government to alter in any way the laws relating to the assessments for the relief of the poor in Scotland. We come, then, to this point, that while the valuation for purposes of assessment is to be continued on the old footing, another valuation is to be made, not for purposes of assessment, but in order to ascertain the qualification of occupiers to vote. To make this valuation, we must set in motion a machinery of some kind—we must have a staff of clerks, and this needless expense and trouble is to be incurred merely for the sake of enabling the Government to preserve what they are pleased to call their consistency. It may be said that I have anticipated, in some degree, a discussion that might more conveniently have taken place when the Scotch Reform Bill came before this House. I will endeavour to meet that objection. I cannot forget what took place last year when a far greater measure—the English Reform Bill—came before your Lordships. On that occasion very important Amendments were proposed by two eminent Members of this House. Nobody can pretend that those Amendments were in any degree factious, or that any exception could be taken, on that ground, to the speeches by which they were supported. Those Amendments were honestly intended to assist the Government in framing a measure which might have some elements of permanence. How were those proposals met? The Government not only opposed the Amendments; they refused even to discuss them. They said, in effect—Your proposals may be good or bad, but we cannot consider them, it is too late; the subject has been fully discussed in the House of Commons; if you introduce any material alterations, we throw upon you the responsibility for the loss of the Bill. That was the manner in which this great measure was dealt with here—that was the manner in which this House was treated by a Government which calls itself Conservative. I cannot expect that the Scotch Reform Bill will be treated with more ceremony than the English Bill—I cannot expect that the Government will show more respect and consideration for your Lordships' House this year than they did last year. I have moved for these Returns, because I wish that this particular point, as well as the Bill itself, may be fully discussed, and discussed in good time, both here and elsewhere; and I am not without hopes, when the matter is placed in its true light, that Parliament will adopt a county franchise founded on the real rent, and will reject this fanciful scheme of a franchise founded on what is called rateable value, but which is not rateable value at all, because no rates are to be assessed on it.

The Earl of Airlie

Motion for,

Return from each Parish in the several Counties of East Lothian, Mid Lothian, Lanark, Renfrew, Ayr, Aberdeen, Fife, and Forfar, showing in a tabular Form the Deductions allowed by Parochial Boards to the several Classes of Occupiers of Lands, Minerals, Dwelling Houses, Public Works, and Railways; and showing the Gross Rent which, subject to such Deductions, is required in order to give to each Class of Occupiers a clear Rent of £12 rated for Poor Assessment: Also, for a Return of the Parishes in Scotland in which the Occupiers are not rated for the Relief of the Poor.—(The Earl of Airlie.)

THE EARL OF DEVON thought it more convenient to abstain from discussing the details of a measure which was not yet before their Lordships; and he would therefore merely state that the Government had no objection to the production of the Return.

Motion agreed to.

UNITED STATES—THE NEUTRALITY LAWS—THE "ALABAMA" CLAIMS.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

EARL RUSSELL: I rise for the purpose of calling your Lordships' attention to the Commission on the Neutrality Laws, and to ask, how soon the Report of the Commission will be laid before Parliament? and to move that—

"An humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for, Copies or Extracts of any further Correspondence that may have taken place between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of the United States in reference to the Alabama and other claims."

My Lords, in doing this, though I do not desire to censure the course of the Government, yet I may say that I do not concur in that course. My wish is that this country shall avoid as much as possible just the opposite error to that which both Houses of Parliament were disposed to fall into three or four years ago. During the progress of the civil war in America it was evident that a considerable number of Members of both Houses were hardly prepared to do justice to the Government of the United States, and as non-belligerents to perform all the duties of neutrality in good faith, and to abstain from everything to which that Government could justly take exception. I remember that when, on one occasion, I referred to the Southern States as the "so-called" Confederate States, the Leader of the Opposition told me that I might with just as much propriety speak of the United States as the "so-called United States;" and the same noble Earl indulged in a panegyric upon Mr. Laird, who, in my view, was usurping the Prerogative of the Crown and endeavouring to make war on his own account, thereby running the risk of involving this country in hostilities. It will also be remembered that, in the presence of a large company of Members of the House of Commons, Mr. Laird said he was proud of having fitted out the Alabama, and much preferred being the builder of that vessel to having made such a speech as Mr. Bright had recently delivered; and that statement was loudly applauded by many hon. Members. All this shows that many Members in both Houses were not prepared to do everything required by the duties of neutrality. Moreover, some noble Friends of mine objected very strongly to our allowing ships fitted out in this country for the purpose of running the blockade to be subject to the common law of nations, which exposed merchant ships to the risk of capture if they carried anything contraband of war. They were for protecting such ships by the naval force of this country. I find that the danger now is of a totally different kind. I find that that partiality for the Southern States has altogether ceased; and that, instead of the difficulty which I had to encounter, as the Minister of the Crown, in performing the duties of neutrality, there is a difficulty in preserving the proper position and dignity of this country against unreasonable or unfounded demands. Not that I think any objection can be taken to the course that has been pursued by the United States Government. It is only natural that people who suffered from the capture of their merchant ships and the destruction of their property should come to us for redress. The Government of that country have stated their case very temperately, and it is not from them that any of the excitement which has lately prevailed has arisen. It is persons in this country who, when the excitement caused by the capture of the Alabama and other vessels was entirely allayed in America, have raised the question anew, being apparently apprehensive that we shall have to meet the heavy claims which have been preferred. I confess that, under these circumstances, I feel considerable apprehension that the Government may be so pressed, that, either by negotiation or by the introduction of a Bill into Parliament at a time when the business of the Session is hurried through—or, perhaps, by both modes—our position as a neutral nation may be endangered, and we may concede demands to which, as an independent Power, we ought not to submit. It is with this view, therefore, that I beg to recall to your Lordships some of the circumstances which have occurred since the present Government have been in power, and also during the former Government. Just before I left the Foreign Office I had a correspondence with Mr. Adams; and here I may say, that I cannot mention that gentleman's name without expressing my high esteem and respect for him, the value I place upon his character, and the assurance I feel that in conducting business he did everything which honour and good faith and moderation could prescribe. While carrying out the orders of his Government, his invariably conciliatory conduct tended to render easy what would otherwise have been an almost impossible task. Now, with regard to Mr. Adams,

I may state the way in which he and I left the question when I was about to leave the Foreign Office. I wrote to Mr. Adams stating the whole case as then understood by Her Majesty's Government, and about a fortnight afterwards an answer was received by my noble Friend (Lord Clarendon), going through all the points to which I had addressed myself. Mr. Adams stated that upon the law we entirely agreed. I had said frequently that the conduct of the United States towards Portugal in 1818 was such as might advantageously be followed, since when some Portuguese ships had been captured by privateers fitted out in America they did all that was required by their neutral position and by their dignity as an independent State. Mr. Adams, at the commencement of his letter, stated that, as we entirely agreed upon the law, there was no need of carrying on further discussion upon that subject; but he went on to make a statement with respect to the facts of the case. I had expressed a hope that there might be some legislation which would tend to ascertain more precisely the position of neutrals, and on which both Powers might agree. Mr. Adams, remarking upon this, said—

"So long as the heavy list of depredations upon American commerce, consequent upon the issue of a succession of hostile cruisers, built, fitted out, armed, manned, and navigated from British ports, continues to weigh upon their minds, it would be the height of assurance to expect any common legislation."

Upon this Lord Clarendon, in a letter dated the 2nd of December, 1865, remarked—

"It is, nevertheless, my duty in closing this correspondence to observe that no armed vessel departed during the war from a British port to cruise against the commerce of the United States."

Thus, while there was an agreement respecting the law of the case, there was the widest difference with respect to the facts. Mr. Adams spoke of a succession of armed cruisers being fitted out in British ports. But Lord Clarendon said that no such cruisers left British ports to prey upon the commerce of the United States. The noble Lord who now holds the seals of the Foreign Office differs so far from me, that he holds it was wise to submit the question at issue in this controversy to arbitration. I have already stated in this House that that is a matter entirely within the discretion of the Secretary of State; and that the fact of my having refused to submit the question to arbitration was no reason whatever against Lord Stanley adopting that mode if he thought that beneficial results would follow, and to that course I could not make any objection. But I certainly do not anticipate any good results from arbitration. Now, as to the questions to be submitted to arbitration, I own I cannot concur with Her Majesty's present Government. It seems to me that, Mr. Adams having stated that a succession of hostile cruisers, manned and armed by this country, had been sent out to prey upon the commerce of the United States, and Lord Clarendon having distinctly denied that assertion, the first thing for an arbiter or for any Commission that might be appointed to investigate would be the facts. If it was found that there had been armed vessels, or even that there had been vessels built and equipped in this country, that had gone out to prey on the commerce of the United States, it would then become a substantive question to ascertain whether there had been any want of due diligence on the part of the Government of this country. In the meantime it would seem to be useless to place so vague a question before an arbiter as whether this country was morally responsible for that which had been done during the war. Evidently that would be an entirely independent question. I know not in what manner any arbiter or Commission could proceed unless first to ascertain the facts of the case. Now, my Lords, I wish to make some observations on a very few cases concerning which there may be a complaint that armed vessels had been sent out to prey upon the commerce of the so-called Confederate States. One of the first of these cases was that of the Florida. She was equipped here, and afterwards obtained a commission at Mobile, a port belonging to the so-called Confederate States. The next case was that very remarkable one which has given rise to the greater part of this correspondence—that of the Alabama. Now, unless it be said that the Government are morally responsible for the mental illness of Sir John Harding, I do not know how we can be held blamable. According to the Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown, there was not sufficient evidence upon which the Government could proceed to detain that vessel until the 24th of July. The Opinion of Sir Robert Collier, upon which the American Minister relied, was taken on the 23rd of July. If Sir John Harding had been in possession of his usual judgment upon that day, the Law Officers would have agreed upon an Opinion, and on the 25th the Alabama would have been detained. But, unfortunately, it so happened that the great excitement to which Sir John Harding had been subjected in the course of these questions unfitted his mind for giving an opinion on so important a matter, and therefore some little time was lost, and it was not until the morning of the 29th of July that the Foreign Office were in possession of the Opinion of the Law Officers. That Opinion would have been immediately acted upon, but on that day information was received that the Alabama had gone to sea upon a trial trip. Orders were immediately sent to Queenstown and also to Nassau with a view to the detention of the vessel ; but I hold in my hand an account sent by the Consul of the United States at Liverpool to Mr. Adams, to the effect that she was not an armed vessel, and that after going, I think, to Beaumaris, she sailed round by the North of Ireland, and never stopped until she reached the Azores. There she obtained from another vessel her powder and stores. The Alabama was therefore not an armed vessel when leaving this country, and it was in the jurisdiction of another Sovereign that she received her armament. With regard to the question of neutrality, the policy of the United States may be said to be founded upon the conduct of the American President and Secretary of State in 1794. Until that time it had been held by writers on the Law of Nations that a neutral Power might take one of two courses—it might either allow arms and ammunition to be supplied to two belligerents impartially, or it might abstain from giving succour to either. The latter course was thought by Washington to be the safer and wiser. That course was followed by the United States in 1794, and the law remained in that condition until the wars broke out between the colonies of Spain and Portugal and the mother countries, when great complaints were made by the latter of the number of captures that had been made by the cruisers acting from the United States. I hold in my hand the complaint made on the 8th of March, 1818, by Senhor Correa de Serra to the United States Government, in which he said that three Portuguese ships had been captured by privateers fitted out in the United States, manned by American crews, and commanded by American captains, though under insurgent colours, and he demanded satisfaction and indemnification for the injury which had been done to Portuguese subjects, as well as for the insult which had been offered to the Portuguese flag. To this letter the American Secretary of State, after reciting the complaint of the Portuguese Minister, replies as follows :—

Earl Russell

“ The Government of the United States having used all the means in its power to prevent the fitting out and arming of vessels in their ports to cruise against any nation with whom they are at peace, and having faithfully carried into execution the laws enacted to preserve inviolate the neutral and pacific obligations of this Union, cannot consider itself bound to indemnify individual foreigners for losses by capture over which the United States have neither control nor jurisdiction. For such events no nation can in principle, nor does in practice, hold itself responsible.”

The United States, however, not only took measures to prosecute, but enacted a special law in order to maintain their neutrality more faithfully. The Act of 1818 having passed, it is alleged that those depredations ceased ; but about a year and a half afterwards Senhor Correa, in a note of the 23rd of November, 1819, says—

“ I do justice to, and am grateful for, the proceedings of the Executive in order to put a stop to these depredations, but the evil is rather increasing. I can present to you, if required, a list of fifty Portuguese ships, almost all richly laden, some of them East Indiamen, which have been taken by these people during the period of full peace. This is not the whole loss we have sustained, this list comprehending only those captures of which I have received official complaints. The victims have been many more, besides violations of territory by landing and plundering ashore, with shocking circumstances. One city alone on this coast has armed twenty-six ships, which prey on our vitals ; and a week ago three armed ships of this nature were in that port waiting for a favourable opportunity of sailing on a cruise.”

Now, the Portuguese having suffered by the loss of many of their vessels, and the United States Government having stated that they had put the laws in force, and having assumed that they alone were to be the judges how their laws were to be carried into effect, Mr. Adams says he considers the case of the United States against Portugal “ impregnable.” They endeavoured to put their laws in force ; but there was a great public feeling in favour of fitting out privateers against the Portuguese Government, and they were not able to prevent Americans—for the ships were manned and commanded by citizens of the United States—from carrying on such depredations. Then, I say, if that case be “ impregnable,” if the United States had no reason to make any indemnity, or to agree to any commission for the purpose of seeing whether the Portuguese owners should be indemnified, the case of Her Majesty's Government, which is similar to that of the United States in regard to Portugal, is equally impregnable. Your Lordships know what proceedings took place with regard to the Alexandra. A very long argument was carried on in the Court of Exchequer, and the reason why the case was not fully judged was owing to a very strange peculiarity in our mode of proceeding. Another matter of dispute was with regard to the rams that were built and fitted out at Birkenhead. There was great difficulty in getting legal evidence with respect to these vessels. We were informed, however, that these vessels were intended for the service of the Confederate States, and the question was whether, on my own responsibility, I should order their detention. The allegation made, on the other hand, was that these vessels were intended for the Pasha of Egypt. Thereupon I sent a telegram to our Consul General in Egypt, directing him to inquire of the Pasha whether these vessels were really building for him at Birkenhead? and I received an answer that the Pasha denied that he had given any such orders, and said that a proposal for a contract had been made to the former Pasha, but that he had refused to have anything to do with it. I then directed the Secretary of Embassy at Paris to make inquiry there of M. Bravay, with a view to ascertaining whether or not these vessels were intended for the Confederate States; and a contract was placed in his hands, by M. Bravay, according to which Captain Bullock, the agent of the Confederate States, was said to have transferred, for a certain sum of money, the possession of these vessels into his hands. I at length succeeded in ascertaining a fact which the Customs Department had previously been unable to ascertain—namely, that these vessels were clearly built for the Confederate States; and when I had once ascertained that, and that the Confederate Government had tried to secure themselves by selling the vessels to other parties, I thought that I was fully authorized to detain them, though I was advised that it was doubtful whether, when the case came to a trial, there was legal evidence against them. Still, it seemed to me that there was sufficient moral evidence that these vessels were intended to act against the blockading squadron of the United States; I therefore gave orders for the detention of these vessels. Now, I do not believe that I exceeded the law in so doing; but it was very possible that if the case had come on for trial it might have been found that we had not the legal evidence to secure a conviction. I was told even that, although I had in my own hands a copy of the contract to which I have just alluded, it would not be possible to produce it in a Court of Law in this country, the peculiarities of our law being such that it was necessary that the original contract should be produced. I know not how that may be; but I thought that possibly the peace of this kingdom was at stake, and that if these vessels went out to break the blockade instituted by the United States, an injury would be inflicted upon that Government which the United States probably would not pass over; and I therefore thought that, whether all the requirements of the law had been complied with or not, I should be right in ordering the seizure of these vessels. Mr. Adams continued to complain that we had not altered our law; but if we had altered it—if we had adopted the American law—we should not have been able to take the efficient measures which we did take. We might then have compelled them to forfeit a certain sum of money, but we should not have been able to seize and keep the vessels. We certainly incurred considerable risk, which, I think, we were bound to incur in order to maintain the peace of this country. The only other case I shall mention is a very important one, to which great weight should be attached—the case of the Shenandoah. The Shenandoah was a regular merchant vessel, and was sold by the person then the owner of it to some person who was engaged for the Confederates. It left this country without any arms, equipment, or furnishing whatever, other than those of a merchant ship; and it was not till a month afterwards that we heard it had arrived off the port of Funchal, and was being armed by other vessels. Now, it seems to me that this is a very important question, not only as regards the conduct of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, but as regards our future legislation. There are two things we may very well do in order to preserve our neutrality. You may prevent troops from being drilled or recruited on your own soil with a view to enter the service of a belligerent Power. That you may do by the exercise of your authority. What you cannot do is to prevent individuals from going to a foreign country, as the Earl of Dundonald did, and engaging in the service of a belligerent. So likewise with regard to vessels. If a vessel is being armed, or fitted as a vessel of war, in one of your ports, you may give power—and I should be very glad to see such power given—to the Executive Government to detain that vessel upon the order of the Judge of the Admiralty Court, or of some competent authority, unless the Government is fully satisfied that the vessel is not intended for use against any State friendly to Her Majesty. That you can do. But, suppose that a vessel is simply a merchant vessel, that you have no information of the purpose for which she is destined, that no one has told you that the owner has got a secret engagement, how can you prevent that vessel from going to some far distant neutral port, and there being armed against some Power in amity with Her Majesty? I will put a case that might occur in the future, and that might have occurred some months ago. There was an apprehension at one time, and a very natural apprehension, that, on account of Luxemburg or some other cause, France and Prussia would engage in war. It was well known that the French naval forces were vastly superior to those of Prussia, and it was believed that, in a short time, the ports of Prussia and her allies would be blockaded. But what was to prevent the Prussian Government from entering into contract with a merchant at Amsterdam for the building of steam vessels of speed and strength in English ports on the Thames, the Clyde, and the Mersey, those steamers afterwards going to certain neutral ports without arms in order to meet other vessels furnished with arms and equipment? I submit to your Lordships and to the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, who is a Member of the Commission on the Neutrality Laws, that it would be carrying our neutral obligations to a very dangerous length if we were to say that, where an unarmed merchant vessel sailed to a foreign port and was there armed, the Power in whose ports she was built became responsible for any of her subsequent acts. I own it seems to me that we have already in spirit gone far enough in our Neutrality Laws. It would be a wise precaution to give greater power to the Executive Government over armed vessels, or vessels fitted out as vessels of war, attempting to leave our coast for belligerent purposes. But if we were by treaty or by law of the realm to impose such further obligations as I have just mentioned, and if we, as a shipbuilding country, engaged to stop unarmed vessels from leaving our coast, that would be a dangerous obligation into which Her Majesty's Government ought not to enter. Another suggestion has been made with regard to the Alabama claims and our differences with America. It is understood to have been made by Mr. Seward—namely, that every other question with regard to which we have had controversies with the United States as to the meaning of treaties and the occupation of territory should be considered at the same time, and that we should come, if possible, to some general agreement on all these points. I believe that to be a very wise and practicable suggestion, and at all events we should endeavour to settle all these matters. My Lords, I will now ask the noble and learned Lord how soon the Report of the Neutrality Commission will be laid on the table?

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I shall endeavour, in the first place, to answer the Question which the noble Earl has put to me. This time last year, as the noble Earl has stated, a Royal Commission was appointed to inquire into and consider the character, working, and effect of the Laws of this Realm available for the enforcement of Neutrality during the existence of hostilities in other States with whom Her Majesty is at peace; and further to report what, if any, change ought to be made to give them increased efficiency and bring them into full conformity with Her Majesty's International obligations. That Commission was composed, among others, of a Member of your Lordships' House—Lord Houghton; Dr. Lushington (the late Judge of the Admiralty Court); Sir William Erle, Mr. Baron Bramwell, Sir R. Phillimore, Sir Roundell Palmer, the present Queen's Advocate, Sir Travers Twiss; Mr. Vernon Harcourt, Mr. Baring, Mr. Gregory, and Mr. Forster. I also had the honour of serving upon it, and we had the great advantage of being presided over in our deliberations by the sagacity and experience of another Member of your Lordships' House—Lord Cranworth. I think your Lordships will be of opinion that this Commission has not lost any time. It was appointed just a year ago; and it was composed of members whose occupations in other respects were very ressing. Notwithstanding that, we have held something like twenty-five meetings, and I am happy to say we have agreed—I think I may say unanimously—upon our report. It is on the point of being presented to Her Majesty, and after that no doubt it will be laid in the usual way before your Lordships. As to the views of that Commission, it would be obviously improper for me to say a word. I may, however, express a hope that when the recommendations of that Commission are known, if it should be the pleasure of Parliament to adopt them in the shape of legislation, I trust that many, if not all, the difficulties and embarrassments which have arisen in times past may easily for the future be avoided. The other question put by the noble Earl is as to any Correspondence which may have taken place between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of the United States in reference to the Alabama and other claims. There is no Correspondence subsequent to that which has been already laid before Parliament by my noble Friend the Secretary of State. Beyond this I hope the noble Earl will not consider I am wanting in any courtesy or respect for him if I decline to follow him into the somewhat large and difficult field upon which he has entered. I feel quite satisfied—as I am sure your Lordships do—that when the noble Earl, who was at the head of the Foreign Office, felt it to be his duty to decline the arbitration for the settlement of these claims proposed by the United States, he acted from a high sense of public duty. I think you will be of opinion that, in the progress of public sentiment upon this subject, and as time went on and public prejudice and passion much abated, my noble Friend the present Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs did that which was eminently desirable for the maintenance of good relations between this country and the United States when he consented, or proposed, to refer to arbitration the question of these claims. If I rightly understand the noble Earl, the objections or doubts which he suggested as to arbitration of that kind were really only two. The noble Earl, as I understood him, said that the case upon our side as regards these claims was an extremely clear one; and that we were not chargeable in any way or manner in which the Government of the United States contended we were chargeable. It is no reason for declining arbitration that you have an extremely good case to submit to the arbitrators. On the contrary, I think that would be rather a reason why we should not shrink from having the case alleged against us referred to a tribunal of that kind. The other objection which the noble Earl mentioned was this—he said there was a controversy on a matter of fact at the very commencement of the claim which was made by the American Government. The noble Earl stated very accurately that Mr. Adams had contended that armed ships had left the ports of this country; whereas Lord Clarendon had taken issue on that point, and had denied that any ships which could be properly so described had left the ports of this country. Questions of fact are just as necessary to be referred to arbitration as questions of law. I should desire to know how a question of fact of that kind, asserted on one side and disputed on the other, is to be determined, unless you are able to evoke the aid of some independent arbiter or tribunal, who will decide the fact as well as he will decide the law. I think, therefore, none of these grounds could afford any reason why we should decline arbitration. I do not desire to say more with regard to the state of the negotiations than to remind your Lordships exactly how they now stand. As the noble Lord the Secretary of State said elsewhere, we have now conceded that which, in the first instance, the American Government required—that is to say, that there shall be arbitration as to the liability of the Government of this country with regard to the claims in question. But beyond that, and since that concession on our part, the American Government, through their Foreign Minister, have made a further demand, and they require now not merely that we shall refer to the arbitrator whether this country is liable in respect of these claims; but also that it shall be referred to the arbitrator, as a matter to be decided, whether this country acted properly or improperly in recognizing the seceding Southern States as belligerents at the time this country so recognized them. In answer to that demand, the argument of my noble Friend has been so simple, and I venture to say so conclusive, that in a very few sentences I will remind your Lordships of it. My noble Friend contended, in the first place, that that question is altogether irrelevant to the claims arising out of the case of the Alabama and of other ships, and irrelevant for this reason: it has never been disputed on either side that there was a time at which, beyond all doubt, the recognition of the Southern States as belligerents must have been proper and necessary on the part of this country. If we take that time — it matters little whether it be a month sooner or later—about the month of July, or the date of the battle of Bull's Run, then it would be many months before the time at which the Alabama left this country, which happened in the April following. In the next place, my noble Friend has contended that, according to the principles of International Law, according to all authorities on International Law, according to the authorities recognized by the United States Government itself, the question whether a neutral Power shall, at any particular time, recognize a state of war between two Powers which are actually at war, is a matter entirely to be decided by the neutral Power itself; and that there are no data upon which any arbitrator or independent tribunal can be called upon to pronounce whether the recognition was proper or was improper. In the third place, my noble Friend has contended—and this, perhaps, will be quite sufficient even if there were no other argument in the case — that before the Government of this country recognized the Southern States as belligerents, the Government of the United States itself had recognized the Southern States in that capacity, by declaring the blockade of their ports, which could be declared only upon the footing that a state of war existed. My noble Friend has pointed out that if the question were to be re-opened it would go further than the United States has proposed, because it would entitle us to claim compensation for all captures made by the United States Government of ships that were breaking the blockade. That is the stage at which the negotiations — I hope only for the present—have come to a halt. The noble Earl referred, in words which I am sure would find a response in the minds of all your Lordships, to the character, great eminence, and ability of the distinguished statesman who has been so long the Minister to this country of the United States, and whose departure from this country in that capacity we all, I am sure, extremely regret. I could not help being much struck by some observations made by that very eminent person a few days ago. Speaking on the subject which has now occupied your Lordships' attention, Mr. Adams is reported to have said—

"The sum of all true diplomacy is to be found in the Christian maxim of doing to your neighbour that which you would he should do to you; and where the will is good a way of arrangement is sure ultimately to be found."

My Lords, I think we have shown substantially that our will for the adjustment of this difficulty is good. I am willing to take according to the letter what Mr. Adams states of the will and inclination of the American Government. It will be strange, indeed, my Lords, if with that state of mind on both sides, an arrangement of this difficulty does not before long present itself.

LORD WESTBURY wished to offer a few observations, which, he said, would be elicited by the regret he felt that these negotiations for arbitration had been suspended for a time. He thought they were suspended under some misapprehension of the nature of the claim intended to be brought forward by the United States. It was extremely desirable to ascertain with accuracy what ought to be the condition of the arbitration. In the discussion of this matter we often heard the phrases "International Law" and "breach of International Law." No word could be more inappropriate to express the mutual obligations between nations of equal rank and power than the word "law," for there was no law whatever. There was no sanction or any power of this country judicially to inflict punishment for breaches of the so-called law. There were, however, certain rules which had been agreed to by civilized nations, and which derived their authority and force merely from the consents of their Governments, but that was by no means law. Throughout the whole of these discussions false notions were incidentally suggested by the use of the phrase "International Law." There was one rule of conduct which undoubtedly civilized nations had mutually agreed to observe, and it was that the territory of a neutral should not be the basis of military operations by one of two belligerents against the other. In speaking of the base of operations he must to a certain degree differ from the noble Earl. It was not a question whether armed ships had actually left our shores; but it was a question whether ships, with a view to war, had been built in our ports by one of two belligerents. They need not have been armed; but if they had been laid down and built with a view to warlike operations by one of two belligerents, and this was knowingly permitted to be done by a neutral

Power, it was unquestionably a breach of neutrality. Now, what was the obligation of a neutral Power? Its obligation could be no more than that it should use the laws and institutions of its own country in order to prevent a breach of its neutrality. It could not be called upon to do any more. If there were any grounds of complaint it ought to be shown that the neutral had by its own laws and institutions the power to prevent the subject of that complaint. This was the doctrine laid down by the United States in their disputes with Portugal. They alleged that they had, bona fide and with sincerity, used their own laws and institutions to the utmost in order to prevent any breach of their neutrality. Indeed, the animus with which the neutral Powers acted was the only true criterion. The neutral Power might be mistaken; it might omit to do something which ought to be done, or direct something to be done which ought not to be done; but the question was whether, from beginning to end, it had acted with sincerity and with a real desire to promote and preserve a spirit of neutrality? A neutral could never be required to do more. Possibly, one nation might have a right to make domiciliary visits, and to search for and take possession of papers; but a country having that power could not complain of a country which did not possess it, for not using such means of discovering whether or not a breach of neutrality was mediated. He wished these observations to be applied to the demands made by Mr. Seward, and the manner in which they had been met by the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. The ultimate issue of the Correspondence—if he correctly understood his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack—was this:—Mr. Seward said, “I will insist in the reference that you did wrong, and that you acted injudiciously and without proper information in recognizing the Confederate States as a belligerent Power.” Now, it was quite preposterous to suppose that Mr. Seward meant to contradict himself. The object of the reference was to obtain compensation for breaches of our neutrality; but when Mr. Seward issued his own proclamation there had unquestionably been attempts to break the blockade on the part of the merchant vessels. Mr. Seward could therefore never say that he claimed compensation in respect of our proclamation of neutrality, involving, as it did, a recognition of the Confederate States as belligerents; but what he meant was this—he said in effect:—“Whether you were a sincere and loyal neutral is the question in dispute, and that must be judged from a view of the whole of your conduct. I do not mean to put it merely upon the particular transaction relative to the Alabama. I insist upon it in that case undoubtedly; but I contend that from beginning to end you had an undue preference and predilection for the Confederate States; that you were, therefore, not loyal in your neutrality; and I appeal to the precipitancy with which you issued your Proclamation, thereby involving a recognition of the Confederate States as a belligerent Power, as a proof of your insincerity and want of impartial attention.” And now could we prevent him from using that document for such a purpose? How unreasonable it was to say, “When you go into arbitration you shall not use a particular document, even as an argument upon the question whether there was sincere neutrality or not.” He (Lord Westbury) should very much regret if the negotiations were broken off on a misapprehension of the meaning and intent of the American Government, and if that which was most necessary for the peace of mankind—the security of peace with the United States—was perilled by any such misapprehension. A favourite notion had always been entertained in the United States that the late war was not a civil war, but a revolt or rebellion, and very probably the United States committed a blunder in proclaiming the blockade. It was quite competent for them to have issued a proclamation prohibiting intercourse with the ports of the States whom they alleged to be in a state of revolt; but the effect of such a proclamation would simply have been that if a foreign ship had attempted to enter one of those ports, the United States vessels could not have captured and condemned her, but could only have obstructed her progress and turned her away. Instead of adopting such a course, however, Mr. Seward issued a proclamation of blockade, and by that proclamation necessarily placed the Confederate States in the position of belligerents, and all the other countries in the world in a position of neutrality. Mr. Seward, indeed, admitted this; but complained of a breach of neutrality, and held that that must depend, not upon single transactions, but upon the inferences to be derived from the whole of our conduct. Now, suppose the case of the Alabama were being argued before an arbitrator, his noble Friend (Earl Russell) might say, "Why, the Alabama was permitted to escape simply by an accident, over which I had no control; and you ought not to judge of my conduct by one accidental default, but by the spirit I manifested when I seized the Alexandra and the rams, and placed myself in peril from the Conservative Opposition, which nearly brought the Government into a minority." Now, if it would be reasonable for his noble Friend to use that topic, derived from the general conduct of the English Government, as touching the particular case of the Alabama, surely it was equally reasonable for Mr. Seward to apply his argument to any particular fact connected with the conduct of this country, and to draw from it the opposite conclusion as to the sincerity of our neutrality. While, therefore, he (Lord Westbury) cordially concurred in all that had been done by the noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Office, he regretted that the noble Lord should have taken one matter up from a mistaken point of view, and should have supposed that Mr. Seward intended to make a demand for pecuniary damages in respect of our Proclamation, instead of using it as a special argument in support of his claim for damages in other particulars. He deeply lamented that the negotiations should have terminated upon that misconception. One point had arisen in the course of the debate to which it was proper to refer—namely, the desirability of effecting an alteration in the existing law. In his opinion no alteration of the law would be effectual unless it extended to this—that no armed vessel, and no vessel obviously built for warlike purposes by any private individual in this country, should be permitted to leave our harbours unless upon security, or upon the fact being clearly ascertained, that she was bond fide the property of some other Power not being a belligerent. In conclusion, he would say that he had only desired for a moment to point out the view of the case which he trusted would be considered by the noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Office, and to express his hope that the negotiations for an arbitration would be resumed, and would shortly be brought to the condition of a final reference.

Lord Westbury

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he wished to correct two errors into which his noble and learned Friend (Lord Westbury) had inadvertently fallen, and which, if left unnoticed, might lead to misunderstanding elsewhere. His noble and learned Friend had placed a very ingenious construction upon the demand made by the United States Government through Mr. Seward. All he could say was that the explanation of that demand which his noble and learned Friend had given had never been given by Mr. Seward himself; and he thought, for this very good reason, that if all that was desired was that the premature recognition, as it was called, of the state of belligerency should be made a topic before the arbitrator, or a matter of evidence going to support the claim raised in other respects, that was not a thing to be stipulated for beforehand; it was a question for the arbitrator. The arbitrator would be the judge of what evidence was relevant and what was not. It was for the arbitrator to decide what evidence he would admit; and it was, he thought, a thing unheard of that a reference to arbitration should contain a definition of the evidence to be adduced before the arbitrator. The other error which he desired to correct was this:—His noble and learned Friend had spoken of the negotiations as having been broken off. The exact point at which they stood was this. Mr. Seward's last communication contained a proposal, couched in somewhat general terms, that there should be a Commission to inquire into all claims. Upon that his noble Friend the Foreign Secretary requested Mr. Seward to develop more accurately what he designed or aimed at by such a Commission; and the negotiations, he thought, were at present waiting for a communication from Mr. Seward on that score.

LORD WESTBURY explained. What he had said was this, that in the last despatch of the Foreign Secretary he stipulated that all question of precipitancy should be excluded from the consideration of the arbitrator. If that were so, it could not be admitted either as a matter of evidence, or as a general topic.

EARL RUSSELL was also understood to explain that he had not objected to the Foreign Secretary having assented to arbitration; but to his having assented to an arbitration that was so vague.

Motion (by Leave of the House) withdrawn.

House adjourned at Seven o'clock, till To-morrow, Twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, March 27, 1868.

MINUTES.]—NEW MEMBER SWORN—Samuel Carter, esquire, for Coventry.

SELECT COMMITTEE—On Scientific Instruction nominated; on Extradition nominated.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee—ARMY ESTIMATES.

Resolutions [March 26] reported.

PUBLIC BILLS—Resolutions in Committee—Land Writs Registration (Scotland) [Salaries, &c.]; Election Petitions and Corrupt Practices at Elections [Salaries, &c.]; Industrial Schools (Ireland) [Expenses].

Third Reading—Consolidated Fund (£6,000,000)*; London Coal and Wine Duties Continuance* [43], and passed.

PRIVATE BILL LEGISLATION.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

MR. STEPHEN CAVE said: It is with great regret that I feel myself obliged, for the first time since I have had a seat in this House, to intrude myself on the House with regard to a personal matter. It will be in the recollection of many hon. Members that on Tuesday last I made a few remarks on the amalgamation of railways, in discussing the Resolutions of the Chairman of Committees with reference to competition. No exception was taken to those remarks by any Member of the House; but it has been reported to me that, on the following morning, the hon. Baronet the Member for the Flint Boroughs (Sir John Hanmer), who is Chairman of the Committee on a group of Railway Bills, among which is the Amalgamation Bill of the Brighton and other railways, publicly made use of the following expressions in the Committee-room:—

“A matter has happened in the House which I think extremely improper. It happened at five o'clock, when the House was dead sick of private business, and therefore, although it was my business to answer the Vice President of the Board of Trade, I did not do so. The Vice President of the Board of Trade, in my opinion, gave a most improper expression of opinion upon the subject of a question now pending before this Committee, which he had no business to do, even if he had been a private Member, still less an official Member. Speaking on the question of competition, he expressed his opinion against the monopoly of railways. This was a question which was legitimately before the House; but he said there was another monopoly—that is to say, these amalgamations—and he said there was a gigantic scheme. His observations went to show that it was a very prejudicial thing, that it was now pending—and so on. He had no business to express that opinion.”

There was more to the same effect, with which, after what has since passed, I will not trouble the House. Now, Sir, these are very strong expressions, especially from one sitting in a judicial capacity, and I cannot deny that they have given me great pain; but the hon. Baronet has assured me privately—and he will no doubt repeat it publicly—that he had no intention of saying anything personally offensive to myself, and that he is willing, as far as expressions go, to withdraw everything that has such an appearance. I cannot hesitate to accept this assurance, and to dismiss so much of the subject altogether from my mind. I cannot, however, help thinking it unfortunate that the hon. Baronet did not express his opinion in the House before those in whose minds what I had said was fresh, instead of doing so on the following day to a mixed audience in my absence—when I was, of course, unable to justify myself or to offer any explanations. I do not, however, wish to dwell upon this point. But as the hon. Baronet has told me, as frankly as he withdrew the form of his charge against me, that he adheres to the substance of it—which is, after all, the most serious part of the question—it is incumbent on me to clear myself if I can from these imputations, which, if deserved, would prove me unfit for the office I hold, and even for a seat in this House. Several months ago my attention was officially directed to the effect of railway amalgamations. Complaints reached the office from various quarters of increased charges and diminished accommodation, and it was suggested that the Board of Trade, which has no power of active interference in these matters, would not be doing its duty if it did not warn Parliament that monopoly was rapidly replacing competition, and that it behoved the House, in which the power really was, to take care that the public did not suffer by the change. Having spoken to the Chairman of Committees, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London (Mr. Goschen), and other Members, who all concurred in this view, I proposed to take advantage of the Resolutions on Competition of my hon. Friend the Chairman of Committees (Mr. Dodson), and to go somewhat into the details of Bills of this Session. But, unfortunately, the discussion of these Resolutions was delayed until some of the Bills were before Committees. I then felt that it would be scarcely right to refer to the details of these measures, and therefore confined my remarks to the general question, carefully avoiding any observation on the merits of particular schemes. I will read the only passage which can have reference to the Bill before the hon. Baronet's Committee—

"This year the number of Bills was only fifteen, but among them was a gigantic scheme affecting a large district in the South of England."

This is absolutely all; and so guarded was I that I mentioned no name, and, as it happens, there is another scheme to which the description would apply, though I will not deny that the first was in my mind. The rest of my speech has reference to the general question, and even there I do not express myself against amalgamations; but that regulations for periodical future revision should be framed, and that certain Standing Orders should be amended, which could not, of course, affect Bills now in Committee. The House was full. The noble Chairman of the Standing Orders Committee followed me. The Member for Stockport (Mr. Watkin) spoke. The Member for Wick (Mr. Laing) was present; both always ready and watchful, and both interested; but it did not apparently occur to them, or to any one else, that I had the absurd intention of biassing the Committee. And I presume the House will not accept the doctrine, for it really comes to this—that Members are to be debarred from discussing general subjects, because the arguments may bear indirectly on some private Bill. Sir, this is the tenth year in which I have had the honour of a seat in this House, during that period I have frequently taken part in the business of Parliament. Up to this moment no exception has ever been taken to the propriety of a single syllable I have uttered in this House; and I confidently hope that the House will acquit me of having deserved it on this occasion.

SIR JOHN HANMER: In the first place, I beg leave to express the satisfaction which it gives me—as it would to any other Gentleman—to make any amends to the right hon. Gentleman for anything in which he may have thought that I conducted myself to him with less courtesy than he deserved. It is only justice to myself to state that, the very moment I learnt that objection had been taken by him to my remarks, I sought him out and stated, what he has very correctly repeated, that, if there was anything in the form of what I said which was offensive or hurtful to his feelings, it would give me pleasure and satisfaction to withdraw it—

I should do so most heartily and readily—but, at the same time, if I were asked whether I adhered to the opinion I had expressed? I said I do adhere to it, and there is no reason why I should not do so. I do adhere to it in the plainest and most direct manner, and I am prepared to defend everything I said, barring the form, and anything that may have offended him. It so happened that the other afternoon there was a long debate in the House on the question raised by the hon. Gentleman the Chairman of Committees. The House was tired and impatient on the subject—so impatient that it would not listen to what the noble Lord the Member for the East Riding (Lord Hotham) wished to say; who, of all others, had the best right to be heard on such a subject. For me, therefore, to get up at a time when the House was necessarily anxious to proceed to other business of great importance would have been perfectly futile. Besides, I did not happen to be sitting in the line of sight, and your eye, Sir, would naturally have fallen on some other Member. But I had a reason for what I did say next day before the Committee of which I happened to be Chairman. That Committee has got before it a most perplexed, troublesome, difficult, and arduous question. The difficulty of it may be estimated when I say that I was credibly informed yesterday that, notwithstanding all the pains I have taken, with the assistance of the Referee, to keep the proceedings within due bounds, the inquiry cost the moderate rate of three and a half guineas a minute. I, hoping to save expense, had suggested to one of the counsel who appeared before me the day before, that I thought he need not call witnesses from other systems of united railways, because really the Committee were perfectly aware of everything that could be said on the subject. But I said so-and-so took place the night before in the House of Commons; such-and-such doctrines were, according to my understanding of them, expressed by the right hon. Gentleman the Vice-President of the Board of Trade, and therefore it may be for you now to consider whether you will or no be content with the evidence as it stands, or call other witnesses. That was my sole reason for saying what I did, and I had no wish to cavil at what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman. At the same time I do fairly own I did feel very greatly aggrieved by the right hon. Gentleman's speech, and he will pardon me when I say he has not altogether recollected the whole of it. A sentence has been omitted that had a very great bearing upon the question. I have been a Member of this House for a very great number of years; and certainly, for a long time while I was a Member, whenever a question was sent to a Committee upstairs it was considered exceedingly wrong in any private Member to allude to it in any way, still more for any official Member to do so. I can remember the time when official Members always left the House when there was any question pending about the private business. But of all official Members, for the Vice-President of the Board of Trade to express an opinion when a question was pending before a Committee which might prejudice the decision of that Committee—he, I think, is about the last Gentleman that should do so. But I express that opinion with the greatest courtesy to the right hon. Gentleman. We agree to differ. He holds one opinion; I hold another. The right hon. Gentleman certainly did perplex and trouble my waters very much indeed. We have a very difficult question to decide, and whichever way we decide it I feel very little doubt that something more will be heard about it when the Report is made. When the Report is brought up, if the right hon. Gentleman thinks fit to object to the Bill in its reported state, well and good; he will then have a proper opportunity of doing so; but I do not think that the time he selected to call in question the matters before the Committee was the right time for doing so. The right hon. Gentleman said that he objected to railway monopoly. Now, upon the subject of railway monopoly, which had been discussed for a long time before, I could have said a great deal; but not wishing to inflict my speeches upon the House unnecessarily, I said nothing about it. But the right hon. Gentleman went on to say that, while he objected to monopoly as far as it rested upon competition, there was another kind of monopoly which arose out of amalgamation, and that he had no objection on principle to amalgamation. But, after having declared that, the right hon. Gentleman went to say that there was a gigantic scheme of amalgamation going forward in the South of England, and his speech certainly led us to believe that he objected to that scheme. But why and upon what principle did he object to it? He had said just before that he did not object to the principle of amalgamation, and therefore he could not object to the scheme upon that ground.

Sir John Hanmer

MR. STEPHEN CAVE: My statement with regard to amalgamation followed what I said with regard to this scheme.

SIR JOHN HANMER: Well, it all comes to the same end. At all events, the right hon. Gentleman uttered the words before I did. I thought that the right hon. Gentleman, who is connected by representation with that part of England, was arguing the matter upon some particular and local ground, which I thought he ought not to have done; and for the reasons I have given, I told the counsel before the Committee what I did the next morning. That is the long and the short of it. I willingly withdraw any expression that may have hurt the right hon. Gentleman; still I may, as I must, think that he selected the wrong time for making a statement upon this subject.

ESTABLISHED CHURCH (IRELAND).

NOTICE OF AMENDMENT.

LORD STANLEY: I beg to give Notice that, on Monday next, on the Motion for going into Committee upon the Irish Church Establishment, I shall move an Amendment in the following words:—

“That this House, while admitting that considerable modifications in the Temporalities of the United Church in Ireland may, after the pending inquiry, appear to be expedient, is of opinion that any proposition tending to the disestablishment or the disendowment of that Church ought to be reserved for the decision of a new Parliament.”

MR. GLADSTONE: In order that there may be no misapprehension upon this most important subject, I wish to know whether I am correct in understanding the noble Lord to say that he will make his Motion in the form of an Amendment in Committee; or, whether he intends to move it as an Amendment upon the Motion “That the Speaker do now leave the Chair,” or, to speak more accurately, upon the Motion “That this House do immediately resolve itself into a Committee.”

LORD STANLEY: I shall move it as an Amendment upon the Motion, “That the House do immediately resolve itself into a Committee.”

THE PARIS EXHIBITION.—QUESTION.

MR. BAYLEY POTTER said, he wished to ask the Vice President of the Privy Council, Whether he is willing to give a Return of all sums expended on account of the Paris Exhibition, and the names and offices held by the persons receiving such sums?

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, the Returns would be laid on the table of the House shortly.

METROPOLIS—DEPTFORD CREEK OUTFALLS.—QUESTION.

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he is aware of the intention of the Metropolitan Board of Works to open new Sewer Outfalls into Deptford Creek, in opposition to the remonstrances of the Officer of Health of the district, who considers the proposed works dangerous to the health of the neighbourhood; and, if such Outfall is not a contravention of the spirit of the Main Drainage Act?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, in reply, that he was informed by the Board of Works that they had already a sewer outfall from the Southern High and Middle Level Sewers, which only acted in very heavy storms. They proposed to construct a storm overflow from the low level sewers that would only operate when there were very heavy floods, and the sewers had been completely washed clean. No decision would be arrived at upon the subject until after next Saturday. In the event of the outfalls being made, they would occasion no inconvenience, and would not in any way controvert the terms of the Act.

SCOTLAND—ROADS.—QUESTION.

MR. WALDEGRAVE-LESLIE said, he wished to ask the Lord Advocate, Whether he purposes bringing in any general Road Bill for Scotland during the present Session?

THE LORD ADVOCATE, in reply, said, a general Road Bill for Scotland would affect so many complicated interests, and give rise to so much difference of feeling and opinion, that it was not his intention to introduce such a measure in the present Session.

IRELAND—THE RIVER SHANNON. QUESTION.

COLONEL FRENCH said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, When the Fish Passes on the weirs on the River Shannon, so long promised, are to be built by the Board of Works?

THE EARL OF MAYO replied that he understood that the Fisheries Commission had recommended the works to be executed; and that, in all probability, those recommendations would shortly be carried out by the Board of Works.

ARMY—COMMISSIONS.—QUESTION.

SIR THOMAS LLOYD said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether the authorities of the Horse Guards and War Office consider the refusal by a minor to pay the full amount of a loan, contracted at an extravagant rate of interest during his minority, a sufficient reason for refusing a Commission in the Army?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON, in reply, said, the Question of the hon. Member was a very general one, and he was not aware whether it was intended to apply to any particular case. The only answer he could give to the inquiry was that the power of determining any such case as that put by the hon. Member would rest entirely with the Commander-in-Chief.

POST OFFICE—THE SOUTHERN DISTRICT.—QUESTION.

MR. LOCKE said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether he has received any information of the intended abolition of the Southern District Post Office; whether such abolition will not considerably lessen the number of deliveries over the district; and, whether the inhabitants have received any notice thereof; and, if so, when?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, in reply, that it was intended to abolish the Southern Postal District as a separate district, one portion of it being transferred to the South-Western district, and the remainder to the South-Eastern, by which change a saving of £2,000 per annum would be effected in the management. In reply to the second part of the hon. Member's Question, he had to state that the proposed abolition would not lessen the number of deliveries in the district, except in the neighbourhood of Kennington, where the number of daily deliveries would be reduced from twelve to eight, and the number of collections from twelve to nine, as was the case in districts similarly situated such as Kensington and Brompton. In reply to the third part of the Question, he had to state that the inhabitants of that part of the district which was to be transferred to the South-Western district had received notice of the proposed change last month, and those residing in the remainder of the district were now being served with a similar notice.

REPRESENTATION OF BRISTOL.

QUESTION.

MR. NEVILLE-GRENVILLE said, he would beg to ask the hon. Member for Cambridge, Whether he intends to bring before the notice of this House a Petition presented by him, from nearly 7,000 inhabitants of the city and county of Bristol, praying the House to declare one of the Seats vacant, and for the issue of a new Writ?

MR. POWELL: Sir, having carefully considered, so far as I am able to do, the circumstances of this case; and having the fullest confidence that the hon. Member referred to in the Question will act under a due sense of his heavy responsibility towards the constituency which returned him to Parliament, under the full assurance that he was and would continue to be capable of sitting and voting in this House, I do not propose to ask the House to refer the subject-matter of this petition to a Committee; but I hope I may be allowed to add, by way of a more complete answer to his Question, this remark—that if an hon. Member who is proved to be a bankrupt does sit and vote in the House of Commons, then a state of affairs has arisen which is clearly provided for by the Statutes of the Realm and the established usage of Parliament.

WAR IN BRAZIL.—QUESTION.

MR. HORSMAN said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Government will alone, or in concert with the Government of the United States, have made or intend to make any endeavours to bring about a peaceable settlement of the war between Brazil and its allies and the State of Paraguay?

MR. STANLEY: Sir, Her Majesty's Government sincerely regret the continuance of this war between Brazil and her allies on the one side, and Paraguay on the other. We believe that it is even more senseless and more purposeless than wars generally are; and we cannot but see that it is inflicting enormous injury upon all the countries engaged in it. At the same time

Mr. Sclater-Booth

I doubt the expediency, as a general rule, of offering mediation when it is not asked for; and I do not think that mediation would, if offered at the present time, be likely to be accepted. But if, at any time, the mediation of Her Majesty's Government should be desired, or should have any reasonable prospect of success, we should almost, as a matter of course, do what is in our power to bring about a reconciliation, and we should be equally prepared to do that either acting singly or in concert with any Power that may be inclined to help us.

ARMY—TROOPS IN THE MAURITIUS.

QUESTION.

MR. OTWAY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, a Question with regard to an Answer which he had given two or three days since. The right hon. Gentleman, in answer to a Question as to, whether steps would be taken to remove a Regiment stationed at Mauritius during the prevalence of the epidemic at present raging in that island, was reported as having said that the removal was a question entirely for the decision of the Commander-in-Chief. He desired to know whether the right hon. Gentleman had so expressed himself, and whether he adopted those views?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, that the report of the portion of the Answer referred to by the hon. Gentleman was not accurate. What he (Sir John Pakington) had stated was that the Commander-in-Chief had sent out orders for a very strict inquiry into the circumstances under which the regiment had been permitted to land, considering the state of the health of the island. But, with reference to the subject more particularly referred to by the hon. Gentleman, he stated that he himself had sent out orders last year, giving full power and discretion to the Officer in command to remove the troops whenever in his judgment the health of the Island should render such a step advisable, and to prevent mistakes he had repeated those orders and again sent them out.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

COMPULSORY PILOTAGE.

RESOLUTION.

MR. CANDLISH : Sir, although the Question which I propose to bring before the notice of the House is not one to excite any very general interest, it is, nevertheless, a question of no small importance. It affects and stands in connection with all our sailors, numbering hundreds of thousands, and with the whole of our population travelling by sea, numbering millions. The registered tonnage of the United Kingdom in the year 1866 amounted to 5,692,010 tons; the value of our exports and imports for the same period was £534,000,000; and the entries and clearances at the Custom House, in our foreign trade, were about 31,000,000 tons, and in our coasting trade a similar amount. All those persons and all those interests—those sailors and travellers by sea; owners of vessels and owners of goods exported and imported—are all materially affected by the condition of our pilotage laws; and, if the House will favour me with its attention for a few minutes, I think I shall be able to show that it is expedient—nay, that it is pressingly necessary—that these laws should be altered and improved forthwith. At present there are about fifty or sixty pilotage authorities existing around the coast of the United Kingdom; that is to say, pilotage authorities, all of whom possess some amount, more or less, of legislative power; and the laws which are in operation in the several districts are very nearly as various as the districts are numerous. From perfectly free and voluntary pilotage—in other words, between places where the captains and owners of ships have it in their discretion either to accept or reject the pilot's services, to other places where it is pretty nearly altogether compulsory—all intermediate conditions prevail. This want of uniformity—this variety in the laws of the country governing the pilotage system around our coast—is productive of the greatest possible inconvenience, and the anomalies which result from this variation of law are most embarrassing to the Mercantile Marine and shipping generally of this country, but more particularly so within the limits of the jurisdiction of the Deptford Trinity House, which is the great authority on pilotage. That body governs the river Thames and all the approaches to it, north and south. It governs besides not a few of our outports; and the general principle which lies at the basis of its government is that vessels navigating its waters must have a pilot on board, and be navigated under the authority and by the direction of a pilot. But it so happens that exceptions to this first principle are pretty nearly as numerous as the cases to which the principle itself is applied. The Merchant Shipping Act passed in 1854 is a consolidating Act. It sets out the exemptions from compulsory pilotage, and, with the permission of the House, I will read them. Section 379 says—

“The following Ships, when not carrying Passengers, shall be exempted from compulsory pilotage in the London district and in the Trinity House Outport districts; that is to say—1. Ships employed in the Coasting Trade of the United Kingdom. 2. Ships of not more than 60 tons burthen. 3. Ships trading to Boulogne, or to any place in Europe north of Boulogne. 4. Ships from Guernsey, Jersey, Alderney, Sark, or Man, which are wholly laden with stone, being the produce of those islands. 5. Ships navigating within the limits of the port to which they belong. 6. Ships passing through the limits of any Pilotage district on their voyages between two places, both situate out of such limits, and not being bound to any place within such limits, nor anchoring therein.”

Now, the anomalies and absurdities which result from these exemptions are almost incredible; and, in my opinion, are discreditable to the legislation of this House. These exemptions were secured by this Act purposely, as I apprehend, to restrain the further action of the compulsory system of pilotage; the policy of the Parliament of 1854 being to restrain compulsory pilotage as much as may be, and henceforth to perpetuate all the pilotage which, up to that time, had been voluntary. Just let me show the House the anomalies which result from the first exemption set out in this clause, “Ships employed in the Coasting Trade of the United Kingdom,” by reference to an example. A small vessel, say of 61 tons burthen, coming through the Downs from a port on the coast of France or Spain, is subjected to compulsory pilotage, and must take a pilot; while a large ship of 300 or 600 tons, or any larger size, and whatever her value, coming from an English port—say, on the South coast, or from Swansea or Bristol—and navigating the same waters as the 61-ton ship, notwithstanding her increased size and value; and the greater necessity for additional precautions in navigating her, is exempted from compulsory pilotage, and may take a pilot or not, as her commander may think most expedient. With the permission of the House, I will quote an au-authority well known to Members of this House—a Gentleman who was at the Board of Trade when a Committee was appointed to inquire into the Laws which regulate our Merchant Shipping in 1860. I allude to Captain—now, I believe, Admiral Sullivan. In reply to a question, he gave the following instance of this glaring anomaly:—

“A man coming from a foreign port, with a little vessel of 60 or 70 tons—though perfectly competent to take a vessel of any size through the navigation of the Thames and the Downs—must, because she comes from a foreign port, if she is 61 tons, take a pilot; but if he was going upon the coasting trade in a vessel of 1,000 tons, though he was much more incompetent, he would be allowed to navigate the whole of the reaches of the Thames.”

It may be supposed that a policy which allows the captain of a vessel engaged in the coasting trade to navigate his vessel without a pilot is in favour of the coasting as against the foreign trade; but there is also the same exemption for ships in some foreign trades; for whilst ships coming through the Downs to the river Thames must have a pilot on board, ships coming from a port north of Boulogne—Calais, Dieppe, Ostend, Antwerp, Hamburgh, St. Petersburg, Archangel, or any port in the Baltic—are exempted from compulsory pilotage, and the captains have it in their discretion to take a pilot or not on board, as may seem most expedient. It is perfectly clear to me that the policy of enforcing pilotage, as a protection for property, is no ground whatever for exempting one ship from pilotage, whilst another ship navigating the same waters is compelled to take a pilot on board. Now, with regard to the exemption in favour of the vessels of Guernsey, Jersey, Alderney, Sark, and Man, laden with stones, the produce of those islands, is it possible for any man to say, with reason or sense, that there is any greater necessity for taking a pilot on board when a vessel is laden with stone than when laden with fruit or any other cargo, the produce of the islands? Another anomaly resulting from the compulsory system of pilotage occurs at Falmouth, at which port vessels are very much in the habit of calling for orders. Now, a ship coming from a port in the Mediterranean, and calling at Falmouth for orders, is compelled to take a pilot on board, though she only anchors in the roads; whilst the ship which puts in from stress of weather is not compelled to take any pilot at all. One would think that the state of the weather would have something to do with the question whether a pilot should be taken or not; but the fact is, that when the weather is fine, and the vessel merely comes in for orders, she is compelled to take a pilot, whilst, if she is driven in by the weather, and is, consequently, more or less in danger, she is not compelled to take a pilot. Some of the cases in the Bristol Channel are very striking. In some ports pilotage is quite voluntary, in others altogether compulsory. Thus at Bristol it is compulsory; on the other hand, at Gloucester it is voluntary. A ship coming up the Bristol Channel to Bristol must take a Bristol Channel pilot; but a ship coming through the same waters, if bound to Gloucester instead of Bristol, is free to take a pilot or not, as she pleases. It is perfectly clear, then, in the words of another able witness who was examined before the Committee which sat in the year 1860, that there is no sense or reason in this arbitrary use of pilotage in some cases, and leaving it altogether free in others. Then there is another strange anomaly. The first exemption is that of vessels engaged in the coasting trade; but the question is, What is the coasting trade? Any man of common sense would say that a ship going from London to a port in the North of England, for instance, would be employed in the coasting trade. But that is not necessarily the case. That depends upon what her cargo may happen to be composed of. So that the safety of the ship does not depend upon the question of what water she is passing through; but upon where the cargo came from which she is carrying. A coasting vessel is exempt from taking a pilot on board; but a vessel, say from a Mediterranean port, which discharges a part of her cargo in London, and carries the remainder to a port in the North, is called a foreign ship, and is compelled to take a pilot from London to Orfordness. And the absurdity of this will appear when I mention that, if this small part of her cargo is taken out of the vessel and put into a lighter, and then back again into the vessel, she is not then compelled to take a pilot! These are not the only evils resulting from the operation of the law as it stands; there are also legal consequences flowing from this state of the law as to pilotage which are of an exceedingly unjust character. Under the Merchant Shipping Act which I have quoted, ships having a pilot on board in pilotage waters by compulsion of law are exempt from liability for the damage which they may occasion. Section 388 says—

“No Owner or Master of any Ship shall be answerable to any person whatever for any loss or damage occasioned by the fault or incapacity of any qualified Pilot acting in charge of such Ship within any district where the employment of such Pilot is compulsory by law.”

Now, I ask the House to look at the consequences which are likely to flow from the operation of that provision, taken in connection with the vast number of exemptions which are established by the Act I have quoted, and the subsequent Act of 1862. As I have reminded the House, all coasting vessels are exempt from the obligation to take a pilot. It follows, therefore, that any vessel having a pilot on board by compulsion of law, and running into and destroying a coasting vessel, whether she has a pilot on board or not, is not answerable if that collision and the destruction of the vessel are the fault of the pilot. Let me show the House how this comes out in actual practice. Two ships, both of the same size and description, arrive in the Thames, one from the North Sea and the other from the English Channel. They each take a pilot, and subsequently get into collision; but although the one which comes from the Channel is at fault, the other has no remedy, and cannot recover damages for the injury done her. On the other hand, if the vessel from the North runs into and damages the vessel from the South, the latter can recover. So that in the one case there is absolute immunity; whilst in the other there is complete liability. Two ships from Leith to London both take a pilot at Orfordness. One has passengers, and the other has none. They get into collision. If the one with passengers on board is in fault, the other, which has no passengers, has no remedy; whereas, if the reverse is the case, and the one without passengers is at fault, the other, having passengers on board, may recover. Should both have passengers, and both carry pilots, neither can recover against the other. Two ships bound from Havre for London take pilots at Dungeness. The master of one of them has been at the pains of passing a pilotage examination, and has a pilotage certificate. The master of the other has neglected to do so. They both take pilots, and come into collision; but the master who is best qualified, and has a pilotage certificate, is liable for the damage which he does to the other ship, whilst the least qualified master is not liable for the damage which he does. Again, a ship bound from the West takes a London pilot at Scilly or the Lizard—a very common case. For damage by collision westward of Dungeness the owner is liable. For damage done eastward of Dungeness he is not. Take next the Bristol Channel. Ships bound to or from Bristol are bound to take a pilot up and down Channel. Ships bound to or from Cardiff, Newport, and Gloucester are not. And if a Bristol ship get into collision with a Newport, Cardiff, or Gloucester ship, both having pilots on board, the Bristol ship may recover damages; but the Cardiff, Newport, or Gloucester ship cannot recover. These anomalies in the state of the law lead, therefore, to most serious results. In the river Thames great damage is often inflicted by such collisions; and yet there is no redress against the vessel at fault if she has a pilot on board. Steamers coming up the Thames with pilots on board, and running down the coasting craft or the smaller craft in the river, may do so with perfect impunity. There is no remedy for the small coasting vessels which receive the injury. Some owners are much inclined to continue the law as it stands, because of this exemption from liability; but even this security is exceedingly imperfect and unsatisfactory, and, in fact, is a broken reed; for although there may be a pilot on board by compulsion of law, the owner of the vessel is kept presumably liable for the damage inflicted, and has the onus resting upon him of proving that the damage is done through the sole fault of the pilot. In 1866 a case was tried in the Admiralty Court where the pilot and crew of a vessel were both partly in fault, and there the liability of the owner was established. The presence of the pilot on board does not, therefore, give the owner perfect security. It has been objected that, inasmuch as pilotage usages are local, it is not for Parliament to interfere with the existing arrangements, and that the local authorities should be left to manage and regulate their own affairs. It is quite true that the local authorities are resident, and that they act locally; but the effects of their action are national and universal. Their jurisdiction is local; but the consequences of its exercise are universal, and call loudly and strongly for the interposition of Parliament. The anomalies to which I have adverted arise from the want of uniformity of system, and would not exist if there were either universal compulsion or univeral freedom of pilotage. The policy of Parliament, however, and the teachings of common sense, make it impossible to re-adopt the system of universal compulsion. The only mode, therefore, of putting an end to these anomalies is by making the law uniform, and pilotage universally free. The expenses of the present system, as I was observing, are most oppressive. Experience, authorities, and sound principle all agree in proving the compulsory system to be dear, and the voluntary system to be cheap. The rates of compulsory pilotage are always higher than the rates of voluntary pilotage. The system at Cork Harbour is free, at Falmouth it is compulsory, and, at the latter place, the expense is double what it is at Cork; it is also double what it is in the Northern ports of England, where pilotage is also free. One of my constituents wrote to me about a case which came under his own notice. A vessel of 390 tons register had to pay for pilotage service, from Dungeness to London, the sum of £19 14s. 1d., although a great portion of the passage was made under team. The vessel could not get a pilot from Dungeness in consequence of its being rough weather, and she had to pay boatmen for getting into the Downs £2; for getting pilot on board, £1 10s.; pilotage to Gravesend, £11 3s. 10d.; and pilotage to London, £4 10s. 3d.—together £19 14s, or a sum quite equal to what the captain got for navigating the vessel from St. Helena. He also mentions a case which occurred when he himself was at sea; for he is now a retired ship captain, and, in this instance, he had to pay as much for pilotage from Dungeness to London as he had for wages to the Mediterranean and back again. Another effect of the compulsory system is, that it enhances the general charges upon shipping. It creates a necessity for employing 100 pilots, say where fifty would be sufficient to do the work; and the Commercial Marine has to pay for the extra fifty who are not wanted for the service. At the same time, the operation of the system is to limit the number of men for pilotage purposes to prevent competition and keep up the rates. Wherever pilotage has been free it has been cheap, and also efficient. There are no cases on record in which where pilotage is voluntary it has been found inefficient. At the Northern ports—at Cork, and other places where it is free—it is equally as efficient as at ports where it is compulsory; and the introduction of the voluntary system, leaving it optional to employ a pilot or not, has neither reduced the necessity for pilotage nor reduced the number of persons who offer themselves for the service. The principles upon which the compulsory system is founded are, as I apprehend, totally and entirely indefensible. They amount simply to this:—That whether a shipowner wants a servant or not, he is compelled to employ that servant. He is left without the discretion of saying whether he will employ him or not; and the theory is, that the ship is made for the pilot, and not the pilot for the ship. And it appears to me that where pilotage is imposed compulsorily, the law is precisely in the nature of the laws of trades' unions, and that the authorities in giving it effect tell the pilots under their control—"Nobody shall compete with you; you shall be protected from all competition; no one shall come into the trade without a license; and we will compel owners to employ you whether your services are required or not, and to pay you such wages as we choose to prescribe." I apprehend that no trades' union in this country has ever more grossly violated the first principles of political economy than these Pilotage Boards have done by means of the compulsory system which they impose upon the shipping of this country. But not only are all sound principles and all experience in favour of an alteration, but the best authorities are on the same side. In 1860 the hon. Gentleman the Member for Liverpool (Mr. Graves) gave an opinion in favour of voluntary pilotage, with some degree of modification; and his authority, coming as he does from a port where the compulsory system exists, and where it is better worked than in any other port, is surely worthy of being listened to and regarded on a question of this kind. Mr. Hudson, too, a gentleman who is well known to the shipowners of the North of England as an enlightened, intelligent man on all matters connected with shipping and maritime commerce, gives the most conclusive and unqualified testimony in support of a free system of pilotage. Admiral Sullivan also speaks most decisively upon the point. And inasmuch as I see the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Horsfall) in his place at this moment, I will read two of the Questions put by the hon. Member to Admiral Sullivan, with the answers which that gentleman returned. Question 6,437 [Mr. Horsfall]—

Mr. Candlish

"Do you recommend that the same principle of voluntary pilotage should apply to every port?"

I do, most decidedly. I can see no reason whatever against it."

Question 6,438—

"Would you recommend it for such a port as Liverpool?—Most decidedly. I would have it just the same everywhere."

Well, Sir, I think it is quite clear that the anomalies I have described to the House must continue to vex and harass the shipping interest unless the pilotage system is made universally voluntary. It is for Parliament, then, to choose one course or the other; for it is utterly impossible that the scandal which attaches to our legislation on this subject hitherto can be permitted to continue, and Parliament must interpose to put an end to those anomalies and the consequences of those anomalies, and the legal injustice which results from the present state of things. A few months ago the present learned Judge of the Admiralty Court (Sir Robert Phillimore) gave expression to a distinct opinion in favour of the abolition of the principle of compulsion. Not a few of the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House have in recent years expressed their abhorrence also of the compulsory principle; and Parliament itself, the highest authority of all, has testified in favour of the voluntary and against the compulsory principle. For in the year 1862 the General Act of 1854 was amended in many particulars touching pilots, and this Act gave to the Board of Trade the power to create local pilotage authorities in different parts of the country under certain conditions; but one essential and fundamental condition in every case was that no Pilotage Board should be established unless the pilotage was voluntary; and secondly, that the local pilotage authority shall licence every man seeking a licence. That lies at the bottom of the Act of 1862; and it is not in the power of the Board of Trade, by Order in Council, to create a local board unless the pilotage is free and open to any man who presents himself to the Board and, upon examination, is found to be qualified. With the permission of the House I will take the liberty of reading the Recommendations which were made by the Select Committee of 1860, but which Recommendations have never yet been fully embodied in our legislation. The following is the judicial deliverance of that Committee, after they had taken a large mass of evidence:—

"As regards the main question of voluntary or compulsory pilotage, your Committee, after weighing most attentively all the arguments upon the subject, have arrived at the conclusion that a system of voluntary pilotage might be safely established in most parts of the Empire, due consideration being had to the interests of those parties who have invested capital on the faith that the compulsory system would be maintained. Your Committee have had the most convincing evidence that where the system of voluntary pilotage prevails the supply of pilots is more abundant, their efficiency is in no way inferior, and the rates generally lower than at any of the ports where compulsory pilotage is still in force. The arguments, therefore, which have been used in favour of the existing system, and the fears which have been expressed in regard to obtaining, at all times and under all circumstances, a sufficient supply of pilots, must give way to the facts which have been adduced in evidence. . . . Your Committee would further observe that where pilotage is compulsory, it is generally the practice to limit the number of pilots, to prevent them from accepting a less sum than the fixed rates, and to make it compulsory on each pilot to take his turn, and to accept whatever employment may offer. If the obligation on the ship to employ a pilot were done away with, the corresponding limitations and obligations of the pilots would also be done away with, and the probable consequence would be that more men would offer, and that the supply would adapt itself to the demand. The general regulations which it would be necessary to frame, under the authority of Parliament, in order to carry into effect the requisite change, would be so simple as not to create any difficulty. Your Committee are of opinion that the pilots should be left under the local regulations of the existing pilotage authorities, who would fix the rates, and the qualifications of the pilots to be licenced, by the difficulties of the navigation and the wants of the place, subject to the approval of the Board of Trade. Your Committee do not anticipate that any difficulty respecting the law and practice of insurance will accrue from the change. The law will thenceforth leave all parties at liberty to form a free contract; and the merchant, the underwriter, and the shipowner will be competent to adjust their policy of insurance upon what terms they please. All experience proves that masters will avail themselves of the services of a qualified pilot in any navigation which is in the slightest degree dangerous; and the existing exemptions in respect of coasting vessels, which give rise at present to no difficulties, justify the anticipation that, if the pilotage of the foreign trade is thrown open, commerce and shipping may be relieved of restrictions which now, in many cases, fetter their efforts."

I take it for granted, Sir, that this House must interfere to put an end to the absurd and scandalous anomalies which now prevail in our pilotage arrangements around the coast; that there is no other course by which to rectify them; that this cannot be done by local Pilotage Boards left to their own individual action, for they take within their view only the narrowest sectional interests, whereas the ports which they govern are open to the shipping of the world, and the payments they exact by their exorbitant regulations are a heavy and oppressive tax upon the shipping interest. I cordially thank the House for the indulgence it has shown to me, and, in conclusion, I beg to move the Resolution which stands in my name—

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, representing that, in the opinion of this House, measures ought to be taken for the early abolition of Compulsory Pilotage, with due regard to existing interests, and for requiring Pilotage Authorities to examine and license all competent persons applying to them for the purpose of qualifying to act as pilots,"—(Mr. Candlish),

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. STEPHEN CAVE: The subject which the hon. Gentleman has brought before the House with much ability is one that is full of difficulty; and the difficulty is enormously increased by this circumstance, that although the House might agree upon such general principles as the hon. Gentleman has indicated—namely, that all trades should be thrown open, and that the days of close guilds and protected interests have entirely gone by, and that demand will always regulate supply; yet we are met at once by two impediments when we attempt to carry these principles into active legislation. The first, that public opinion on this point has not gone all the length the hon. Member supposes. He referred, in the course of his speech, to the case of trade unions. Now, these unions have been established and have instituted certain regulations for the protection of those engaged in trade. Well, I imagine that the opinions out of which such associations spring are very strongly implanted in the minds of large numbers of persons; and one of these opinions is that, in order to make an industry profitable, it is necessary to limit the number of those who practise it. The other difficulties, that, even where certain general principles are admitted, yet people will be found to argue that, in their particular localities, exceptional circumstances exist which prevent the practical application of these principles. For example, I suppose that, in spite of the evidence of Admiral Sullivan, the hon. Members for Liverpool will declare that it is quite impossible to carry out the system of voluntary pilotage in the port of Liverpool; that under the peculiar circumstances of their magnificent estuary, with its shifting sands, and vast fleets of vessels arriving with every change of wind, it is absolutely necessary that the pilots should be, at any rate, under such a degree of control as to ensure there being a sufficient supply of them. So there are places in the entrance to the Mersey to which ships run in the hope of meeting a pilot, and where, in certain states of the weather, the consequences of a short delay might be fatal; so that it is absolutely necessary that the regulations should be strict, and that the pilots should be subject to certain authorities, in order to ensure there being a sufficient number always on the spot and always ready to take charge of a ship—in short, that they should be always found when they are wanted, just as a policeman is expected to be always on his beat. On the other hand, it is true that in Liverpool the voluntary system is beginning to make itself felt. There are there a set of voluntary pilots who take charge of vessels to Cape Clear or the Tuskar Lighthouse, far beyond the pilotage limits of the port; and I know that they are a very successful and enterprising set of men. I remember, many years ago, crossing the Magra, a turbulent mountain stream, between Spezzia and Lucca. The day was fine, the water about six inches deep, but a guide, with a sounding pole, walked in front of the carriage, and received, of course, the regular fee for the service—unnecessary as, under the circumstances, it happened to be—which was levied on the principle of obtaining, by a small payment, not very burdensome to anyone, sufficient to secure the constant presence of a guide, whose services might be necessary in case of a sudden flood. Well, I then come to the argument of the hon. Gentleman, that pilotage presses very heavily upon the class of small ship-owners, and also that it is very hard that vessels which carry a master or mate, who have taken the trouble to qualify for the duties of pilotage, should yet be compelled to engage pilots they do not want. Admitting, for the moment, this argument, it would show that the effect of the change contemplated by the hon. Member would rather be to diminish the employment of pilots, and it is difficult to see how this can be reconciled with the arguments of those who contend that, by throwing open the trade, we should give still greater employment to the pilots than they now have. At any rate the only mode in which these two counter representations can be harmonized is on the supposition that the pilots would be more efficient under the voluntary than under the compulsory system, and that consequently the owners of vessels would be more likely to employ their services. The hon. Member (Mr. Candlish) has said that the Trinity House has expressed the very strongest approval of the voluntary system. [Mr. CANDLISH: I said that some members of it had done so.] Well, I think the hon. Member went rather too far when he said that; all that can be said is that an opinion has been growing for some time in the Trinity House in favour of the voluntary system. Considerable difficulty has been experienced by them in managing the pilots at Dungeness in consequence of their knowing that, under the present system, they were certain of employment under any circumstances, and consequently energy and good conduct have not been so remarkable among them as, perhaps, they would have been if the system were thrown open. At the same time I think that very strict regulations are necessary with respect to the licences, and the amount of the rates. The hon. Gentleman, I think, said that, in his opinion, the rates ought to be thrown open, as well as all the other circumstances of the trade; but I do not think that that would be a good plan. A case in point recently came under my notice. It occurred at St. Ives, where the voluntary system prevails to a great extent. I had a complaint last winter respecting the conduct of some of the pilots who went out to meet a French vessel. The weather was bad. The captain of the vessel hardly knew where she was, or what degree of danger she was in; and the pilots, taking advantage of the circumstance, made an extortionate bargain with him, as the condition of their bringing the vessel into port. I think that, if we were to leave the pilots to make their own bargains with shipowners, we should be likely to bring about an increase of all those abuses which are so much complained of in the case of salvors on the South coast. Complaints also have been made—and, no doubt, with very great justice—as to the conflict of jurisdiction, and with regard to many regulations, which, indeed, seem to be very anomalous—such as the shipping of fresh pilots when the vessel is moving out of one jurisdiction into another. This was formerly the case in the Bristol Channel. Masters of ships when they had reached a certain point were obliged to send back the pilot on board and to take another in his place; and sometimes they had to do this under circumstances which led to great delay and even danger. The hon. Member for Leith (Mr. Miller), I remember, complained on one occasion, that the regulations were bad that prevailed in that port, and mentioned the case of an old sailor—an excellent well-conducted and capable man—who could not get a certificate because of some technical or formal impediments, and the consequence was that he had sometimes been turned over the side by his own son, a good-for-nothing fellow, but who had the advantage of being properly qualified. No doubt there are great anomalies which call for remedy, exemptions that proceed on no principle whatever. It is obviously quite absurd that vessels from the north of Boulogne should be in a different position (as the hon. Member has stated) from vessels coming from the south of Boulogne. There can be no reason why vessels from the Baltic should not require a pilot quite as much as vessels constantly going backwards and forwards to Havre, Brest, St. Malo, or even the fruit ships of Portugal, or Spain. But the chief difficulty in dealing with this question, is the immunity from damage enjoyed by the shipowner who carries a pilot compulsorily. This matter is also full of anomalies. In former times, when you had to deal with sailing vessels, some reason might be alleged for this system of making pilots liable. The pilot, no doubt, not only knew the banks and shoals, but the strength of the currents, as compared with the force of the wind, and other matters of this kind, which enabled him, in his own waters, to work and sail a vessel better than the master; he, therefore, entirely superseded the master, and took command of the vessel, and it was perhaps necessary that he should do so. It seemed fair, under these circumstances, to discharge the master from liability in the case of an accident happening; and the owner as naturally objected to be answerable for damage caused by one who was not his servant, and over whose appointment he had not any control. In those days, moreover, the vessels were smaller, and the pilots were probably supported by their guilds, so that they were able to pay when called upon, and the injustice was much less than it is now. But these considerations can hardly be said to be of much force in these days; because, in the case of a steamer, the pilot now ally acts only the part of a guide, who shows where the rocks and shoals are, and the captain of the steamer is really the man who manages the vessel. It seems hard, that when the captain insists on putting on great speed, for the sake of obtaining an early market, and when, in consequence, he runs down some ship in the way, that the owner of the vessel should merely have a remedy against the pilot, whose whole fortune probably would not be sufficient to replace a single spar. And if it is unjust to make the shipowner responsible for the acts of a man in whose appointment he had no voice, and over whose actions he has very little control, certainly, on the other side—looking at it in a legal and technical point of view—it must be manifestly more unjust that the damage and loss resulting should accrue to the party aggrieved for the acts of a man whom he had not employed at all. Complaints have been made, as many hon. Members know, by large deputations of Thames bargeowners, complaining bitterly that they are perpetually run down by steamers in the river, and that they have no means whatever of getting anything out of the pilot. The pilot, perhaps, may go to prison; and that is the only compensation the owner gets for the loss of a barge worth £200 or £300. But it is fair also to observe that there have been representations on the other side from the owners of steamers, who say that if we alter the law to enable the owners to obtain new remedies, their barges will be always in the way of the navigation, and it will be quite impossible to pass up and down the river. Well, it is evident that the anomalies and difficulties of the matter are numerous and serious. It may be suggested that we should assimilate our practice to that which prevails on the Continent and in America; but even there the practice is still very uncertain as to the position or privileges of pilots. The modern tendency of our Courts is to cut down these immunities as much as possible. The shipowners in London are generally in favour of the system, and even of the extension of the system that now prevails. In other ports I believe there is not so strong a feeling on the point. With regard to the underwriters, no doubt it is strongly to their advantage that the pilots should be the best possible men to be obtained. If they are so, then, of course, the matter is in their own hands, as they can refuse to insure a vessel that does not take a pilot, or that has not on board a qualified master and mate. I mention these points to show how very difficult this question is, and how impossible it would be for the Government to pass a Bill based upon the Resolution of the hon. Member. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Milner Gibson) will bear me out in that opinion. He did very much when he was at the Board of Trade to get rid of the more glaring anomalies, though I think he was not able to go so far as he would like to have gone. He will bear me out when I say that the difficulties are such as to prevent the introduction of any such comprehensive measure as that embodied in the Resolution now before us. I recommend the hon. Member not to press the Motion, but to support the Government in remedying—as I hope to be able to do in the Merchant Shipping Bill—some of the more flagrant abuses, and in bringing the law into a more reasonable state, and for the rest to trust the local authorities to take a broad and enlightened view of the pilotage question within their own districts.

Mr. Candlish

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK supported the Motion of the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Candlish). The question had been discussed for a long time in this country; and the point he held to be simply and absolutely this:—Whether a man should be at liberty to do as he liked with his own property, or whether in the disposition and management of it he should be subject to the control, supervision, and direction of the State. The meaning of the system of compulsory pilotage was just this:—That the State found for you a certain number of men to do something for you which you may or may not want them to do. Their remuneration is fixed; you must pay it to them whether you really require their assistance or not. The system, no doubt, had its origin in the days when paternal Governments undertook the task of doing for their subjects what their subjects could do much better for themselves. This system was a relic of the old time—a remnant of a plan of administration of which they had got rid—and in this, as in all other matters, he thought the best and soundest policy was the policy of Free Trade. A man who owned a ship was just in the same position as a man who owned a house, or any other form of property. The vessel, perhaps, was bringing a valuable cargo up the Thames. He had taken care to select a thoroughly good captain whom he could trust, and to whom he was willing to leave the safety of the vessel. Why should he not be allowed to do so? On what principle of sound trading or of common justice did they say to him that he should not be allowed to bring his vessel up the river unless he had a pilot on board? The Captain says, "I do not want a pilot." The State replies, "But you must have one, and pay for one." The owner might fairly object to the unnecessary expense; and, at the worst, had a right to say that if he chose to run any risk with his ship it was his own affair, and that he ought to be at liberty to judge what was the best course to be adopted. The system amounts to direct interference with the liberty of shipowners in dealing with their property. The common argument, of course, was that the pilot was put on board to protect the cargo and crew, and the passengers if there should be any. But he failed to perceive what justification could be found in any of these circumstances for arbitrarily prohibiting a man from doing what he thought fit, what most advantageous. It may be said that navigation up rivers was dangerous unless conducted by pilots. Everything was more or less dangerous. The railway, the omnibus, the streets were all full of perils that required to be guarded against. But it had never been argued that, on that account, people should be compelled, with their will or against it, to be placed under the care of guides. Another plea in favour of compulsory pilotage was, that it helped to keep up a race of competent men. He believed that under a voluntary system we should get just as good men, if not better. Men of experience and practice would be always to be had, and would soon become known, whereas a pilot might hold a licence and yet be not very fit for his duties. Shipowners, if the trade were open to all, would be able to make their own selection, and the House might depend upon it that their choice would not fall upon incompetent men. Now-a-days a ship was generally towed up the Thames or the Mersey by a steam tug, and a pilot was of no use, for the ship had only to follow the steamer, and the master of the tug was really the pilot. It was he who knew every turn of the river, upon which he had been engaged for, perhaps, twenty or thirty years, and all the pilot had to do was to steer the ship in accordance with the direction taken by the tug. He did not say that pilots were never of any use. In many instances they were a necessity, as when a stranger approached our shores; but they were not always a necessity. For these reasons he hoped that, in the new Bill to which the Vice-President of the Board of Trade had referred, provisions would be introduced for the establishment of Free Trade in pilotage.

Mr. Stephen Cave

MR. HORSFALL said, he had listened with great interest, but with still greater surprise, to the speech of the hon. Member for Sunderland. He laid down two propositions, which he asked the House to affirm—first, "that, in the opinion of this House, measures ought to be taken for early abolition of compulsory pilotage;" and, secondly, that measures should also be taken "for requiring pilotage authorities to examine and licence all competent persons applying to them for the purpose of qualifying to act as pilots." To his surprise, the hon. Gentleman stated that he founded these propositions upon the Report of the Committee of 1860. He (Mr. Horsfall) had the honour of being a Member of that Committee, under the presidency of his right hon. Friend the Member for Ashton (Mr. Milner Gibson). He attended every meeting of the Committee, and he certainly was considerably surprised to hear that statement. But the hon. Gentleman himself answered his own propositions, and showed clearly that they were not in accordance with the Report of the Committee, because he read a portion of that Report which distinctly stated on the proposition that there should be one system of voluntary pilotage—

"As regards the main question of voluntary or compulsory pilotage, your Committee, after weighing most attentively all the arguments upon the subject, have arrived at the conclusion that a system of voluntary pilotage might be safely established in most parts of the Empire."

Observe! "Most parts of the Empire"—which was a totally different thing from that represented by the hon. Member. The hon. Gentleman endeavoured to support his argument by the evidence given before the Committee; and what was the evidence that he gave us? He (Mr. Candlish) gave us the evidence of Mr. Hudson, of Sunderland, and of Captain Sullivan; but their evidence was simply Sunderland versus London, Liverpool, and Glasgow. Mr. Wigram, Mr. Duncan Dunbar, Mr. Marshall, Mr. Green, Mr. Gilman, and others, all well-known as the largest shipowners of London, and Mr. Anderson, Chairman of the Peninsular and Oriental Company, all gave evidence before the Committee in approval of a system of compulsory pilotage. The great mass of the evidence on the part of the shipowners was decidedly in favour of compulsory pilotage. But he did not look upon it as a shipowner's question only. There was a vast amount of property shipped by manufacturers in British vessels; there were also a vast number of passengers who went by these vessels; and although the shipowners might save a trifle by not being required compulsorily to take a pilot, it would be at the risk of the lives of the passengers and the safety of a very large amount of property. The hon. Gentleman spoke in reference to the coasters. He said that the coasters go free of pilotage, and he looked upon that fact as though it were intended to favour the coasting trade in preference to the foreign trade. He (Mr. Horsfall) thought that a more charitable construction might be put upon the matter; and the construction which he put upon it was that as the captains of coasters were going constantly in and out, they knew the character of the waters as well as the pilots themselves. The latter part of the hon. Member's Motion declared that it was necessary to take measures for requiring pilotage authorities to examine and licence all competent persons applying to them for the purpose of qualifying to act as pilots. But what was the fact now? He (Mr. Horsfall) spoke only with regard to Liverpool, where, since 1860, every master and mate who had come forward to be examined (with the exception of two who had not passed the examination) had been licenced. He had no wish to find fault with the hon. Member for having brought forward this question. He quite admitted that there were certain matters of detail which required close examination by the Board of Trade. But he objected to this Resolution on the principle that it offered to the shipowners and the local authorities—who were much better judges than this House—a system which they did not want. He could not therefore consent to this Resolution, and if the hon. Gentleman pressed it, he should feel it his duty to divide the House on the subject.

MR. PEASE said, the hon. Member who had just sat down read at some length various opinions which were expressed in 1860 on the question of compulsory pilotage; but, without exception, the opinions thus given were those of large shipowners on the Thames, who by this compulsory pilotage escaped an action for damages when any injury was done to small craft on the river. Everything that had come out so far in the debate proved enormous anomalies to exist and that those anomalies begot other anomalies. There is no uniform practice whatever on this question of compulsory pilotage. The evidence of the gentlemen referred to was all to one point—that, if they were offered the Free Trade system with regard to pilotage, it would not be satisfactory, and that the demand for pilots would not create a sufficient supply. Now, he (Mr. Pease) thought that all the facts of the case were against that doctrine. In the port of Cork there were now 103 pilots, while in the port of Falmouth there were only thirty-six. Both ports were equally accessible; but in the latter the compulsory system was carried out. He thought that case afforded a fair sample of what Free Trade would do in the way of providing pilots, whose interest it would be always to be on the look-out for vessels. With regard to Falmouth he knew from personal observation the way in which the compulsory pilotage system worked there. He knew that, in many instances, in order to avoid the expense of pilotage, large vessels had kept out of the harbour altogether, keeping out for days at sea rather than come into the harbour with a pilot, when they have been waiting for orders from Liverpool or elsewhere. It did seem most absurd that at Liverpool, at Dublin, in the Clyde, at Howth, and at Bristol, all vessel should be compelled to take pilots, and at Newcastle, Shields, Sunderland, and Cork, they should be comparatively free. His hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland put the case well when he said that the men the captains must take must be an inferior class to the men whom the captains might take. One depended upon good conduct and intelligence; while the other, like all those possessed of monopolies, might do exactly as they liked, whether they please anybody or nobody. He came now to the question, perhaps the most important one. What was the origin of all these peculiar laws with regard to pilotage? They knew that they arose out of those guilds which the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Board of Trade had told them had now nearly expired. In fact, in one case the vessel was made for the pilot, and in the other the pilot was made for the vessel. It must be to the interest of every shipowner to do that which was for the safety of himself, his insurers, and those with whom he was connected. If a pilot was wanted he would see that one was taken; or he would leave the matter in the hands of his own certificated captain. The matter before the House was the difference between the advantage of a Free Trade system, as applied to all pilots, and the great difficulties and anomalies which arose from the mixture of the two systems. He (Mr. Pease) thought that each port ought to have a little more of the Free Trade system, with those necessary police regulations which would enable the vessels to work to the satisfaction of the harbour authorities.

Mr. Horsfall

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, that as he had been referred to he would say a few words upon the subject of the Motion. He was glad to hear from his right hon. Friend the Vice President of the Board of Trade that the opinion was growing in favour of the voluntary system of pilotage. He hoped it would grow faster than it had hitherto done, because he entirely admitted the truth of what had been stated, that when an attempt was made to deal with the question great difficulties had to be encountered, great interest was taken in the question in the House, and great political interest was exercised in defending the pilotage system. This pilotage system had always been, more or less, a party political question, he was sorry to say; and whenever an attempt had been made to place the pilotage law on a sound and rational footing, the parties making these efforts had been met with a kind of semi-political opposition. However, they had got now, seeing the unsatisfactory state of the law with regard to collision, to this position—that something must be done. His hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool (Mr. Horsfall) said that the great shipowners were in favour of compulsory pilotage. No wonder that they were in favour of compulsory pilotage. A great shipowner would in any case employ a pilot. There was no additional expense put upon him in compelling him to employ a pilot; but if by that compulsory law to employ a pilot you gave with it an indemnity for all damages his ship might do while in charge of such pilot, and a freedom from all liability, of course he was in favour of compulsory pilotage. But if his hon. Friend had consulted the owners of small ships, who were not liable to compulsory pilotage, and who now were deprived of all remedy for injuries which large shipowners might do to them, because the large shipowners were indemnified by the clause of the Act of Parliament, in consequence of having compulsory pilots, they would have told him a very different story. He imagined that the Solicitor General would agree with him that there existed a great wrong without a remedy. If he had a small vessel in the Thames run over by a large steamship in charge of a compulsory pilot, if his crew and captain were drowned, and his property destroyed, he had no remedy whatever. There was absolutely no remedy, as he understood, by the laws of this country for that great and signal wrong; and it arose entirely from the compulsory system of pilotage; because the law said, if the State puts a man on my ship, to take the management of the ship out of my hands, then the State was responsible; but the State does not recognize any responsibility for any damage that might arise. Hence there was no remedy whatever. In cases of collision the question frequently was not which ship was wrong, and ought to be liable, but which ship was in charge of a compulsory pilot. He would ask his hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General if he was not correct in his view of the case?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL: Not quite. The law was this:—That the owner of the ship was not liable, because the pilot was not his servant. The pilots themselves, by law, were liable.

MR. MILNER GIBSON: Virtually, the hon. and learned Gentleman agreed with him that, in this case, there was practically no remedy. A great wrong might be committed upon an industrious class of our fellow-citizens, and yet they would be left in the position of not having any remedy. He wanted any hon. Member to point out any other remedy than the abolition of compulsory pilotage. It would, no doubt, be most unjust to put State pilots on board a vessel and then to make the owners responsible in the event of the pilots not being able to handle the vessel as well as those who were more regularly in charge of her. He thought we ought to require from the Government some undertaking that this question would really be seriously considered with a view to a settlement. He did not believe that the difficulties after all would be so very great. He thought persons were becoming more and more convinced of the necessity—the absolute necessity—of some radical change in our pilotage system. If they looked to the enormous trade upon our coasts and the vast number of collisions that took place, he thought they must feel that it was every day becoming more and more an obligation to deal with this very important subject. The hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Candlish) had brought the question forward with so much clearness and in so much detail that it was unnecessary to go into the various anomalies of the present pilotage system; but he (Mr. M. Gibson) was clearly of opinion that they ought to do something to provide a remedy for the great wrong he had pointed out. With regard to the second part of his hon. friend's Motion, that the pilotage authorities should be required to examine and licence all competent persons applying to them, for the purpose of qualifying to act as pilots, he thought that it was most reasonable. It appeared to him very strange that a person was not to be permitted to follow that calling for which he was competent; or that some pilotage authority was to say that a man was not to be permitted to follow the calling of a pilot however respectable, however industrious, or however competent he might be. Why, they might as well say that a man shall not follow the calling of a shoemaker, or butcher, or baker, or any other pursuit, as that of a pilot: Therefore, he did think that we ought to get rid of that absurd restriction of trying to fix the number of pilots any given trade would employ, and making it almost a matter of favour, sometimes not without political motives, to make men pilots. Let us be content with the ordinary rules of supply and demand. The freedom of competition among pilots was the best receipt for supplying ships with pilots; and rely upon it, if they let fishermen and qualified men who, in pursuit of their calling, were constantly at sea, have the benefit of these licences, the ships would much more frequently find pilots, when they wanted them, than they did now. They knew that regulations and by-laws of a severe character had been constantly passed to compel pilots to keep the sea and do their duty, because there was an absence of competition. Competition would provide better for the trade than by fixing the number of pilots the trade might require, which he contended was highly inexpedient.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, that as he had had some experience in the discussion of these subjects, and had heard opinions on both sides, he would venture to make one or two remarks. It was no part of his duty or inclination to defend the present pilotage laws. He apprehended, however, that the real question before the House was the question of compulsory pilotage, and that the question of the examination of pilots had nothing to do with it. [Mr. MILNER GIBSON said, it formed the second part of the Motion.] He would confine himself to the question of compulsion, and the legal results of that compulsion. There were two considerations involved in the matter. The one was a mercantile consideration—whether it was desirable to have compulsory pilots or not, and the other was the legal result of having compulsory pilots. As to the first, he had had occasion to consult the opinions of many different classes. There were the shipowners in one class; but they were again divided into two opinions—one being the opinion of the large shipowners, and the other of the small shipowners. There were also the views of the underwriters. Now, the reason why pilotage had been made compulsory, and why the Legislature forced on the ship and captain the necessity of taking a pilot, was to ensure the safety of the crew and of the cargo. When the right hon. Member for Ashton spoke of anomalies, he meant that there was a want of uniformity in the system adopted on all parts of the English coast; but that want of uniformity had arisen from the varied character of the different parts of the coast. It might not be necessary or expedient that ships should take a pilot in going into a safe port; but, upon going into a port that was dangerous, such as the port of Liverpool—in reference to which anybody who had any experience of the matter was astonished that any ship got in safe at all—of course, it was necessary that the master should take a pilot. He quite agreed with the right hon. Member for Ashton that large shipowners always would take pilots, without any regard to the legal result, simply to secure the safety of their ships and property, because they had an immense stake at risk; but the smaller shipowners were inclined to run great risks in order to save themselves a momentary expense; and the law said “We will not allow the small shipowner to risk the lives of his crew and the value of his property in order to save the expense of employing a pilot.” In those ports where ships were exempt from this obligation, it was probably on the supposition that the masters of those ships were well acquainted with the channel, and had had considerable experience themselves. He simply pointed these out as reasons which had been given by people who had taken opposite views on the matter from those now urged; but not for the purpose of supporting the law, with which he had had but very little to do. As to the rule of law arising upon a ship being required by compulsion to take a pilot, it was a general law; and he would like to state how far that law went, because he thought that some hon. Gentlemen who had spoken were not fully acquainted with the nature and extent of the liabilities which it imposed. By the law of England, a master was liable for the act of his servant. Many thought it was a hard law that, after you had taken all possible precautions to select an experienced and careful servant, you should be subjected to an enormous liability, because for a time he had been negligent. That law was only applicable to the case of a servant; the moment therefore the Legislature placed a compulsory pilot on board a ship, it did not require an enactment to show that the shipowner would not be liable for any damage occasioned by his negligence; it followed by the common law of the land that the shipowner could not be liable, because the pilot was not selected by him; he could not order him to do what he desired, and, in point of fact, the pilot would not be his servant. It was quite true then that, under certain circumstances, the shipowner was not liable in cases of collision when his ship was the one in fault; but it was only where the collision was occasioned solely by the fault of the pilot. If it was caused partly by the fault of the crew and partly by that of the pilot, then there was not an exemption from liability. The exemption only existed where the fault was solely on the part of a person over whom the shipowner had no control. It had been suggested that the shipowner should be liable for any damage done by the ship, although there might be a compulsory pilot on board; but he was not prepared at present to say that that would be just. It was a matter that required consideration—a matter for the Government to consider in any Bill they might bring forward. The hon. Member who had brought forward the Motion would readily perceive that it would not be desirable to bind the House to an absolute decision on the subject, inasmuch as modifications rather than absolute changes of both branches of the law referred to in the Resolution might hereafter be introduced which would meet the views he entertained.

Mr. Milner Gibson

Mr. GRAVES said, it appeared to him that the hon. Member had dwelt too much upon the mere carrying out of what had been called the Free Trade system in this matter. He had overlooked that which lay at the very bottom of the subject—namely, the question of liability. The hon. Member only regarded the point as one of supply and demand. But he (Mr. Graves) thought that the question went very much beyond that. They had, first of all to decide, whether they would have an irresponsible supply of pilots, free from all obligations but those dictated by their own interests, or whether they would have them subject to control; because he held it to be quite inconsistent with a voluntary system to uphold the present system of stringent regulations; he believed these to be necessary to the safety of life and property. At present, in consequence of the compulsory powers which existed, they had a most perfect system of control. For instance, at Liverpool, a certain number of pilots were always ready for duty at all times of the year, whether the weather was fine or bad; and the master of a ship running up in a gale of wind, can be sure of meeting with four points on the coast where pilots are always to be met with; so that if the master misses one pilot, he is sure to meet with another, and this is in consequence of the control exercised over them. The precise proportion of pilots required by the wants of the port to be afloat and ashore was determined. Again, they were prevented from making salvage claims—from making any claim whatever except subject to the supervision of the Board, and were not allowed to own shares in tug steamers. A large question, further, must also arise as to superannuation claims—for there were certain rights of this character to which they were entitled, and which would have to be considered. Such advantages as these would have to be abandoned for a voluntary system. The hon. Member asked—what remedy could be suggested for the anomalies in the present system which he had pointed out, except that which he had brought forward? He (Mr. Graves) would suggest that a remedy lay, not so much in a uniform system of compulsion or of freedom, as in defining more accurately the question of liability. At present it was most undefined. When the pilot came on board of a ship, the master, in most cases, considered himself relieved of all responsibility, and the pilot took charge. To that pilot, the peculiarities of the vessel was entirely unknown. Every ship had her own specialty, of which the pilot was ignorant; and it would be found by the statistics that a very large portion of the losses in the Channel have taken place when a pilot was on board. He would suggest that the duties of the pilot should be defined more accurately—where they begin, and where they end. He would rather try to find a solution of the question by having a uniform system of liability attaching to the owner; and let the pilot's duties be confined to pointing out the dangers of the channel which he had to navigate. He believed when they came to deal with the Merchant Shipping Act, that it was with that question they would have to deal, and not with any attempt to lay down a uniform system, suitable to the whole coast. He believed, on the contrary, that every district had its peculiarities; and those principally interested in a port were the right persons to judge what the system of pilotage ought to be, and what number of pilots were sufficient to keep up, in a satisfactory and efficient state, the pilotage requirements of the port. It would be most unfortunate if the Government stepped in and took out of the hands of the local authorities the regulations of those most important duties. It must be remembered that, as the law now stood, it was a mistake to suppose that shipowners were free agents. For instance, they could not employ masters or mates unless they held certificates from the Board of Trade; and the tendency of legislation was to limit still further their freedom. But now it was to be argued that a step in the contrary direction ought to be taken in the case of pilots—that they ought to be regarded only in the light of supply and demand, and that owners should be free to take them or not as they pleased. That was an inconsistency which seemed unjustifiable; as it seemed to him the real question to be grappled with was, to define the duties of the pilots, or to declare upon whose shoulders the real responsibility must rest. He hoped the hon. Member would not force his Motion to a division; but if he did he should be compelled to vote against it.

MR. CANDLISH: After the assurance of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. S. Cave) that the matter would have his attention, and understanding that his feelings were in favour of the Motion, he would beg to withdraw it.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Question again proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

BRITISH MUSEUM.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. GREGORY said, he wished to make one more effort to induce the Government to remedy what was a great discredit to this country—the present condition of the British Museum. In proportion, as the collections in that institution accumulated, and in proportion also to the intelligence and ability of those who had charge of it, must be the regret which was felt to see how vain and futile were their efforts to render this collection available, either for the study of scientific men, or for the amusement and instruction of general visitors. It was impossible, by any verbal description, to give an idea of the present state of the collection; the only way was for hon. Members to go and judge for themselves. If they examined the Collection of Natural History upstairs, they would find the specimens so closely packed together that it was impossible to distinguish the hoofs and the horns, the heads and the tails which belonged to the different animals; and the gentlemen connected with that department had not the means of prosecuting their scientific studies. If they went downstairs to the room where the Insects were deposited, they would find that they had descended at once into the realms of Nox and Erebus, and of eternal night. A writer in The Times on this subject stated that Englishmen were obliged to hunt in their minds for apologies whenever they took foreigners to visit that department; for the Insects were shut up in drawers unarranged—many of them unset, and some of them undistinguishable, being covered with an accumulation of London dust. If they visited the department of Antiquities, Mr. Newton would show them that unseemly penthouse where the interesting specimens of sculpture from Halicarnassus, Cyrene, and Cnidus were huddled together. Matters were still worse if he took them to the basement regions, where inscriptions, Etruscan monuments, and an immense mass of interesting objects were concealed in impenetrable darkness. Such was the present condition of the British Museum—unrivalled in its Collection of Natural History—and, though it might be excelled in some particular branches, still justly claiming to be one of the greatest collections in the world for originality, variety, and completeness. The objections he had to make to it were as to its structure, its arrangement, and its administration. First among the structural defects of the building was the manner in which the halls were lighted. If there was one thing necessary in works of art, it was that a full and clear light should fall upon the objects. That was more particularly necessary in so dark and cloudy a city as ours; but the light was so strained and contracted, that it seemed to be made obscure by some pernicious ingenuity. Then, what could be worse than the miserable and unseemly cistern in which the Assyrian antiquities were exposed? The next defect was want of space, which forbade all attempt at chronological and systematic arrangement—the very essence of a properly constructed museum. In former days a museum was a mere curiosity shop, in which the most incongruous objects were thrown carelessly together—South Sea implements of war, Greek and Roman busts, Hindoo idols, wasps' nests, stuffed kangaroos, shells, the hat and gloves of some celebrity, all mixed up together—all these things arranged without system formerly constituted a museum. But we have advanced to different ideas. A museum is now the symbol of the intelligence and learning of a nation; while it ministers to the amusement of the many it should convey instruction to all. If there were sermons in stones—and he knew no sermons more impressive than those that were preached in some of those stones, which told the tale of the structure of the earth, or of the religions, the politics of races over which the flood of time has passed, or the lineaments of those famous men who once swayed the world—then let them tell their sermons clearly and distinctly, not in the confused and chaotic manner they were made to do in the Museum. He would illustrate what he meant. At the British Museum, the visitor entered a hall filled with Roman busts, sculptures and tessellated pavement, and then passed to a room filled with Greek and Roman sculpture. Turning to the right, he came to the Nineveh bulls; then to the sculptures of Egypt; then back to Assyria; or, if he went straight on he would find himself again among works of Greek and Roman art—from them he would pass into barbaric Lycian tombs and inscriptions, and out of them straight into the highest efforts of Greek art, the works of Phidias. Nothing could be more incongruous or less instructive than such a miserable jumble. A proposition for a state of things equally incongruous had been made—namely, to stow away all the lighter antiquities upstairs, and keep the heavier articles downstairs: a sort of avoidsupois arrangement. Nothing could be worse than such a classification as that. He trusted that, even if the Natural History Collection were removed, the Government would be induced to buy sufficient land to the west of the Museum to permit of a chronological arrangement of the various objects in parallel halls. They ought to begin their classification with the oldest periods of art—with the works of Egypt—then those of Assyria, and so on, till they arrived at the perfection of art in the works of Phidias, and then to proceed downwards to the decline. Professor Owen took substantially this view. He said that the British Museum was a place both for observation and recreation; but that neither could be carried out until there was a complete and classified arrangement of all the works of nature and art. He would now come to the question of administration. Some years ago a memorial, signed by 120 scientific men, was presented to Lord Palmerston, praying that the British Museum might be preserved intact; that ground should be bought, and that the collections of science and art should be kept within the same building. Shortly afterwards, another memorial was presented to the Government, taking another and different view. These memorialists made the following statement:—

Mr. Graves

"We are of opinion that it is of fundamental importance to the progress of the Natural Sciences in this country, that the administration of the National Natural History Collections should be separated from that of the Library and Art Collections, and placed under one Officer, who should be immediately responsible to one of the Queen's Ministers.

"We regard the exact locality of the National Museum of Natural History as a question of comparatively minor importance, provided that it be conveniently accessible and within the Metropolitan district."

The memorial was signed by Mr. Darwin, Mr. Huxley, Dr. Hooker, and other men of distinction; so that it appeared as if a large portion of the scientific world attached more importance to the question of administration than to the question of locality. He would not say one word derogatory to the trustees, he gave them much credit for having gathered a collection universal in its extent, and for selecting in every instance, a man to preside over the departments men whose fame was not confined to the walls of the British Museum. He should indeed be insensible to the influence which great names exercised in British society if he considered that the eminent men now connected with the Trust of the British Museum did not add lustre to the institution and inspire confidence in the management. Such was the confidence that he did not recollect a single instance in which the Estimates for the Museum had been challenged. The character of the trustees stood so high that the most entire and implicit reliance was placed in them. But his objection was, that there was no responsible management; no Minister of the Crown was responsible; and, if any objection or comment was made, there was no one to answer the comment or the objection. At one moment the Government might be blamed for what was really the obstructiveness of the trustees; at another, the trustees might be blamed for what was the obstructiveness of the Government. Now, how was the Trust composed? It was composed of forty-eight trustees, twenty-three official, the royal, nine family, and fifteen elected. Such a body of trustees was confessedly unwieldy, and one proof of its cumbrous structure was, that it was divided into a standing committee, which again was divided into sub-committees. The three principal trustees were the Speaker, the Lord Chancellor, and the Archbishop of Canterbury. In their hands all the appointments were placed. It was impossible to praise too highly the appointments they had made; but still it did seem strange that to the three men who had of all men, perhaps, in the United Kingdom, the heaviest amount of business on their hands, should be entrusted the selection of the most fitting persons to fill vacancies in the British Museum. The ex officio trustees, with the exception of the Presidents of the Royal Academy, of the Royal Society, and of the Royal Society of Antiquaries were, mainly gentlemen connected with politics or with the Bar, whose pursuits must leave little time for the concerns of the British Museum. In fact, the ex officio trustees rarely attended unless there was some scheme under consideration in which the Government were interested. A memorable instance of this occurred under Lord Palmerston's Government in 1860. The trustees had, since 1848, been imploring each Government for more space. The opinion of the Standing Committee of the trustees was in favour of retaining all the collections on the present site, and of purchasing the block of buildings round the Museum. Lord Palmerston's Government was, however, of a different opinion. It had become the proprietor of land at South Kensington, and it was necessary to justify the purchase of this land by erecting some kind of public building on it. There were two things to be done: to over-ride the decision of the Standing Committee; but at the same time to impress on the country the belief that the removal of the Natural History Collection was in accordance with the views of the trustees. Whereupon, in January 1860, there came down a body of ex officios, they voted en masse as they were told to do, and thus the removal to Kensington was decided by a majority of 1. This, then, went forth as the true expression of the trustees; whereas it was the expression of men who had probably not visited the Museum twice in their lives, and who cared as little as they knew about its condition and requirements. The Chancellor of the Exchequer of that day justified the action of the Government, on the ground that they must be responsible to the country for any measures that were actually adopted, and hence, that it was impossible for them to submit to the dictation of a certain number of gentlemen assembled in a back parlour at Bloomsbury. As a matter of fact, on that occasion, the gentlemen sitting in Bloomsbury were truer representatives of the feeling of the nation than the gentlemen sitting in Downing Street, to judge from the division in 1862, when the House of Commons rejected the Bill for separating the collections, and from that of June, 1863, when it refused to buy the Exhibition Building to house the Natural History Collection. But the question remained, why go through the farce of consulting the trustees at all? Next came the family trustees. Their trusts, he admitted, should be continued in reference to the bequests in which they were trustees; but it certainly was an anomaly that a number of gentlemen should interfere in the management of a great library, or of natural history and antiquarian collections, solely upon the ground that their great grandfathers might have presented a statue or a bust to the institution. He came next to the office of the manager and director of this great establishment. The office of principal librarian had of late years been continually growing in magnitude and multifariousness of functions. The popular idea of a principal librarian was that he was a man with a great many sub-librarians under him. But the fact was that he had the charge of three great collections—Library, Antiquities, and Natural History—any of which was almost too much for the powers of a single individual. Professor Owen himself, though he had been made Superintendent of Natural History, still remained under the direction of the principal librarian. Mr. Panizzi was a man of singular administrative power, of iron will, and indomitable activity, and he succeeded in preserving unity of administration in the British Museum; but anyone well acquainted with that institution could not fail to have become acquainted with the heartburnings, jealousies, and inconveniences attendant upon the control being vested in a single hand. Upon a comparatively small scale, eighty years ago, this system of individual administration might have done very well; but in the present day there was no one man capable of holding the reins of this great establishment; under a weaker man than Mr. Panizzi collisions must inevitably ensue, and difficulties be multiplied. He had entered into the system of management, because it was generally understood that the Government was about to introduce a Bill to transfer the Natural History Collection to Kensington; and he could not too strongly express his hope that, if that transfer were carried out, the present cumbrous system would not be perpetuated. One of the chief recommendations of the Royal Commission of 1850 had been to diminish the executive functions of the trustees, and to convert them, if possible, more into a supervising and visiting body than they were at present. But the result which the Commission looked for had not been attained; and the heads of departments had been rendered more powerless than before, through an increased conscientiousness on the part of the trustees in the discharge of their duties, in short from their entering into minutiae of management which was by no means calculated to increase the efficiency of the officers of the establishment. For instance, if a coin or object of natural history were offered for sale at the Museum, beyond the very small pecuniary limit allowed, the officials had no power to make a purchase, and the matter was referred to the trustees. But the elements of a right judgment resided not with them, so much as in the coin-room, or in the study of

Professor Owen, where the value of the specimen, its novelty, its connection with other objects could be tested. Hence the transfer of such a question from the department to the trustees was not a gain, but a loss, involving as it did a reference from persons who knew more to persons who knew less, from a more competent to a less competent tribunal. He (Mr. Gregory) considered also that it was of vital importance to the good working of the institution that the keepers of the different departments should be present at the board when their Reports were read, instead of any explanations which were requisite being asked for and tendered in writing. Such a system was cumbrous, offensive and pedantic. Were the keeper present he could in five minutes explain his views, instead of having them, perhaps, inadequately set forth by a principal librarian, who might be adverse to them. Let them ask Professor Owen what he thought of having the business of the Natural History Department conducted by a chief librarian, who never scrupled to express the most thorough contempt for men of science, and Sir Benjamin Brodie never hesitated to stigmatize this mode of doing business as fraught with confusion, delay, and discontent. With regard to the way of improving the administration, he would point to the constitution of the National Gallery. In that case, there was a Minister directly responsible to Parliament, the Estimate was moved by a responsible Minister, and the director who had the spending of the Annual Grant, was not hampered by the trustees. He was a member of the board, and attended its meetings. The trustees aided him on questions of administration, on communications with the Government in regard to new buildings, or special grants for purchases; in short, on those points in which a board was a valuable aid rather than a fetter to a director. He (Mr. Gregory) would recommend this mode of government. He would therefore advise that all that was unnecessary should be eliminated from the Trust. This would include the ex officio and family trustees, reserving to the latter the right of intervention, when the bequests with which they were connected were concerned. There would then remain the fifteen elected trustees, and he would suggest that they should be divided into three boards, with each of which should be associated one of the heads of the three departments, and he should be the medium communication with the official who was directly responsible to Parliament. The Great Library would thus be represented by literary men, the Antiquities by scholars, and the Natural History by men of science. Vacancies should be filled up by the Crown. He would give the head of the department preme authority with regard to the spending of the Annual Grant. The functions of each of these small and compact boards should extend over the framing of statutes and regulations. It should be consultative and visitatorial rather than executive. Consultative as regards special wants, increased accommodation, salaries, and such-like objects; visitatorial, so far as annually inspecting the condition and arrangement of the collections in company with their respective keepers. It should also form a final court of appeal to which any officer of the Museum who considered himself aggrieved might apply. Such a court as this could not fail to give confidence; and inasmuch as it would assist and not fetter the director, was far preferable to the autocratic government of one man. Into the wider question, whether there should be an Education Minister in Parliament, or one man of eminence out of Parliament to supervise the art and science institutions of the country he could not now enter. He hoped, too, that distinct rules would be laid down regarding the future boundaries and scope of the Museum. The drawings of the great masters could be removed, in accordance with the recommendations of the Committee of 1860, to the National Gallery, as soon as that building was fit to receive them. He thought everything relating to British history should be kept at Bloomsbury; but the Foreign Mediæval Collection—the Manuscripta for instance—should be sent to Kensington, for it was not desirable that two institutions should buy and exhibit the same objects, even though it might be done for different purposes. As to Ethnography, it was recommended that this portion of the collections should be removed whenever a suitable place could be obtained for it. He was sorry to say that was his recommendation in 1860, but he was ready to atone for it. His excuse was that eight years ago the spirit of inquiry as to the condition, mode of life, and similarities of primitive races was faint, in comparison with the deep interest which has sprung up everywhere on these subjects. Instead of lessening these collections, he thought they should be strengthened and increased. If it was determined that the Natural History Collection be removed to Kensington, there would, he hoped, be a thorough overhauling of the contents of the whole establishment, for a large number of works of art and scientific objects might be distributed throughout the country. Indeed, Professor Owen informed the Committee of 1860 that a sufficient number to set up five museums could then be spared. In conclusion, his recommendations were these, that, as regards the collections which were to be retained on the present site, an effort should be made to obtain additional space at Bloomsbury, so as to carry out a systematic and chronological arrangement, and the Government should avoid the introduction of the present cumbrous system of trust into the new establishment at Kensington. He had ventured to submit these recommendations because he understood the Government were about to take action in the matter.

Mr. Gregory

MR. BERESFORD HOPE wished to confine what he had to say to the single question, why South Kensington should not be absorbed in the British Museum? He did not mean by this that the contents of the former institution should be transferred to Bloomsbury; but, as the nation had committed itself to a great collection of objects of art and antiquity, he could not see how an arbitrary line could be maintained between the institutions, except at a disadvantage to both. No doubt there was a considerable difference between the characters of the objects collected, and the administration of the two museums was very different. But if they looked at the original character of the South Kensington Museum, and considered the manner in which it had grown up, the cause of the anomaly would become manifest. That institution came into existence as a consequence of the increased attention to technical excellence, of which the Exhibition of 1851 was the symbol; and it was originally only a scholastic collection of models, for the purposes of actual teaching and copying, and was accordingly placed under the care of the Board of Trade, until transferred to the new Department of Science and Art, as it may hereafter be to that of a future Secretary of State. The means, however, at its disposal were so ample, that it soon outstripped its merely utilitarian functions, and grew up into taking rank among the greatest and most complete collections of mediæval art in the world. In this same course, however, the older museum was not idle, and it also continued accumulating its stores. These were chiefly, no doubt, collected from the fields of ancient art; but still even the British Museum was not insensible to the growing perception of the merits of the art of post-Christian ages, and it formed collections of Majolica and other classes of vertu, not equal to those at South Kensington; but still good enough to rob the latter of its pre-eminence as the special national exhibition of those ages of art. Accordingly in neither place was there to be found a complete history of art. We all knew from our books how Greek art developed itself and degenerated, and how Roman art developed itself out of Greek, and then was transmuted by slow degrees into Romanesque and Byzantine, and then again was doubly transmuted, or, as many people—he among them—said, was raised into the Gothic, and again how the latter was succeeded by the Renaissance, or revival of the classical, and that again gave way to general eclecticism. But when we sought to study this wonderful profession with our eyes, we found no school to go to which would teach us our whole lesson. The British Museum was all but exclusively ancient, and the South Kensington modern. Now it was against this arbitrary distinction that he protested. He desired to see the whole great national museum combined in one institution, and under one great central management, with separate departments for the different schools. In a word, he would have the capital art museums of the country catholic and not sectional. He did not mean that we could expect to have the entirety of the national collections in one building. We were living in England and not in Utopia, and there was an Abyssinian war to be paid for. The South Kensington building, with its contents, was an existing and material fact with which he had no wish to meddle. All that he suggested was that it should be incorporated with the management of the British Museum, under regulations which might combine the respective advantages of the two organizations. The advantage possessed by the British Museum consisted in its solidity and dignity, as a trust existing by itself and for itself, but in direct relation with the administration of the country and with Parliament. On the other hand, the advantage possessed by South Kensington was that of a certain elasticity and pliability—a recognition of the spirit of the age in its arrangements.

For example, the plan of procuring the best fac similes of works of art of which we could not obtain the originals was very desirable, and constant recourse was had to this expedient in the younger institution. He need only quote the very successful cast of the great portal of the Church of Compostella. Well then, he would allow of fac similes at the regenerated British Museum. Again, the system of receiving on loan and of exhibiting works of art belonging to private persons, already in operation in connection with South Kensington, and the habit of sending certain of their own objects round the country were advantageous features which he would incorporate into the constitution of the enlarged institution. The plan was as good for every school of art as for that of the middle ages or the sixteenth century. Of course, if there was to be a fusion of the British Museum and of the collection side of the South Kensington one, there must be a concurrent divorce between the latter and the art schools which were now an integral portion of the institution. But this divorce might be made a positive gain to those schools. At present they had great advantages in the way of using the South Kensington treasures as objects of study. These advantages might still be preserved to them, although there had ensued a separation of administration; and not only so, but they might be extended to the use, under due regulations, of all the collections of the enlarged British Museum. Running powers, so to speak, might be given to the pupils of the central National School of Art, presumably retained at South Kensington, to study and draw at the National Museum wherever situated. On these grounds he ventured to ask, if it was not worthy of consideration, whether the Government should not face the possible benefit of transferring the strictly museum portion of the South Kensington institution to the custody of the British Museum, with a responsibility to some Minister of the Crown for the united collection?

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Gregory), in introducing this subject, always interesting to the House—with that effect which a Gentleman does who has a thorough knowledge of the matter in hand—said, he wished to know, whether the Government seriously intended to effect a separation of the collections in the British Museum? As for the inquiry whether the Government seriously intended to propose a separation of the collections now under the superintendence of the trustees of the British Museum, I can only say that we have prepared a Bill—for some time it has been prepared—and the only reason why it has not been introduced to the House is that we thought it expedient that it should be first submitted to the trustees of the British Museum, in order that we might avail ourselves of any suggestions they might make on the various subjects brought under their consideration, and that, having been put in possession of those suggestions, we might bring the subject before the House with that maturity of consideration which otherwise could not be enjoyed. This fact shows there ought not to be any doubt of our sincerity in regard to bringing about this change. We have resolved upon this change, because we think no one can doubt that so far as the opinion of Parliament—certainly so far as the opinion of the House of Commons has been expressed—the tendency is to a decision that this question, with all its difficulties, should be brought to a solution, and that no solution would be satisfactory that did not embrace a separation of those collections. The hon. Gentleman, who always takes so honourable and useful a part in these discussions, has intimated that though he himself at first hesitated, in consequence of the difficulties which presented themselves, he has arrived at the conclusion that in separation alone can we find a satisfactory solution. The state of things which now exists in the British Museum is a necessary consequence of the foundation of that institution. It was intended to be a museum of every variety of those articles which could interest society—whether of a literary kind, whether of an artistic nature, or whether of a scientific character—and which might form a great national collection. The library necessarily increased, and the collection of art, even of ancient art, every year increased by the discoveries that are made. However, there are, perhaps, limits to the collections which literature and art can furnish; but there are no limits to the collection which science—and science in the age in which we live—can produce. It having been now more than a century ago considered highly desirable that there should be in this country great collections of art, learning, and science, which should be a sort of gage or security for the possession of knowledge, we have found that it would be utterly impossible to keep up these collections in a first-rate condition, and equal to the discoveries of the age, without either separating them or finding an amount of space which is absolutely impossible and inconsistent with the social circumstances under which we live. The late Prince Consort, who was a man always meditating upon these subjects, and who had so keen a sympathy with the highest pursuits of intellect and taste, expressed that opinion in a single word—or at all events in a single sentence—when he said that what we wanted in order to do justice to the requirements of the public mind in knowledge and art was space. Well, that is the whole truth. It is quite impossible that you can maintain your national collections, as represented by the British Museum, unless you have a command of space which circumstances render wholly impossible. At the time when the Duke of Bedford pulled down his beautiful mansion at Bloomsbury, had we purchased his park and gardens, we should have had a territory at our disposal which would have admitted of the erection of a series of buildings that would have done justice to the collections which the nation, I think, is determined to possess. At that time that part was as remote from the centre of business in London as Kensington is at present, and when Montague House was purchased the same objection was made about the British Museum. But that opportunity was lost, and we may think ourselves fortunate in having gained even what we did at that time. It became necessary, therefore, to make some arrangements by which we might have at the same time a first-rate library, first-rate galleries of art, and first-rate scientific museums. They could no longer be in the same building and under the same roof, so after great investigation, much controversy, and much change of opinion, there seems to be now a general concurrence that we must submit to what, at first sight, appears a rude process—namely, the separation of our national collections. Now, the hon. Member for Galway, who at first was opposed, and naturally opposed, to this separation, wants some security that we should at least gain one great result in the appropriate arrangement of those collections of art which the country possesses, and which are certainly unrivalled. Well, I must say that Her Majesty's Government have impressed on the trustees the necessity of providing, if possible—and I believe it is possible—in the impending alterations, for a series of chronological and continued exhibitions of the progress of human invention as displayed in the great results of art in the different periods to which the hon. Gentleman has referred. The trustees, on their part, have sympathized with the Government; and I do trust that the visitor of our galleries may be able to trace, from the first dawn of the progress of human invention in works of art up to the days of the Romans, a continuous series of those great products of human ingenuity. I believe, in the plans which will be agreed on, that great result will be attained. There are, no doubt, upon the western side of the building additional means of obtaining that result, and they shall not be neglected. I trust the plans to be laid before Parliament will be such as to give satisfaction, and to effect the objects which the hon. Member has so properly insisted upon. Another point to which the hon. Gentleman has adverted, is the management of the institution. That is a subject that has been constantly before the House, and before Committees of both Houses. The hon. Gentleman has dilated upon the unwieldy character of the constitution of the British Museum. No doubt there are anomalies apparent in the arrangements; and it is a very curious thing that no constitution does appear to work in this world that has not some anomalies. But I do not think when you come to practice, that they are of so striking a character as the statement of the hon. Gentleman would induce the House to believe. The hon. Gentleman has very properly reminded us that the trustees of the British Museum consist of a variety of bodies. There are the principal trustees—persons occupying the most important positions that can be filled by Her Majesty's subjects—the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Lord Chancellor, and the Speaker—and the hon. Member asked, "How can these persons who are necessarily occupied with the fulfilment of the most important duties, have time to attend to the patronage of the British Museum, which is entirely in their hands?" The answer to that is that I believe no complaint as to the exercise of the patronage of the British Museum has ever been heard, and the individuals appointed by the principal trustees are generally acknowledged in all departments to be most competent. The hon. Gentleman has also said there are official trustees who, being high in public office, can hardly attend to the duties of the British Museum. And then there are the family trustees, and it is observed that it seems absurd that the representatives of families who might have given statues—I think we might place it higher, and say galleries or libraries—to the nation, should necessarily be managers of the national collections. And then the hon. Gentleman went on to the office of the principal librarian, omitting, I am sure, from a mere inadvertence of the moment, the elected trustees. But there exist, as the hon. Gentleman well knows, elected trustees. Now, before I touch upon the office of the principal librarian, let me remind the House that there are the principal trustees, the official trustees, the family trustees, and the elected trustees—that is to say, trustees elected by the whole body I have previously mentioned, I believe to the number of fifteen. In bringing the subject before the House it would apparently be easy to show that this is an anomalous constitution. But, practically, what happens? All this variety of trustees, making one body, elect a standing committee, on whom really devolves, subject to the control of the principal trustees, the complete administration of the British Museum. Therefore, there is a powerful and vigorous administration, with an unity of purpose certainly not excelled, and rarely equalled, by any body that administers public affairs. The conclusions, therefore, which the hon. Gentleman would draw from the fact of there being family trustees and official trustees with clashing powers and influence do not really apply to the existing state of things. The British Museum is administered by an elected standing committee, chosen by the great body of the trustees—it is, in fact, a cabinet of trustees, who have complete authority, subject to a control to which it is desirable all bodies should have to submit, but with a power of appeal, if necessary. And when we consider the value of the collections which they have accumulated, the able persons they have appointed to manage those collections, and the general result in every respect, we must all agree that they have efficiently performed their duty. Therefore, the administration is by no means, as the hon. Gentleman wished the House to assume, a cumbrous administration, or one that does not act efficiently. The hon. Gentleman seemed to convey to the House that the administration was of a cumbrous character; because, if a collection of books or manuscripts, for example, was to be purchased, the heads of the department would have to correspond with the trustees, and the trustees with the heads of the department, considerable time would be wasted, and perhaps opportunities lost. But really nothing of the kind occurs. The communications are direct, the decisions are prompt. The head of the manuscript department says that there are certain valuable manuscripts for sale which ought to be purchased for the nation, he immediately communicates with the trustees, whose meetings are frequent, and the moment the application is before them they decide without having any correspondence with the head of the department. If they wish to see him they summon him to their board and communicate with him there. As is often the case, his statement is sufficient, they decide on it at once, and the manuscripts are purchased. Therefore, the House would be under a completely erroneous impression if they were to think that there is a cumbrous administration, whose work is marked by procrastination and delay. On the contrary, the administration is simple in its character and very prompt in its decisions, and no correspondence of any kind takes place between the acting committee and the heads of departments. Then, the hon. Gentleman would convey to the House that the principal librarian exercises an extraordinary power, and that, in fact, he is the principal manager of the British Museum. That also is an erroneous impression. There is no doubt that the librarian, occupying a very responsible post, filled always by a gentleman of considerable intelligence, exercises an adequate influence in the management of the British Museum; and he ought to exercise such an influence. Moreover, when a post of that kind is filled by a man of a very remarkable character, he will, of course, have greater weight than that usually possessed by persons filling that department. Mr. Panizzi, who is no longer the principal librarian, is a man of most eminent ability, who has, I believe, done great and good service to this country, and probably we shall not easily find a man of equal vigour and variety of mind again in that position. The gentleman who now occupies it has maintained that post by proofs of eminent talent and by most sedulous and praiseworthy fulfilment of his duties. He is perfectly competent to perform the duties of principal librarian, and is worthy of all confidence. But to contend for a moment that the principal librarian at the British Museum is, under any circumstances, and even in the time of Mr. Panizzi, a sort of despot, is an exaggeration which ought not to be imported into Parliamentary debate. The trustees of the British Museum elect their acting committee, and there is no body of men in this country who take a more direct part in the affairs which they have to administer. It was necessary to make these observations because the hon. Gentleman is very anxious to know whether, when this separation takes place, the separated collections will be under the superintendence and control of the trustees. Now, that is a point which it is for the House of Commons, when they get into Committee upon the Bill, to decide. It is not at all a principle of the measure which we are going to bring forward; the principle of that measure is the separation of the collections. If the House agrees to separate the collections, under the circumstances which the Bill will provide, then in Committee we will fairly and candidly discuss with the House what is the best course which ought to be taken. At present, I do not think that we ought to pledge ourselves upon that subject in any way whatever. If, when the plan is placed before them, the House should be of opinion that it is inconsistent with the present constitution of the trustees that they should exercise any control over that part of the collection which will be established at Kensington, it will be perfectly open to the House to make proposals in Committee accordingly. But it would be premature to express any opinion upon that subject until the House has before them the proposals of the Government, which I hope may soon be made, and until the House see the arrangements for the separation of the collections and the duties which will then devolve upon those who have the administration of affairs. I am not sorry that the hon. Gentleman has brought this subject under the consideration of the House. The separation of collections, which we have now for upwards of a century been gradually forming in one particular portion of the metropolis, which by their great richness and variety command a more than European reputation, and which, I believe I may say without exaggeration, are quite unequalled in any country—this is a subject upon which it is highly important that the House should form an accurate and just view. The hon. Gentleman himself has now for a series of years devoted a great deal of his intelligence to this subject, and there is no one who can speak upon it with greater authority. He has acted upon several Committees of great importance. As one of the trustees of the National Gallery he has personal experience of the mode in which public collections can be managed, and I know well that in that department he has shown singular ability and efficiency. But while I admit it is well that our attention should be called to this subject, the House for the present will allow me to impress upon them that it is unwise that we should, in the present state of our information, enter into any engagements. It is better to wait until the Bill of the Government is fairly before the House. At present, I will only say that, so far as regards the collection to which the hon. Gentleman has particularly adverted, it is the strong wish of the Government, and I believe it is also the wish of the trustees, that that chronological arrangement which has been well described by the hon. Member for Galway should be obtained. That is one of the great objects of separating the collections; and with regard to the control which may be exercised over that portion of the collection which may be transferred to Kensington, we shall, on the part of the Government, consider it a question which it is perfectly open to the House to discuss when the time comes for deciding in what manner this collection should be administered.

Mr. Disraeli

Mr. Disraeli

MR. GREGORY wished to say, in explanation, that he had never represented the principal librarian as "a despot." What he had said was, that it was impossible that any one man could be found capable of understanding and managing three great departments, such as the library, the natural history, and the antiquities.

SYSTEMS OF GOVERNMENT IN INDIA. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD WILLIAM HAY said, he rose to call the attention of the House to the Correspondence respecting British and Native systems of Government in India. It spoke well for the future prosperity of that country that our representative in India did not shrink from calling upon his officers to inquire into and report upon the popularity of our rule. Self-knowledge was as important in a State as it was in an individual; and we might consider ourselves under an obligation to Sir John Lawrence for giving us an opportunity of seeing ourselves, even if through a somewhat distorted medium, as our subjects in India see us. This was a fitting time to turn our attention to the question. Ten years ago the Government of India was transferred from a corporation, which had enjoyed it for more than 250 years, to the Crown. True, in 1784 a Minister was appointed, with a seat in Parliament and with great authority in Indian matters; but up to 1858, when the transfer took place, practically all that Parliament did was to give advice to the Company. He would not complain of the very decided opinion expressed by the Governor General in the demi-official circular which he issued to his officers in connection with this subject; but he was disposed to regret the interpretation placed on the speech of the noble Viscount (Viscount Cranborne) which originated the inquiry. That interpretation, he thought, was calculated to mislead those to whom the circular was addressed. The noble Viscount was represented to have said, he doubted—

"Whether the system of British administration in India possessed, in the estimation of the Natives, any superiority over the method of government pursued in the independent States."

Now all that the noble Viscount asserted in his speech was, not that Native rule was, in the estimation of the Natives, superior to British rule; but that British rule was not as perfect as it was supposed to be, but, on the contrary, was susceptible of great improvement. It was also to be regretted that the question was placed as it was before the officers whose opinion was invited; and that they should have been called on to express an opinion on the merits of rule in Native States as compared with rule in British States, for this excellent reason that such a thing as a Native State governed on a system peculiar to the Natives did not exist. Take, for example, the cases of Trávancore and Putiala, quoted as excellent specimens of Native administration; now what was the history of Trávancore? why so disordered was the Government in 1811, that the British resident, at the solicitation of the Native authorities, assumed the management of the State. Colonel, afterwards Sir Thomas, Monro, was sent there as Prime Minister and during his administration, and that of his successor, which extended over sixteen or seventeen years, the foundation of the prosperity of the country was laid. As to Putiala, it was the very child of British rule, and its good government was the fruit of the advice, occasionally of the direct interference, of such men as Sir George Clark and the two Lawrences. The same might be said of many other Native States. If, therefore, we would be just to ourselves, we ought to institute a comparison not between our Government, and that of the Native States as they at present exist, but that of a State like the Punjab before our influence had extended so far. What was the condition of the Punjab under the rule of Runjeet Singh, one of the most able, energetic, and liberal-minded of Native rulers? An acute and critical French traveller, M. Jacquemont, who always expressed himself with great freedom on the subject of British rule, and who must be regarded as a most impartial witness, wrote in these terms—

“One must have travelled in the Punjab to know what an immense benefit to humanity the English dominion in India is. I cannot witness the frightful evils of such a system without ardently desiring to see the English extending their frontier from the Sutlej to the Indus, and the Russians occupying the other bank.”

This was a very important testimony, for it came from a perfectly independent witness, as to the comparative merits of English and Native rule. In investigating this subject we ought to take into consideration the state of helpless decrepitude into which the Native Governments had fallen before we set foot in the country. That decrepitude was owing to the operation of a despotism the most complete and degrading that had ever been devised—he alluded to the despotism of the Brahmins. Every spark of public spirit and national feeling was under its influence extirpated. The surplus wealth of the country was, through the interested avarice of the priests, collected into a few favoured spots; but left so completely unprotected by natural or artificial means as to present to the unscrupulous adventurer a booty, the value of which was in no way diminished by the absence of all risk in its acquisition. The consequence was that the first foreign invader that set foot in the country overthrew the Hindoo Government, which fell to pieces like a house of cards. It was a consoling fact that, in almost every instance where we had established our authority in India, we had displaced, not the ancient Hindoo rulers, but men who were just as much invaders as ourselves. This was an answer to those who cited as a proof of the success of our system the fact that the Natives of Mysore would prefer the rule of their old hereditary chiefs to British rule. They seem to forget that but for the ascendancy of the British, the choice would be not between the Government of an hereditary chief and the Government of the English, but between the Government of a Mahomedan, like Hyder Ali; a Mahratta, like Sevajee, or a Sikh, like Runjeet Singh. The real difference between Native rule and British rule was this—British rule was progressive, whereas Native rule was retrogressive. British rule had a capacity for improvement; Native rule had not. British rulers were aware of great faults and defects in their Government, and were always devising means by which to rectify those faults; but Native rulers were either unconscious of defects in their system of government or, if conscious of them, took no steps to remove them. Now, the vital question was, what were the real defects of our rule in India? We knew that it possessed great merits. We were aware, for instance, that we had protected the Natives from foreign invasion, and that property was as secure in India as in Europe, if not more so. That peace reigned throughout a country where for centuries anarchy had prevailed. That the Thug or the Dakoit was as rare as a highwayman on Hampstead Heath. That railroads traversed what a few years ago were pathless jungles. That upwards of 50,000,000 of letters were delivered annually in a country where only the other day not so many thousands were conveyed at enormous cost and with great irregularity; and above all, we knew that we had revived in the minds of the Natives a belief in the existence of such a thing as the impartial administration of justice. We were aware, too, that a certain amount of discontent and disaffection must always prevail. That one kind of discontent and disaffection was rather a mark of good government than the contrary; for it was a sign that the people were beginning to awake from their lethargy, and becoming conscious that there was a condition better than that which they had been accustomed to. That another kind of discontent existed in the minds of those who felt that we had supplanted them, who regarded every law we passed, every school we opened, and everything we did calculated to promote the happiness of the people, as an additional offence committed by us. Just as in the olden time a priest had said of printing, “We must

Lord William Hay

root out this printing or it will root us out," so there were Brahmin or Mahomedan priests, who said in their hearts, We must root out these English, or they will root us out. Yet, making due allowance for such feelings and such considerations, if he were asked whether we were losing ground in the affections and confidence of the people of India, he was afraid that he should be obliged to reply in the affirmative. Mr. Roberts, one of the most experienced men in India, remarked that the gulf was widening every day between the governors and the governed, which, of course, meant a want of sympathy between the two classes. This opinion was confirmed by Sir Robert Montgomery and Sir Richard Wingfield, who, above all men, had done their very utmost to bridge over this gulf. The question—"What is the defect of our government in the East?" was not a difficult one to answer. It appeared to him that we had shown a tendency to impose on the subject-race laws and institutions which were not suitable to them; that we had forgotten the fact that India was not a one nation, but many nations, numbering 150,000,000 of people, some of whom were scarcely removed from mere animals, while others were, in point of intellectual capacity, at least, capable of bearing a comparison with the foremost youth of this country. This tendency tainted the whole of our administration in India, and led to hasty and ill-considered legislation. It affected our financial system, our sanitary measures, and even those which were intended to develop the resources of India, and to improve the moral and material condition of its people. Down to 1858 there were certain checks upon the Indian Government in this respect. During that period we were extending our rule, and we considered it desirable to conciliate the people and avoid giving them offence; and if we did introduce new laws we gave the people time to get accustomed to them. Their feelings were not then wounded, as they were now, by the rapid introduction of new laws. In Lord Wellesley's correspondence there would be found scarcely a single Minute relating to the internal administration of the British possessions; and Lord Hardinge is alleged to have made it a stipulation that he should have nothing to do with civil questions. Such was not the case at present, and the whole time of the officers of the Indian Government appeared to be devoted to the manufacture of laws for the Natives. For this purpose there was a machine going at the head-quarters of every Presidency, and one great machine at Calcutta, all of which turned out laws with mischievous rapidity. A paper in the Library of that House, entitled, Reports of the Course of Legislation during the official year of 1866-7, contained a list of thirty-three Bills to be introduced. He would not trouble the House by stating the objects of all of them, but he might mention, by way of example, that one of the measures affected the law of inheritance throughout the whole of India, a second consolidated and amended the law relating to the stamp duties, or, in other words, increased very largely the cost of justice. A third was to provide for the uniformity of weights and measures throughout India. Bills of this character, touching the prejudices and affecting the usages of the people of England, would give rise to no apprehension, because everybody in this country knew that no Bill of the kind could possibly pass into law unless a very large majority of the people approved of it, and not until ample opportunity had been afforded of understanding its scope and discussing its merits. But nothing of that sort was the case in India, where, on the contrary, out of the 150,000,000 people under the sway of the Indian Government not more than 1,000,000—and that was making a very liberal allowance—had the remotest idea of what was going to be proposed for them in the way of legislation. Again, as an instance of the undue severity of the criminal law in India, he would refer to the Cotton Frauds Act, which was, in fact, an Act for the benefit of the rich merchants of this country. Well, no doubt, it was right to check the adulteration of raw cotton; but was it not a little unfair to the ignorant ryot to throw him into gaol, because he was guilty of "mixing one quality of cotton with another quality of the same variety," while the wealthy merchants of this country might, with impunity, send out to India shipload after shipload of cotton goods literally rotting from the deleterious substances applied to them, and utterly unfit for any purpose other than to proclaim throughout the length and breadth of the land—from the bazaars of Calcutta to the bazaars of Bokhara—that the honour of the British merchant belonged to the things of the past? He should like to say one word with respect to the criminal and civil procedure in the British possessions in India. These possessions were divided into regulation provinces and non-regulation provinces, the latter being about one-third of the whole. The difference between the two classes of provinces might be illustrated by saying that in the non-regulation provinces they could, but in the regulation provinces they could not, "temper the wind to the shorn lamb." That was to say, that, in the former, the executive had power to adapt the laws to the peculiarities and characteristics of the people, whereas, in the latter, they had no such power. It was notorious that our rule in the regulation, as compared with our rule in the non-regulation provinces, was considered oppressive. In the old provinces, however, the people had grown up under the system and had become accustomed to it; but the mistake had been made of extending the regulation principle to the non-regulation provinces, where the people were less tractable and less likely to accommodate themselves to new and unsuitable laws. Sir Robert Montgomery expressed the dread with which he viewed the approach of what he termed the regulation wave. One of the most marked effects of that system was that the public officers were confined to their offices from morning to night, and had no time whatever to make themselves acquainted with the feelings and habits of the Natives. He would ask how England would like to be governed by rulers who knew nothing about her customs and sentiments but what they learnt from sitting in the Old Bailey, or in the Court of Queen's Bench? It might be said, and very truly, that a great deal had been done in developing the resources of India by the formation of railways and canals, and by the cultivation of tea and coffee; but there were circumstances attending that development calculated to make the Government unpopular. Among those circumstances was the enormous increase in the price of the necessaries of life. This increase of price extended all over India. The Madras Report for 1865-6 stated that the chief articles of food had steadily advanced in price, and were 50 per cent higher than they were five years ago. In a statement sent from Nagpore it was mentioned that during the last six years prices had risen cent per cent in all districts, in many 500 per cent, and in one 700 per cent. It was also reported from the Punjab that a considerable rise had taken place in the price of wheat. This advance in prices had,

Lord William Hay

according to the Madras Report, an unfavourable effect on the health of the people, especially of the lower orders. Sir Richard Temple reported that the extent to which women embraced hard out-door labour was a proof of the struggle that was necessary to earn a subsistence. Mr. Roberts, in his paper, which was included among those which had been produced, said he had long been under the impression that the mortality among the Natives was excessive, and this confirmed the notion that prevailed so much among the Natives that sickness had increased under our rule. It was quite true that wages had risen considerably in some parts, but not as generally as was supposed. The pay of the Sepoys had not risen at all, and when it was remembered that whereas only a few years ago the pay of the Sepoy was considerably in excess of the wages of an ordinary labourer, and that now it is considerably below that mark, little surprise would be excited by the announcement that the Native army is in anything but a satisfactory or contented state. The stimulus given to trade had also had the effect of draining the country for several years past of its supplies of grain. It had been exported to the Mauritius and other places, and very frequently none could be procured when it was required. Another article which had enormously increased in price, and was almost as necessary as food, was fuel. In India, where there was scarcely any coal or iron, there was an enormous and rapidly increasing consumption of timber and fuel consequent on the construction of railroads, canals, and works of that description; the hills were being denuded of forests, and an engineer officer had given it as his opinion that if some check were not imposed, upon the wholesale clearings in the Coorg mountains, Tanjore, which was regarded as the very garden of the East, would be rendered a perfect desert. He might be told that a great deal had been done to secure proper forest conservancy, that experienced officers had been appointed to look after this matter; but he spoke advisedly when he said that, practically, nothing had been done to repair the mischief which the cutting down of forests and jungles was producing throughout India. The practical inference was, not to discourage the prosecution of public works, but that, as soon as the main lines of railway were completed, Government should turn its attention to what was most important if not more important—namely, the improvement of the ordinary communications of the country, and to works which might be carried on without the evil effects referred to. For example, instead of spending millions in the construction of costly canals, the benefits of which must necessarily be local, it would be a wiser policy if advances of money were made for the construction of smaller works, such as wells, dams, and tanks, which might be constructed by the Natives themselves, which required no large and expensive engineering staff, and no contractors bent on making large profits. The expenditure involved in these works, instead of being confined to particular spots, would have the great merit of being spread evenly throughout the country. To turn to another subject, one might suppose that if there were any means by which we could ingratiate ourselves among the Natives it would be by our superior knowledge of medicine. We had acted in regard to this very much as with regard to other matters, as if the constitution of the Native was exactly like our own, and the consequence was that there was not, beyond the Presidency towns, a single hospital or dispensary that had the confidence of the people of India except, perhaps, the Homœopathic Hospital in Benares. Again, what had we done with reference to smallpox? We knew how to protect the Natives of India from its ravages; and yet we not only neglected to provide the requisite measures, but we prohibited by law what was better than nothing—namely, the practice of inoculation. The Bengal Sanitary Commission reported that before the adoption by the Bengal Government of the Prohibitory Act, 85 per cent of the population had been protected by inoculation, so that the effect of this Act was that if a Native inoculated his child he ran the risk of being put into prison, and if he did not do so the child ran the risk of being carried off by the smallpox. Then, again, look at the sanitary regulations recently promulgated; we discovered, not long ago, that we had been killing our English soldiers at the rate of 70 per 1,000, through the neglect of the most obvious rules of health, and so we suddenly turned round and inflicted on the people of India a collection of regulations, which, if enforced in England, would provoke a riot in every town, and have not led to a similar result in India, only because the people are patient and long-suffering. He would give a single instance. One of the regulations was this—

“If there be any trees on the village site or within 100 yards round it, cut off every year those branches within 20 feet of the ground, and lop and prune away branches within 12 yards of the ground.”

Now, there was scarcely a village in India in which were not to be found trees of a peculiar character, such as the ficus religiosa, the ficus Indica, trees which afforded a grateful shade, and which were regarded by all classes as objects of religious veneration; and yet the branches of these trees—which the Natives themselves would rather die than touch—were to be ruthlessly cut away upon the absurd plea that they affected injuriously the health of the inhabitants. He further wished to say a few words respecting our financial system in India, and more especially with regard to the system of taxation which had been introduced within the last few years; and in doing so he would pass over the glaring injustice of imposing the same taxes upon the province of Bombay, the land revenue of which was settled the other day, as upon the province of Bengal where the revenues had been settled many years before, and was consequently very much more light. He referred to such taxes as the Income and Licence Tax. If those taxes produced a very considerable amount of revenue to the Exchequer, there might be some excuse for levying them; but the fact was that for the last eight or ten years they had not realized more than £1,000,000 per annum from a country nearly as large as Europe. Then there was the Salt Tax. Now salt was, of course, as great a necessary in India as in any other country, and yet in the north of India we levied a duty upon that article which amounted to 2,000 per cent on its cost. This was a very important consideration at the present moment, when we were bullying—for he could use no other word—the Rajah of Cashmere, and were, in the opinion of some persons, taking the first steps towards annexing his country, because he happened to be levying a rather large transit duty upon an article which we coveted—namely, the wool grown in Thibet. This enormous tax upon salt was the most unjust imposition which any ruler, whether Native or foreign, had ever laid upon the poor of India, since it almost deprived them of the use of a necessary of life. It was impossible to doubt that the defects in our system of Government, to which he had thus briefly alluded, were very much increased by the fact that we neglected to take counsel with the Natives, and by the inclination we showed to employ them in the administration of the country. The Native sentiment on this head was set forth so distinctly and so admirably in a petition which was presented a year or two back by the landholders of the Aljpurh district to the Government of the North-West Provinces, with respect to the disposal of the education fund, that he trusted the House would allow him to read a few extracts from it. In the petition, which must be regarded as expressing the opinion of every Native Indian, the petitioners said—

“That while your petitioners pay for the expenses of education, it is obviously a hardship that they should not be allowed to take any part in the management of the system, or exercise any control over the disbursement of the funds. It is very mortifying to them to find that they are not consulted on any points connected therewith, and that, notwithstanding their having to provide lands, they know nothing as to the manner and purposes in which those funds are expended.”

They go on to propose that a committee, consisting of landowners and presided over by district officers, be appointed. They urge that the following important advantages will result from these propositions:—

“That the admission of Natives to the executive management will make them conversant with the details of the education system, will show them the real motives the Government have in view in educating the people, and, having this knowledge, they will reject all those unfounded prejudices and suspicions, the existence of which is not unknown to the Government; that the higher classes will become warmly interested in the pursuit of knowledge, and will heartily co-operate in diffusing its benefits far and wide; that the Natives will become better acquainted with the liberal views and intentions of Government, and that eventually our schools and colleges will be filled with a much greater number of children of respectable families than are found in them at present—a result most important and beneficial to the Government and to the public.”

That petition expressed the feelings of the Natives throughout the land, not only with regard to money devoted to educational purposes, but with regard to many other subjects. He would give one or two examples of what could be done by working through the Natives. When the cholera made its appearance in the town of Lahore some few years ago, it was considered desirable to whitewash the houses, and more especially those of the poorer classes, and accordingly an order was issued to that effect, and an officer was deputed to see how far that order was carried out. The order was not carried out at all. Here and there a little whitewash was sprinkled on the walls, but speaking generally it was disregarded. About the same time it was considered very desirable that the ramparts of the town and the waste lands in its vicinity should be turned into gardens for the use of the people; but the project failed, in consequence of the impossibility of raising the requisite funds. In the course of time, however, Natives of distinction were appointed honorary magistrates, with certain specified powers, which enabled them to assume an honourable and influential position. And what was the result of those appointments? He had the authority of a distinguished Indian officer for saying that the next time the cholera approached them and the order to whitewash the houses was issued, it was carried into effect within twenty-four hours; and again, when it was proposed to establish gardens in the neighbourhood of the town the sum of £10,000 was subscribed for the purpose in a very short time. Seeing what good results had flowed from the appointment of Native magistrates in the cases to which he had referred, it seemed indispensable that we should establish some machinery by means of which we might ascertain and carry with us the public opinion of the Natives of India. Some scheme of the kind, suggested in a paper by Sir Robert Montgomery, combined with a system of rewards so strongly recommended by Sir Donald Macleod, would be of the greatest advantage to our Indian Government. In conclusion, then, he would say that it appeared to him that the great defect in our administration was that we endeavoured to impose our rules and institutions upon a people not fitted to receive them. We should check, therefore, our legislative machinery, and devote more attention to the Executive. It appeared to him to be of comparatively little importance whether or not a Bill for the regulation of inheritances in India were introduced for the next fifty years, so long as justice was to be obtained cheaply and promptly. Whether the introduction of a uniform system of weights and measures was deferred until, at least, we had ourselves adopted such a system, so long as our officers had leisure to enforce the honest use of those already in existence. The Native mind, it had been truly said, centred in men and not in systems; we should therefore think more about training our officials than about manufacturing a perfect system of Government. He had endeavoured to show what could be done with the Natives if we treated them properly. Because Russia on the north and France on the south were advancing to our frontiers, it was not wise that we should think of nothing but defending those frontiers, and of maintaining what was called our military prestige. He believed that at no time had there been a less inclination on the part of foreign Powers to interfere with our rule in India than at the present moment. There was a period when we looked with feelings of fear and jealousy upon the movements of those Powers. Such feelings, however, he was glad to say, were passing away, and giving place to something akin to generous rivalry. He might be considered credulous, but he cared not—not because he was indifferent to the danger arising from a foreign foe; not because he was unmindful that we should dwell with our friends as if one day they might become our enemies, but because he had a firm belief in the great truth—a truth too apt to be forgotten because it had become a truism—that, whether in Europe or in Asia, in Ireland or in India, the only security and safety for our rule was to be found in the happiness and contentment of the people; and that it would avail us nothing in the time of our need, that we had spent thousands upon thousands on the fortifications of Peshawur, or millions upon an Abyssinian Expedition, if in the hour of their supreme distress we allowed our Native subjects to perish wholesale—by the slow process of starvation—within sight of the walls of Calcutta. It appeared to him that the time when we could hold India in subjection by what Lord Erskine called the knavery and strength of civilization, had long passed away. It was quite impossible—and this might be said to our credit—because we had educated and were still educating the people of India, because we were setting our own example before their eyes, and were teaching them the history of our own institutions—it was quite impossible for us to hope to rule them in any other way but in the true spirit of our own institutions. He believed sincerely that we were making the great mistake of endeavouring to rule them in the letter, and not in the spirit of our own institutions; and it was because he entertained this opinion that he had ventured thus to trespass on the time of the House.

Lord William Hay

MR. SMOLLETT said, it was not his intention to follow the noble Lord the Member for Taunton (Lord William Hay) in his very discursive speech. His object rather was to call the attention of the House to the very extraordinary manner in which the Correspondence originated which that noble Lord had made the text of his address to them. On the 24th of May, 1867, a debate was brought on in that House upon the succession to the Mysore Raj, and on that occasion the noble Viscount the Member for Stamford (Viscount Cranborne) supported the policy which Her Majesty's Ministers had adopted on that subject, and he incidentally mentioned in his speech—quoting the authority of Sir George Clark on the point—that on many occasions in India great multitudes of people were transferred from Native to European rule without their feelings being in any way consulted; and he added that that transfer was sometimes made in a manner flattering neither to their temper nor their taste. In making observations of that nature and in arguing from them the noble Viscount was only stating a perfect truism. The facts thus referred to were undeniable, and Sir John Lawrence must have known those facts. The noble Viscount did not say that, through its vices and defects, our rule brought famine and misery in its train, but that, although the British Government was unpalatable in many cases to the people of India, nevertheless, every opportunity was taken for extending that rule and bringing fresh nations under our authority. When generous sentiments of that nature towards the people of India were enunciated by ordinary persons, with the name, perhaps, of Brown, Jones, or Robinson, nobody thought anything of them, and they passed unnoticed; but when they emanated from a noble Viscount who held a high position in the Ministry of the Earl of Derby they produced a great sensation. When the noble Viscount's speech reached India, the Viceroy seemed almost to have been frightened out of his propriety, and to have thought that the noble Viscount had been teaching nothing less than treason. Accordingly, his Excellency could not help taking the very earliest opportunity of producing an antidote to that seditious speech, and he adopted a very peculiar mode of meeting the noble Viscount's statements. In his own language, Sir John Lawrence said that as there appeared so much to be said on the opposite side of the question he had caused a confidential circular to be issued by his Under-Secretary in the Foreign Department, calling upon various officers of mark throughout our Indian Empire to submit to him an expression of their respective opinions on that matter. Now he thought it was a very silly thing for a Viceroy of India to treat the speech of the noble Viscount in that fashion; but his Excellency took a very peculiar way of his own in bringing that subject before the subordinate officers of his political department. He availed himself of the opportunity, in sending that semi-official circular, to state to those subordinate officers his own opinions, and he stated them very tersely indeed. His Excellency said that he was of opinion that the masses of the people in India were incontestably more prosperous under our rule, "sua si bona norint"—which, when translated, meant, "if they were not great jackasses," and were also more happy than they could be under Native rulers. But his Excellency did not stop there. He told his subordinates that that was a good opportunity for proving the truth of his opinion by the collection of statistics from all parts of India. Now, when a man occupying the high position of the Viceroy thus indicated to his subordinates the nature of his own opinions and the nature of the opinions which he expected them to submit to him, it was not wonderful that in the Correspondence which was sent in he should get a great amount of information entirely confirmatory of his own views. The only wonder was that he should have found one or two gentlemen in India who stated views that were opposed to his own, and that in the case of Mysore—the country to which that Correspondence related—he received from a very high official in that State an answer wholly at variance with his own views, and one which must have filled his Excellency with something like dismay. He would ask why or for what purpose the Viceroy thus rumed and fretted when he read the speech of the noble Viscount? His ostensible object seemed to have been to endeavour to confute its statements. That was alleged to have been his primary object, but the real object was something a little different. He (Mr. Smollett) thought the Viceroy wanted to have in that compilation of papers, a concentration of opinion on which he might on some future occasion found an appeal to the English people: he wished to have a lever by which he might be enabled to say to them, "If you desire to govern the people of India on the true Benthamite principle of the greatest happiness for the greatest number, the only way in which you can do this is by seizing all the Native States and annexing them to your territory, and by subduing those that are really independent." The plain inference to be drawn from the statements of Sir John Lawrence and his satellites was, that the decision come to last year by the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for India connected with Mysore was a very fallacious judgment. Sir John Lawrence was a man who had always been famed for his friendliness to the policy of annexation. His Excellency seemed to have been foiled by the curious answer sent in by Lieutenant Colonel T. Clark from Mysore. Let them look at the way in which that Correspondence had been printed and circulated in India and had been received in that country. Let them also look at the way in which it was treated now by the advocates of annexation. He would not quote any extracts from the Indian newspapers; but would refer to what was published in the City of London on Monday last. On the 23rd of March, a letter appeared in the The Times, dated Calcutta, February 24th, from the Calcutta correspondent of the leading journal, and in that letter reference was largely made to that official Correspondence. The writer said it had attracted great attention in India, and considerable attention also in Mysore; that the people of Mysore were all agog about that Correspondence; that the coffee-planters of that district—and there were a great number of them—had taken alarm. Those coffee-planters were said to have been representing that the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for India, by his recognition of a native young man as the successor in the Raj of Mysore, had committed a gross breach of faith. They said that their titles to their possessions in that country were now questioned. They stated that their possessions were not saleable—or, at least, not saleable at their true value—in consequence of our continuing the native Government of Mysore. And the writer said that the officials in Mysore sympathized with the poor plundered planters. That they might well do, for their situations were not permanent, and therefore they grumbled. It was by no means improbable that they might at some distant period claim compensation for loss of property. But the writer closed with the significant notification that these things were sure to be the source of no little future trouble to the authorities at Calcutta and in this country. The meaning of that was simply this—that these troubles would be made a lever at some peculiar period with a view to endeavouring to have the decision of the right hon. Baronet reversed—a decision approved at the time by every hon. Member, he believed, except, perhaps, the hon. Member for the Wick boroughs (Mr. Laing). That was, in his opinion, the real reason why that Correspondence was compiled; and he believed that it was not drawn up with a view to refuting the opinions of the noble Viscount the Member for Stamford. Now, in the course of the debate last year, he had told the right hon. Baronet that he entirely approved his policy; but that, if he intended to carry it out, he must be firm, and he did not think that firmness was one of the chief characteristics of the right hon. Baronet. On that occasion he also said that, in his opinion, the great majority of the people of Mysore approved his policy. He thought now that if the right hon. Baronet would stand firm, he need not fear any trouble hereafter on the subject. The story of the planters, which had been dwelt upon so much as the cause of future trouble, was mere rubbish. He knew many of them in this country, and was in the habit of associating with them; and, as far as his knowledge extended, every one of them was friendly to a Native dynasty in Mysore. Last year he had ventured to state that if a plébiscite were taken in Mysore, ninety-nine out of every 100 of the Native inhabitants would vote for the continuance of the Native dynasty; and, if there was any doubt about it then, there could be no doubt about it now. Lieutenant Colonel Clark, whom he had known for many years, and whose opinion was entitled to great consideration, said—

Mr. Smollett

“I am bound to say that the people generally believe, however erroneous that belief in my opinion may be, that they would be much happier under a Native ruler than they are under the present régime. This feeling has been increasing in intensity of late years.”

Colonel Clark added that the principal reason for this feeling was, that we had been introducing the forms of our Courts of Law into that country, and that they were unpopular. Colonel Clark admitted the commercial advantages which had resulted to Mysore—that the country was prosperous—and he said—

“But the people still regard us as exacting and unsympathizing masters.”

He added, moreover,—

“The great mass of the people sigh for the return of their old forms and institutions, which,

with some slight modifications, are admirably adapted to their requirements.”

With that opinion of Colonel Clark, he thought the right hon. Baronet should adhere to his determination, and listen to no efforts which might be made by annexationists with a view to induce him to alter his policy. He might rely upon it that in remaining firm he would receive the support of the House and the country; and the best thing he could possibly do was to consign the Correspondence collected and sent by Sir John Lawrence to the waste paper basket.

Mr. FAWCETT said, that the censure passed on the Governor General of India was undeserved. He (Mr. Fawcett) believed he had collected those papers from the best motives, and a more able collection of State papers had never been gathered together. Although a political opponent, he was grateful to the late Secretary of State for India for his admirable speech which had brought this Correspondence into existence. He (Mr. Fawcett) thought it could not be denied that these officials had, at all events, not hesitated to say boldly in what respects our administration in India could be improved. He knew not which to admire most—their wonderful ability or their extraordinary candour; and they urged with most consummate skill the views of the noble Viscount, and pointed out that the Governor General had somewhat misunderstood him. There could be no doubt that our rule had made India materially more prosperous; but it did not follow that the people were more happy. One need not necessarily follow the other. Our rule in India had greatly increased the prosperity of India in three distinct ways—first, it had undoubtedly given greater security to property; secondly, we had improved the means of locomotion; and, thirdly, which was the most important, we had made the cultivators of the soil more prosperous and contented; and we might say that giving security of tenure and proprietary rights in the soil had increased the loyalty of the people of India. It was said by our officials that the reason why the people of India were not happy was because our administration in that country was often unsympathizing and uncompromising; in fact, that our fault seemed to be much more of the head than the heart, and that India was suffering from an excess of centralization. The fact was too frequently ignored that the rules of political economy were not, like the laws of otion, capable of universal application. A fact that the opinions of the right hon. gentleman the Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe) were carried out to an unfortunate extent in India. What was considered economical and good for England was considered equally so for India. The great point insisted on by the officials in this correspondence was, that we should never make the people of India—however prosperous they might become—so contented with our rule as they might be, until the natives of rank and ability were more fully admitted to social honours and municipal offices than they were at present. By so doing we should diminish the rigidity of our centralization system, and make our laws, as it were, the bond of feeling and custom between us and the different nations which lived under our rule in India. Mr Robert Montgomery, alluding to the spread of education in India, implied that we incurred a great responsibility; because we educated the people, and developed their intellect, and gave them a desire to take part in the administration of the country, our injustice to them was heightened when we stamped out that desire thus created. In one of the despatches it was said we were not so much from bad intention as from want of sympathy; but he ventured to say, that as the people of India became educated, and were fully admitted to share in the government of the country, our sympathy with them would increase—for sympathy was produced by respect. In speaking of our shortcomings towards India, we must not dwell so much on this or that bad law, or point to the fact that some Native Princes had been perhaps too hastily and unduly annexed to our Government; but we had much to answer for in speaking reproachfully of the people of India as a set of niggers. To make them contented with our government, we must not only give them good laws and an equitable system of taxation, but we must respect them as they deserved to be respected. We ought not to consider them as a barbarous race; but consider that when England was in a state of barbarism, India had a civilization of her own, and that she possessed a remarkable language that had produced an illustrious literature. The test of the efficiency and excellence of our rule in India was, whether we had done our duty in preparing the people of India ultimately to govern themselves, so that when we left that country we might say that we had discharged our duty by giving them so much of our civilization that in future they might become a greater and a happier nation than they were before they felt the effects of our dominion.

Mr. Fawcett

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE: I should not wish to prolong this debate by a single word if I had not a personal reason. But as the Viceroy of India has been good enough to spread throughout the length and breadth of India that I took occasion to doubt whether the system of British administration possessed, in the estimation of the Natives, any superiority over the method of government pursued in the independent States, I hope that I may be allowed to say in this place that I never said anything of the kind. I have no doubt the Viceroy drew his impression from an imperfect Report; but what I said was of a much more modest character. What I said was—

“ I am not denying that our mission in India is to reduce to order, to civilize and develop, the Native Governments we find there. But I demur to that wholesale condemnation of a system of government which would be utterly intolerable on our own soil, but which has grown up among the people subjected to it. It has a fitness and congeniality for them impossible for us adequately to realize; but which compensates them to an enormous degree for the material evils which its rudeness, in a great many cases, produces.”

I once heard it stated on eminent authority that nothing was more disagreeable than repeating one's own words except eating them, and I should not have done so but for the unfortunate prominence given to another version of these remarks. I venture to express my agreement with my hon. Friend behind me (Mr. Smollett), and to doubt whether it is desirable that the speeches of Members of Parliament should be made the subject of comment in official papers. I think it would be better if official papers contained remarks only upon matters which had previously appeared in official documents. With reference to this debate I must say that I am much pleased if I have been the humble instrument of bringing out these papers, and also of bringing before the House the remarkable and able speech of the noble Lord the Member for Taunton, which will be a valuable addition to the literature we possess in these papers. The sum and substance I take to be this:—You must have a despotism in India; you are naturally frightened at this despotism, because it is uncongenial to your feelings and repellant to your traditions, and therefore you surround that despotism with every imaginable check. It has now come to this—that there is no despotic power in India in anyone beneath the Governor General, and his despotism must be exercised entirely through the law. The consequence is that every agent of this despotism of yours is worried, hampered, and fettered by eternal regulations. You have all the disadvantages of a system in which the people take comparatively small, if any, part in their own Government, and you have not the undoubted advantage of the elasticity and vigour which are given by a patriarchal system of Government. I believe that these evils are only in their germ at the present time; but we see their tendency, and we see their result as stated by the noble Lord—that these regulations produce such an amount of employment in the way of writing and drawing up Returns, that the time of the officials of India is taken up to such an extent that they cannot mix with those who are under their charge, and ascertain the real state of public opinion among those whom they govern. That evil is, I fear, growing rapidly—the evil of over-regulation. If you wish to apply a remedy it will be done by getting rid of some of the departmental distrust which is an essential part of our Government at home. In India the departmental distrust is out of place. It would be better to run the risk of a few mistakes—of an occasional great blunder—to trust men more on the spot where they are conducting their Government, and to feel certain in the long run that the elasticity, the freshness, and vigour which belong to your Government, will more than repay you for any occasional losses which may occur in particular instances. That appears to me to be the sum and substance of this controversy. I will only say further that I trust that the critical Members of this House will not think that these Indian debates, thinly attended as they are sometimes, are waste of time. I believe the best service which any of us who take an interest in India can render is to stimulate in every way the somewhat languid attention of the people of this country to the affairs of India; and that we shall never thoroughly fulfil the tremendous responsibility we have assumed towards that country until there is more familiarity in the minds of the people of this country with the distant and somewhat unintelligible affairs of that great Empire.

INDIA—BANK OF BOMBAY.

QUESTION.

MR. DYCE NICOL, in rising to ask the Secretary of State for India, What is the present position of the Bank of Bombay; and, whether he will institute any inquiry into the circumstances of the failure of the Old Bank of Bombay? said: I am glad to find that the right hon. Baronet has recently sent instructions to the Governor General of India to appoint a Commission of Inquiry into the circumstances of the failure of the old Bank of Bombay, and I beg to thank him for an act of justice to the unfortunate shareholders, which was denied to them by the authorities in India. I may mention that the Bombay Government were shareholders in this Bank; that they had the power of nomination of three of the directors; and that they exercised that privilege in the appointment to the Board of the highest officials in the financial Department of the Government. And without its being supposed that I cast imputations on anyone, I hope that I may be allowed to urge on the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State that this inquiry should be of a most searching character; and I press this the more earnestly, seeing that the shareholders are chiefly members of the civil and military services of Western India, who, on the faith that this Bank was a Government institution, invested their money in it under the same feeling of security that they did in a Government Loan or in Government Stock. At a meeting held at Bombay on the 13th of January for the winding up of the Bank, an appeal was made by the shareholders then present for information as to where their money had gone, and who were the persons for whom their property had been sacrificed. The official liquidator replied to this effect, as reported in The Bombay Times of the 29th of January—

“If the shareholders wanted to make an investigation as to where their money had gone and who was to blame, it was for themselves to make it and not him. If it was to be one of his duties as liquidator, he should decline to take another step in the liquidation, and should at once place his resignation in the hands of the shareholders. He would not be the leader or mover in such an inquiry as the one suggested.”

The Accountant General of Government, then present, confirmed this statement. The opinion of the Governor General in Council on the subject of the Bank is given in a despatch under date of the 18th of ril last, addressed to the Secretary of State. It is as follows:—

We have the honour to forward the documents in the annexed list, and to state that it illustrates the scandalous manner in which the Bank of Bombay was conducted at the period to which the correspondence alludes."

I shall only add that I trust the Report of the proposed Commission will be laid before the House with as little delay as possible, so that it may have an opportunity of discussing the connection of the Bombay Government with one of the grossest cases of mismanagement on record. I ask the right hon. Baronet, what is the present position of the new Bank? I much regret that the Bombay Government has been authorized to become shareholders in it.

I had hoped that, after the disastrous experience of the past, any new bank with which they became connected, would have been put on an entirely different footing; but that the Government would have retained complete control over its capital and deposits; and I fear that the proposed appointment of an inspector over a board of directors selected from a community who have shown of late years so little moderation and prudence, will not inspire confidence. It is, Sir, most desirable that this House should have a full statement of the position of this new Bank, and the nature of the guaranty it holds out to the public. In conclusion, I hope that the House will permit me to say that I have no interest, direct or indirect, in these Banks, but have ventured to bring the subject before it solely on public grounds.

SIR HENRY RAWLINSON endorsed the opinion of the hon. Member who had just spoken as to the importance of the questions arising out of the failure of the Bombay Bank. The essential features of the case were these:—A capital of £1,000,000 had been dissipated, and in consequence hundreds, perhaps thousands, of most deserving persons had been reduced to beggary. And more than this, the sufferers were for the most part retired officers and civil servants of India, who had been induced to invest the savings of years in the Bank of Bombay, on the credit of it being a quasi Government establishment; or at least in the belief that it was an establishment under the supervision of Government, because three of the directors had been Government officials. The influence put upon the connections of Government with the Bank might have been right or wrong, but it had naturally given birth to a very strong demand for redress. That redress had hitherto been denied, and explanations even had been resolutely refused; so that the unfortunate shareholders were not even accorded the poor satisfaction of knowing by what means their wrongs had come upon them. The painfulness of their position had even been aggravated by seeing a second Government Bank reared on the débris of the old one, buttressed by the vicious system of Government connection, and advertised with the same delusive disguise of Government support. He would not discuss these points on their merits; he would give no opinion on the policy of a Government indemnifying shareholders; nor would he venture to assert that exceptional circumstances might not justify a Government in taking shares in a private concern, notwithstanding the late disastrous experience, and the fact that such a course was directly opposed to all recognized principles of political economy. But what he did insist on was a searching inquiry into all the circumstances of this lamentable failure, that the House might have the means of reviewing it, and giving a just opinion on the merits of the case. He insisted on this, not only in the interests of the shareholders themselves, but in the interest of the public at large, who had the right to demand full information. This brought him to another matter, respecting which he wished to appeal to the right hon. Baronet. The House would recollect that when the Government of India Act was passed in 1858, it was especially provided that although the Council was powerless as against the Secretary, except in matters of finance, its members might still have the power to record their opinions whenever they differed from the Secretary of State. These were the words of the Act—

"And in case of difference of opinion on any question decided at any meeting the Secretary of State may require that his opinion and the reasons for the same be entered in the Minutes of the proceedings, and any member of the Council who may have been present at the meeting may require that his opinion and any reasons for the same that he may have stated at the meeting be entered in like manner."

The evident object of this clause was to provide a constitutional check against the possible exercise of power in an arbitrary or unwise manner by the Secretary of State, since, by placing the recorded opinion of the members of the Council at the disposal of Parliament it brought those disputed points under the supervision of the House. This had accordingly been the practice ever since. In no single instance, he believed, had the recorded Minutes of Council hitherto been refused; and the House would remember that in the Mysore case, recently before the House, the Minutes of the members of Council both for and against annexation were appended to the Correspondence, and formed an integral part of the Report. He had therefore fully expected the House would be put in possession of the opinions of the members of Council, in the case of the Bombay Bank, involving as it did two most serious questions; one affecting private interests to the extent of £2,000,000, the other dealing with the adoption by the Government of a very questionable policy. The House would, therefore understand his surprise when the right hon. Baronet declined to produce those Minutes of Council. As reported by The Times of Wednesday last—

“Sir Stafford Northcote said there was only one such Minute recorded under the provisions of the 23rd section of the Government of India Act, and, inasmuch as it referred to questions having relation to the personal character of individuals about to form the subject of judicial inquiry, he did not think it would be right to consent to its production.”

He (Sir Henry Rawlinson) was not aware that any judicial inquiry was pending. He was aware that a Commission was about to be ordered in India to collect evidence, and of course the examiners would in due course send in their Report; but he did not see that the production of a Minute recorded by an individual member of Council would affect that Report in any way whatever. If, however, the Commissioners were so plastic or so subservient as to be affected by the opinion of a man in authority, then it must also be held to be most injudicious to have included in the Correspondence furnished to Parliament, the Minutes of Council of India, and the despatch of the Governor General. The same objection to publications applied equally to the Minutes of the Council at Calcutta and at London. Both sets of documents should either be produced or withheld; and, in his view, both should have been produced, simply because in cases of this sort no good would result from concealment. If the right hon. Baronet had acted wisely he would have gone in advance of public feeling rather than have tarried behind until it became necessary to demand of him what was nothing short of a public right. If the right hon. Baronet rose and stated upon his responsibility as a Minister that the production of the Minute would be contrary to the interests of the public, of course there was no more to be said. But the right hon. Baronet would, no doubt, name a time for its production, which would probably be at the same time as the Report of the Commission. But, sooner or later, the Minute must be forthcoming; otherwise, the precaution deliberately sanctioned by Parliament for enabling members of the Council to record their opinions would turn out to be no precaution at all, but a mere snare and delusion.

MR. KINNAIRD thought the Governor General of India had shown himself oversensitive; but that the feeling upon his part was justified by expressions which had fallen in debate from the noble Viscount (Viscount Cranborne), who had himself formerly administered the affairs of India. If we had left the country a little more under the rule of Native Princes, perhaps a greater success and contentment among the masses of the people would have been the result, and this, probably, was in the Governor General's mind. But looking to the security in the tenure of property, and the other benefits which had resulted from our rule, it might be said with truth that that rule has been on the whole beneficent in its effects, and history would show this.

MR. AYRTON said, that from time to time the House was startled by occurrences in India. But a few years back everybody was aroused by the statement that torture had been resorted to in the collection of revenue. Everybody denied the truth of the statement. The matter, however, was inquired into, and the fact was established. A year or two ago they learnt that hundreds of thousands of persons had died through the neglect of officials in India. His hon. Friend that night had brought under the notice of the House some circumstances connected with the administration of Indian affairs, which, though not so terrible in their immediate consequences, were yet exceedingly grave in their nature. The hon Member who had spoken last appeared hardly to understand the gravity of the question, which it was impossible to state without exciting a feeling of amazement that such things could occur, even in India. It was not simply that £2,000,000 had been lost to innocent depositors. A Bank had been established, after great consideration, by the Court of Directors of that day, with all the commercial knowledge and accurate business information at their command, and under conditions adrably calculated to promote the security and success of the undertaking. The manner, in fact, in which it was established was calculated to convey to persons in India the idea that the Bank had as much claim to their respect as the Bank of England had to that of persons in this country. And what, he asked, would persons here think if, one fine day, the Bank of England ceased to exist, and they were told that no one could be held responsible for the disappearance of one single farthing of the capital of that great institution? Such an event would startle the whole country, yet it was precisely such an event which had happened in Bombay. The Government had declared, "We will become partners in the concern; we will appoint three of our principal civil servants to represent us there; and we will have the rules of its administration put into a law, so that there may be no mistake about the nature of the duty which the shareholders have to perform." His own personal experience of banking at Bombay had probably been as great as that of any Member in the House, and he had no hesitation in stating that the rules laid down by the court of directors were admirably calculated to secure the objects which they had in view. He remembered learning Viscount Halifax, when he proposed the creation of local legislative councils, of the danger of substituting for the responsible servants of the Crown persons with no real position or responsibility. Now it was alleged by the victims of this failure that the Council varied and altered the fundamental laws of the Bank for their own sinister purposes, granting unlimited powers to the administrators of the Bank, and jeopardizing the interests of the shareholders without giving them any intimation of the change. It was clearly the duty of the Secretary of State to require a thorough investigation into every circumstance attending those proceedings; and that Government ought not to be allowed to screen themselves by the fiction of the responsibility of the Legislative Council. Again, it was asserted that high officers in the civil service had conducted the bank in a manner lacking not merely in discretion but in morality. This imputation, too, ought to be inquired into, so as to show whether every shilling was withdrawn from the coffers of the bank. The besetting danger to public servants in India at the present time appeared to be their relation to joint-stock companies; for they were tempted to waver between the discharge of their duty and the profits they could obtain by manipulating those companies. This catastrophe was an illustration of the way in which our Indian administrations were constantly breaking down, and the truth was, that while a certain system of Government existed on paper, a wholly different one existed in fact; and this was the explanation of much of the discontent which attended our rule. He hoped the Secretary of State would show that whatever demoralization there might be in the conduct of the Bombay Government, there was in this country a high sense of morality, which would insist on a proper performance of their public duties by local administrators.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Sir, the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton) has stated strongly, but, speaking with some qualification, I am bound to say, not too strongly, the case of the failure of the Bombay Bank. I say with some qualification, because I feel it necessary to reserve my opinion on the history of a transaction which is at present the subject of inquiry. I quite agree with him that the charges which have been made against the Legislature, and several high officials of Bombay, are charges which it would be discreditable and disgraceful for us to pass over without a full inquiry. An inquiry has been ordered; and I have received a communication from the Government of India, stating that, in accordance with my directions that they should issue a Commission, they propose one armed with powers of obtaining evidence compulsorily, and composed of two members nominated by the Governor General and one by the Government of Bombay. [Mr. AYRTON here intimated disapproval.] The hon. Gentleman cannot think it right that the inquiry should be one-sided. The inquiry should surely be conducted by those who have a perfect knowledge of the case, and the Commissioners will inquire thoroughly into all the allegations which have been made. I wish, however, to remark that when Members speak of the liability of the Government in a matter of this kind, they must mean the liability of the taxpayers of India; and it will be a question for serious consideration whether any case can be made out justifying the imposition of a burden upon them for the purpose of replacing the funds lost through the failure of the Bank. I have heard a good deal said on both sides with regard to that failure, and I am inclined to think that the inquiry will show that it is by no means so one-sided a matter as might be supposed from the statement of the hon. and learned Gentleman. I wish, therefore, to abstain from entering into the subject at present. In answer to the hon. and gallant Member for Frome (Sir Henry Rawlinson), I may say that I have, on the same principle, abstained from laying on the table the dissent for which he has asked. That dissent was recorded in the Council of India, during last autumn, and expressed the strong opinion of a member of the Council in favour of a full inquiry. Now, at that time, an inquiry was not contemplated; but, in consequence of information which subsequently reached me, the policy embodied in the despatch against which the dissent was entered was reversed, and a full inquiry was ordered. It was therefore unnecessary to produce it, and its production would be inconvenient; since the dissent is couched in very free terms, and reflects on the conduct of certain persons whose acts will undergo investigation. I may remark in passing that I believe the phrase I used on a former occasion was not a "judicial" but an "official" inquiry. Were these parties to be prejudiced by the production of a document entering into questions of a personal character, it would be only fair to give them the opportunity of representing their own case in reply. I think it would be inconvenient, and in some respects unfair, to produce the document now; but I shall have no hesitation when the time has come for bringing the whole matter before Parliament to produce the dissent and everything else bearing on the subject. The hon. Member for Kincardineshire (Mr. Dyce Nicol) asks me what position the Bank of Bombay is in, and what part we intend to take in respect of it. With regard to that, perhaps I need not enter at full length into the present position of the Bank, because I think it is described in the Papers laid on the table. I may, however, say that a new Bank has been formed under Articles of Association, and under the Limited Liability Act, which, I believe, is in operation at Bombay. The Government have taken shares in the Bank under those articles as a provisional arrangement, till a decision can be come to as to the terms on which we shall have any connection with it. It will be necessary to give a charter to the new Bank, and instructions have been given to the Governor of Bombay to impose such ample conditions in respect of the partnership of the Government as may be thought necessary. One of the inquiries now being made is as to the proper terms on which the Government may enter into partnership with the Bank. I may further observe that at the time when I assumed the office which I have now the honour to hold, I found this question in agitation in India. The question as to what was to be done in the re-constitution of the Bank of Bombay was not officially before the Government, but various proposals had been put forward in India. One was for the reconstruction of the old Bank, another for an amalgamation with the Bank of Bengal, and there was a suggestion of a wider character for the establishment of a great State Bank for all India. I found it to be the case that the Government were shareholders in the Banks of Bengal and Madras; and that the Bank of Bengal had power under its charter to establish branches anywhere in India, and might therefore establish one in Bombay. I was anxious to withdraw the Government from what appeared to me to be the false position of a shareholder in a bank; and I have no hesitation in stating that if by a stroke of the pen I could have cancelled the connection of the Government with the Banks of India I would have done so; but that was not possible, under the circumstances, as regarded the Bengal and Madras Banks. In a private communication to the Governor of Bombay, I stated my own strong feeling that, on the one hand, it was undesirable the Bank of Bengal should extend its operations to Bombay, and thereby enlarge the circle of its operations, and render it more difficult for the Government directors to exercise a control over its proceedings; and, on the other hand, it was desirable that we should withdraw from any connection—at all events, as shareholders—with the new Bank that was to be formed. I found that the Governor of Bombay was strongly of the same opinion. But, at the same time, I said that if it was found impossible to re-establish the Bank on any other terms than those of the Government taking shares in it, this might be done. For some time after I was under the impression that the Bank would be re-constructed without such a connection. The Governor of Bombay, however, found that to be an essential condition for the re-establishment of the concern; and, looking at all the consequences at the distress which might be occasioned if a bank were not opened; the proposal extending to Bombay the operations of the Bank of Bengal; and the great difficulties in the way of carrying out so great a scheme as a bank for all India—I thought, on the whole, that the least evil would be for the Government to take shares, at least temporarily, in the new Bank of Bombay. I gave instructions to the Governor of Bombay to state to those engaged in the reconstruction of the Bank that our partnership was for a temporary purpose, and that, as soon as possible, arrangements would be made to enable us to withdraw from it. I objected to the appointment of Government directors, and asked that some other system of inspection might be adopted. I put on record my opinions on this subject, and I would be willing to produce them; perhaps the statement I have now made sufficiently explain the reasons which induced me to act as I have done. I regret it should be necessary for us to so far depart from what I believe to be the true principles of economy as to consent to the Government becoming shareholders in a bank; but there was no choice before the Government, and I shall take care to avoid any liability as far as possible. Having said so much, I think it better to leave the question aside. All I can promise now is that a full and searching inquiry will be made; but when so much of the blame of what has happened is thrown upon the Government directors, it must be borne in mind that they were in a minority, and that they had no more voice in the direction of the Bank than any other directors. Again, one of the elements entering into their appointment was that those gentlemen held other offices, the duties of which they had to perform, and that they were not allowed to be shareholders in the Bank, and received no remuneration for their services as directors. It was altogether a vicious system. It was assumed that those gentlemen had control; while, in fact, they had no real control, and were not particularly responsible.

Mr. Ayrton

I am sorry to be only now able to say a few words on the subject which occupied our attention an hour or two ago; but it is one of the misfortunes of the manner in which business is conducted on this evening of the week that a Minister, when replying, has frequently to mix up several topics. I am sorry that the subject to which I have been adverting has intervened in the middle of a discussion of the very interesting question which the noble Lord the Member for Taunton (Lord William Hay) has brought forward. I concur entirely with what my noble Friend (Viscount Cranborne) has said. I feel that the speech of the noble Lord the Member for Taunton has been one of very great value and very great interest. I am entirely persuaded that it will be of very great advantage to India that subjects of this kind—that everything which interests that Empire—should be, from time to time, brought before this House, and that it should be shown to the people of India that what interests them is interesting to us. The papers which have been laid on the table contain, I think, their own justification. I believe that it is not necessary to go into the question whether Sir John Lawrence had or had not sufficient provocation, or I would rather say sufficient excuse, to address to the officials the questions which he did address to them; but I do think it important that such a body of opinions should be collected. I cannot agree with the hon. Member for Dumfriesshire (Mr. Smollett) that those were opinions obtained to order. I think they show this—that those who are intrusted with the administration of our system of rule in India do look at the people they have to deal with, and at the task committed to them, in a large and statesman-like and candid spirit. It cannot be expected that they should all agree on every point; and it should be borne in mind that those gentlemen are writing from different parts of India—one from one part and another from another part, and that they speak of the people as they find them in the districts with which they themselves are connected. It will be found that one of the characteristics of India is the difference between the different populations. What is true of one part may not be true of another; and, therefore, it is not surprising to find that a gentleman writing from the North should take a different view from that taken by a gentleman writing from the Central provinces. In these papers you will see a description by Sir R. Temple, of the diversity of opinion which he observed between the people in Behar and the people in Central India. With regard to this whole question, I would venture to make one general remark. I have often heard it asked, by what right we hold India; but I do not think it necessary, expedient, or useful for the House of Commons to enter into an abstract question of that sort. It is a very interesting question, and one which in the proper place may very well be discussed ; but an extremely useful question for the House of Commons to ask is, by what tenure do we hold India? —By what power? There are two answers to that question. Some say that we hold it by the sword. Others say, to quote the eloquent expression of Sir Bartle Frere, that we hold India "By the divine right of good government." But, with reference to one and the other expression, we should be careful as to what interpretation we put upon them. If by the expression "We hold India by the sword" is meant that by a very small force we hold 150,000,000 of people in rule against their will, that implies two things—great absurdity and great immorality ; because it would be absurd to suppose that by such a force we could keep such a number of people under British rule against their own will, and it would be immoral to so keep them for our purposes alone. But there is another sense in which I think that expression may be justifiable. It is no doubt an immense advantage to have the ruling power strong enough to preserve peace and order, and to keep the nation over which it presides free from foreign invasion and domestic trouble. No doubt, it is an enormous advantage to the people of India that they are under the administration of a nation which is able to prevent the disturbances of civil war and the robbery and plunder which weak Native Governments very probably might, and, in former times did, actually inflict, and we ought never to lose sight of the immense benefit we confer by rendering possible good government, quiet, and prosperity by the force which we bring to bear upon public affairs. Of all Governments, I believe a weak Government — especially in the case of a people not sufficiently advanced to govern themselves — to be the greatest curse possible. With regard to the other explanation of our tenure, that "We hold India by the divine right of good government," in one sense it is perfectly true. We do govern India in a manner very superior to that which prevailed in a great many of the native States and among our predecessors in that dominion. But if it is intended to say by that expression that because we do govern them better than they could govern themselves we have any right to go and take possession of the countries bordering upon ours ; or, in other words, to carry out a policy of annexation with a view to that end, I say we should be entering upon a most wicked and dangerous course. And, although we do give good government to those people, I do not think it would be justifiable to use that as an argument for the purpose of annexing Native States or refuse to them existence as far as possible. Now, I venture to point out that one very great advantage is derived by Native States from our presence among them. We keep peace upon their borders ; we set a good example ; we bring work and prosperity into their neighbourhood ; and, moreover, we have a certain duty imposed upon us, as the paramount Power, of interfering in cases in which gross misconduct has taken place in a Native State. That power has been often exercised with very great advantage, and has been felt as a benefit by the people. I would mention a case which occurred very recently, in which a very barbarous crime was committed by the Nawab of Tonk on the ruler of a dependent State and several of his nobles whom he got into his power. The offence was so great against the laws of morality that the Governor General interfered, took possession of the State, but not for the advantage of the British, deposed the offender, and put the next heir in his place. Where you have the great British power exercising its influence in that way, it must produce very great good. With regard to the other question of Native agency, I quite agree with the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett), that this is one of the points to which we must address our serious attention. This is a great opening we have got for training the Natives to the administration of their own affairs. In a very large proportion of cases that must be done gradually—with care and wisdom. I believe very great good is to be effected in that way. What lies at the root of that question is this — you should never forget that India is not one country ; it is an agglomeration of many countries, and what may be done in one part with safety cannot be done in another. The great object we have before us is to discover how far we can decentralize, and how we can introduce into the different States that principle of Native agency of which the hon. Member spoke. But we shall have that question before us on a future occasion, and therefore I shall not detain the House further now than to thank the noble Lord for the speech which he has delivered.

Sir Stafford Northcote

IRELAND—IMPRISONMENT OF MESSRS. SULLIVAN AND PIGOTT.
QUESTION.

MR. MAGUIRE, in rising to call attention to the punishment which Messrs. Sullivan and Pigott are undergoing in Richmond Bridewell for political writings in the public Press, and to the difference between the same nominal punishment for political writings in England and in Ireland, said, that neither the House nor the public were aware that there was a different punishment for the same offence in this country and in Ireland. Owing to the operation of an Act which had passed quietly through the House with scarcely the knowledge of any Member, the punishment for seditious libel in the two countries was very different. While the old punishment of imprisonment with or without fine was retained in this country, the punishment in Ireland was the most aggravated and terrible that could be imagined. In this country when Cobbett was punished for a seditious libel, pronounced by the Judge to be "atrocious," he was simply detained in Newgate; he conducted his journal in prison, was freely visited by his family, managed his farm, and attended to his private affairs. Mr. Leigh Hunt also conducted his journal while suffering imprisonment. At various times down to 1856 the treatment of persons punished for seditious libel in Ireland was similar; but in that year a Bill was introduced by the right hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Horsman), then Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, called the "Prison Bill, Ireland," which effected a very great change. That Bill was very much misunderstood. On the first reading there was no discussion; and on the second the right hon. Gentleman only said that its object was merely to transfer the superintending power over the gaols from the Court of Queen's Bench to the Executive, thus following the precedents established in the case of England and Scotland. Irish Members, therefore, understood that the Bill was to hand over the prisons to new bodies, over which the Lord Lieutenant would have control, and those bodies were to be Boards of Superintendence, who were to make regulations which were to have the force of law the moment they were sanctioned by the Lord Lieutenant. Now, in England they had several classifications among the prisoners. In Ireland, though the law was nominally the same, they had none. He brought no charge against the Irish Government, the Lord Lieutenant, or the Board of Superintendence; but if the law there were strictly carried out Messrs. Sullivan and Pigott would have their hair cropped, they would wear the felon's dress, and would have to discharge the most menial and revolting tasks, besides being kept in confinement for twenty-two hours out of the twenty-four. He must admit that the Board of Superintendence had done as much as they possibly could to relax the severity of that code, but those gentlemen were in solitary confinement for twenty-two or twenty-three hours out of the twenty-four. Two hours a day were allowed for exercise; but this was so irksome that Mr. Sullivan could only take one hour a day. The two prisoners could only see their friends once in three months, and then no communication was to be made to them, except on matters of a domestic or a business nature; and they were not allowed to see a newspaper. Yet all this time they were legally and morally responsible for the contents of their journals, over which they could not, however, exercise any supervision. If they were in England, they would be allowed to hold free intercourse with the managers of their journals, and could exercise such supervision. We were apt to refer with some complacency to France in these matters; but in St. Pélagie journalists under sentence were free within the prison precincts; they ordered what they pleased from the restaurant; they could play dominoes or chess; and the editor of the Courrier Francais was actually allowed to go out one day in order to attend a meeting of shareholders of his journal. This was French tyranny contrasted with English liberty. The treatment of the two Irish journalists had roused one cry of indignation from the English Press, and the sentence as carried out had not the approval of the public. Two things ought to be done. These men, who had suffered in six weeks more than they would have suffered during twelve months in an English gaol, ought to be liberated. Such a step would be approved by a vast majority of the people of the three countries. Again, the Government were bound to assimilate the law of the two countries. They should do this, not by making the English law as cruel as that of Ireland; they should "level up," not level down, and make the administration of the Irish law as merciful as that of the English law. These men made no appeal ad misericordiam. They were ready to suffer the penalty they had incurred; but no one anticipated the severity of their sentence or the different system which existed in the two countries. He appealed to the Government and to the manly, generous spirit of the English people to do justice in this case.

THE EARL OF MAYO: Sir, it certainly required some courage on the part of the hon. Gentleman to draw a comparison between the mode in which Press offences are treated in France and in this country. My belief is, that if any person had committed in France the offences which these gentlemen committed in Ireland their punishment would have been a very different one. Indeed, the publication of these newspapers, which has been going on for nearly three years in Dublin, would not have been permitted for a day in any other country in the world. I will dismiss, then, all comparison between the punishment of Press offences in Ireland, and, not in France only, but in any other country. With regard to the particular question brought before the House, I shall content myself with mentioning the exact state of the law in this country and in Ireland, and it will be seen that a very substantial difference exists in the two cases. In England, by the Prisons Act of 1865, it is provided that misdemeanants may be divided into two classes, and the Judge may order them to be placed in the first class. In that case they are not to be deemed criminal offenders; and there are special rules for the treatment of prisoners under clause 102, schedule I. of that Act. Thus, a Judge in England has the power of saying whether a misdemeanant convicted by a jury shall be placed in the first class of misdemeanants or not; and it does not at all follow that if Mr. Pigott and Mr. Sullivan had been convicted in England of this precise offence, the Judge would have felt it his duty to place them in the first class of misdemeanants. If, therefore, the Judge had sentenced them as ordinary misdemeanants, they would have been subjected very much to the same rules as prevail in Ireland. By the Irish Prisons Act it is provided that misdemeanants shall be subject to rules made by the Board of Superintendence, submitted in Dublin to the municipal council for approval, and subsequently sanctioned by the Lord Lieutenant. I quite admit that these rules impose upon misdemeanants imprisonment of a somewhat severe character. The rules to which particular reference has been made are the 9th and 17th. The 9th provides that prisoners shall keep their cells clean; the 17th provides that prisoners are not to see their friends until after the expiration of three months; and the 18th says that prisoners shall be visited only in the presence of the Governor or a subordinate officer of the prison. These are the rules which regulate the treatment of prisoners in the Richmond Bridewell. I will show shortly that these rules have been considerably and substantially relaxed in favour of Messrs. Sullivan and Pigott. The Board of Superintendence have the power by law to relax a certain portion of these rules, and other portions of the rules have been relaxed by the authority and on the recommendation of the Government. A great difference has been attempted to be drawn between the treatment which these gentlemen would have been subjected to had they been sentenced by a Judge in England to the treatment of first class misdemeanants and that which they are receiving; but I will show the House in a moment that they have been subjected to precisely the same treatment. I have here a copy of the rules under which first class misdemeanants are treated in Oxford gaol; and these are the rules which are observed generally in England. They say that a prisoner who has been sentenced to be treated as a misdemeanant of the first division shall not be deemed to be a criminal prisoner within the meaning of the law, and he shall be treated as follows:—"He shall be searched on admission in the presence of the gaoler," and so on. "He shall not be placed with any other division or class of prisoners." That rule has been observed in the case of Messrs. Sullivan and Pigott. "He shall be permitted to wear his own clothing." That has been done. [MR. MAGUIRE: Not by law.] It has been done in this case by law, under the power the Board of Superintendence have to relax the rules of the prisons. The next rule is—

"He shall be permitted to maintain himself, and to receive, at reasonable hours, any food, clothing, bedding, or other necessities; but subject to such examination and other limitations, to be judged of by one or more visiting justices, as may be requisite for preventing too much extravagance or excess. He shall be permitted to procure for himself wine, not exceeding one pint, or malt liquor not exceeding one quart, in the course of every twenty-four hours."

Mr. Sullivan has been allowed to provide himself with a small portion of wine, as much as he asked for; and, in fact, during the early part of his imprisonment he supplied himself with, I think, a small quantity of mulled claret every evening. At present Mr. Pigott has a pint of ale every day. [Mr. MAQUIRE: Is a medical certificate required?] No medical certificate is required. I am afraid the hon. Gentleman does not know anything about the matter. Another English rule is—

"He shall not be required to do any work, to clean his apartment, or make his bed, or to perform any manual office; but his apartment shall be cleaned, his bed made, and his meals brought to him by an officer or servant of the prison."

This has been done every day in this case. The next rule is—

"He shall be allowed exercise in the open air, either alone, or with other prisoners of this division. In either case he shall be attended by an officer of the prison, if deemed necessary by the governor."

This has been done every day in this case. I have been informed by the Governor of the gaol that if the prisoners wished to extend their hours of exercise they will be allowed to do so. Mr. Sullivan, however, has limited his time for taking exercise to one hour. Mr. Pigott, I am informed, takes exercise for two or three hours a day, and could have more time if he wished for it. With regard to association, I cannot conceive anything which would be more repugnant to the feelings of these prisoners than that they should be obliged to associate with the other prisoners in the gaol. As there are no other occupants of the gaol with whom they could associate, it is impossible to give them association of any sort. I am told by the Governor of the gaol that they never expressed any wish to associate with each other. There could be no objection to their doing so; and, in fact, they do associate with each other every morning. I am also informed by the Governor that Messrs. Sullivan and Pigott were not acquainted with each other before the passing of their sentences, but that they had now become intimate. The next English rule is—

"He shall, at his own expense, be permitted to use of books or newspapers which are not of objectionable kind—to be judged of by one more of the visiting justices."

I never heard that any application made by either of these prisoners has been refused. On the contrary, I believe they are allowed to have any periodicals or books they wish for. With regard to visits, the English rule says—

The Earl of Mayo

"He shall be permitted to see his friends in his apartment on week days (excepting Christmas-day, Good Friday, and any public fast or thanksgiving day), from the hour of half-past ten in the morning till twelve, and from half-past one till four in the afternoon, in the winter six months, and till six o'clock in the summer; and some officer of the prison shall be present at such visits, unless his presence be dispensed with by the written order of a visiting justice."

I am told that the rules of the prison have been very considerably relaxed in favour of these gentlemen; that the Governor has been told he might exercise his discretion; that it is the intention to relax the rules still further, and that these prisoners have been allowed to see their friends without the presence of an officer of the gaol. The last English rule I will notice says—

"He shall be permitted to write, send, or receive letters or other papers; but, before they are sent by such prisoner, or received by him from any visitor, or in any other manner, they shall be examined by the gaoler."

I fancy that is precisely the rule at the Richmond Bridewell. I have shown, then, that the fancied difference between the English treatment and that of these prisoners does not exist, and that they are treated precisely in the same way they would be had they been sentenced by an English Judge as first-class misdemeanants. With regard to solitary confinement, I do not see how that can be obviated. Persons are not sent to prison for pleasure; but, in compliance with the law, for punishment. The state of the case with regard to association is this. By an improved state of prison discipline association in gaol is put an end to, I hope for ever; and the separate system is adopted in all well-regulated gaols in Ireland, to the great advantage of prison discipline. The very construction of the prisons forbids association. I have no reason to believe that if association with other prisoners were offered to these gentlemen they would do otherwise than indignantly reject it. It would be no pleasure to them to associate with criminals convicted of pocket-picking or breaking into houses. So far from confinement in the cell being a hardship, I believe it would be thought a much greater hardship to be forced to associate with the other prisoners. I do not think, therefore, it is possible to make any alteration in the treatment which these men are receiving. I have taken upon myself as an officer of the Government, on my own authority, to authorize a very large departure from the rules which the Board of Superintendence have laid down. In that respect I have, perhaps, assumed an authority which did not altogether belong to me. I felt so strongly that the regulations made by the Board of Superintendence for the Richmond Bridewell were not intended for the treatment of prisoners convicted of this class of offences that I felt it my duty to authorize a departure from the rules. In doing so, I believe I only fulfilled my duty. By doing that I have caused the treatment of the prisoners to be assimilated to the treatment they would have received in England. On the whole, I believe the course taken by the Government to have been one tempered by mercy, and reflecting no discredit on that member of it holding the position I have the honour to hold.

SIR JOHN GRAY said, that as a member of the Board of Superintendence of the Richmond Bridewell, he was much surprised at the statement of the noble Earl—that the prisons in the two countries were governed by the same laws.

THE EARL OF MAYO: I said the prisoners received the same treatment practically that they would have received in this country.

SIR JOHN GRAY said, that at all events he understood the noble Earl to say that in Oxford gaol first class misdemeanants could supply themselves with any kind of provisions they pleased.

THE EARL OF MAYO: Yes.

SIR JOHN GRAY: Well, this privilege was denied to Messrs. Pigott and Sullivan, who were merely allowed the prison diet; for which, however, they paid at the end of every week, the object being to avoid the labour which they would otherwise have to perform. They were not permitted any choice in regard to the diet, which was regulated by the medical officer of the prison. It was paid for from prison funds, and they afterwards re-paid the amount. The noble Earl said that in Oxford gaol first class misdemeanants were allowed to have newspapers, but that was not the case with the gentlemen who are in Richmond Bridewell.

THE EARL OF MAYO: What I said was, that these prisoners were allowed to see newspapers which were not considered to be of an objectionable kind.

SIR JOHN GRAY proceeded to say, that they were not allowed to see The Times, or Illustrated London News, both of which were papers that could not be deemed objectionable. Nor were they permitted to read the Standard or the Evening Mail.

THE EARL OF MAYO: Have they ever asked for them?

SIR JOHN GRAY said, he had visited the prison only the other day, and therefore he was speaking from his own knowledge on the subject. It was true that for three or four days they were allowed to see The Illustrated News, but it was afterwards excluded simply because it was a newspaper. The rules of the prison, he might point out, were not made by the Board of Superintendence, but by Mr. Marks, the then Governor of the prison, in conjunction with Mr. Corry Connellan, the Inspector of Prisons. They were subsequently submitted to the Board of Superintendence and to the municipal council of Dublin, who referred them to the Lords Justices, by whom they were certified, after certain alterations had been introduced. He confessed, however, that he did not know what alterations had been made. The moment these gentlemen were brought into the prison the Board of Superintendence were called together; and they came to the determination that no relaxations should be granted except such as were in accordance with the rules and the provisions of the Act of Parliament, and an order was at once made under the powers conferred by the 13th section of the Act, that the prisoners might wear their own clothes. The prisoners, he might remark, were only allowed to be together during about a quarter of an hour in the course of the day.

THE EARL OF MAYO said, they had never asked to be together for a longer time.

SIR JOHN GRAY went on to say that, according to the rules, they were to be in separate cells, and the Board found that they could not put them into rooms with fire-places without violating the Act under which the rules were framed. They thought they might confine them in cells in one of the short corridors, and allow them to walk in the corridor, which was properly secured; but they found that they could not do this. These gentlemen had been convicted, not of treason or treason-felony, but simply of seditious libel. They were taken to a common lavatory by ring of bell at six or seven o'clock in the morning, and after performing their ablutions they were allowed to converse together for ten or fifteen minutes, and then they were locked up in separate cells. What was quired was that the same rules should be applied in Ireland as prevailed in England, and that there should be a proper classification. Under the Oxford rule, the first class misdemeanants were allowed to see their friends for a certain time every day. Now, in this case, one of the prisoners moved to have his trial conducted in the Court of Queen's Bench, but that motion was resisted by the Crown; though if the prisoners had been sentenced to imprisonment by a Superior Court they would have been subject to the Oxford rules. The Government had had them tried in the county, and but for the Judge they would have been placed in a county prison away from their friends. He gave the noble Earl, who stated that he had issued directions to have the rules relaxed, credit for goodness of disposition, and he hoped that the noble Earl would assure the House that the law in Ireland in reference to this matter should be assimilated to that which existed in England.

MR. O'BEIRNE said, he very much regretted that the consideration of this, which seemed to him to be a matter of some importance, should have been embarrassed by the introduction into the discussion of the names of the two gentlemen who were now unfortunately suffering under the sentence of the Irish criminal law. His hon. Friend the Member for Cork, followed by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Kilkenny, had put the case very plainly before the House, and the special knowledge of the hon. Member for Kilkenny had given a complete answer to the statements made by the noble Earl, on the part of the Irish Government, as to the regulations of the prisons and the punishments inflicted upon those who have fallen within the reach of this Act. The noble Earl indeed was himself obliged to admit that, as he found the case of the gentlemen alluded to was scarcely one which was contemplated by the Prisons Act, he felt called upon to assume a certain amount of responsibility, and to give instructions that the regulations should be to some considerable degree suspended. But, Sir, the real question at issue, and to which the attention—and the earnest attention of the House—should be directed, is this:—Did the laws at present in force in England and in Ireland impose a degree of punishment more severe in the one country than in the other for the same offence? That was the true question, and of grave moment. It was not sufficient for the noble Earl to tell them that the prison in Oxford was very excellently managed in every respect. Of this he (Mr. O'Beirne) had no doubt; but why did not the noble Earl inform the House of the regulations which were in force in the various Houses of Detention in London and its neighbourhood. However, he would not longer occupy the attention of the House; he would merely remark that, as it was admitted by the noble Earl that the severity of the prison rules had, in the unfortunate instance which had been alluded to, proved to be greater than the nature of the case justified, he (Mr. O'Beirne) considered the case made out by his hon. Friend the Member for Cork had been fully sustained; and he therefore hoped that immediate steps would be taken, not only to equalize the rules of the prisons in both countries, but, for the sake of both countries, to remedy a system which must be productive not only of dissatisfaction, but of much public scandal if permitted to continue.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WARREN) wished to state in reference to the trial of Mr. Sullivan and Mr. Pigott, that it was conducted before two of the most eminent Judges in Ireland, both of whom were Members of that House when the Act of Parliament, which was the foundation of the prosecution, was passed, and no doubt they were perfectly familiar with that Act, and the prison rules which were in force in Ireland. In sentencing one of the accused to six months', and the other to twelve months' imprisonment without imposing a fine, they had a due regard to the stringency of the prison discipline. It was quite true that they were tried in the county of Dublin; but that step had been taken at the pressing instance of the counsel for the prisoner, and with the concurrence of the Attorney General. He had no hesitation in saying that these men were tried for offences of deeper moral guilt and of a more mischievous character than had been committed by many who had been sentenced and were now under punishment for treason-felony. One of them was convicted of a series of fourteen seditious libels spread over a period of twelve months; and the other of seven seditious libels spread over a considerable time, stirring up the people of Ireland to join the Fenian conspiracy. He therefore thought that the punishment, having regard to all the circumstances, was a light one. He admitted that there was a difference between the law in England and Ireland; but neither Mr. Sullivan, who was a member of the Board of Superintendence, nor the hon. Member for Kilkenny (Sir John Gray), also a member of that Board, had ever called the attention of Parliament to this difference, or asked for any assimilation of the law. The attention of the Government, however, having been called to the point, they had done all they could to bring the administration of the law in Ireland into conformity with that of England. Difficulties, however, having arisen, he would undertake that a Prison Bill should be introduced, assimilating the law in the two countries. In the meantime, he might say that through the operation of the Board of Superintendence, every means had been taken to alleviate their condition. He read the dietary allowed to the prisoners, which was a very liberal one, and even included the supply of tobacco. On the whole he considered that the prisoners were not suffering a greater penalty than their crime deserved. Not a single request made by either of the prisoners to the Governor of the prison had been refused; and he believed the House would feel that Government and its officers were not open to any imputation for the course pursued towards these offenders, or for the manner in which they had been treated after sentence.

Sir John Gray

MR. BRADY said, it had been clearly shown that the law of Ireland was very different from that of England, and much more harsh and severe as regarded the treatment of this class of misdemeanants. He was glad to hear the Attorney General for Ireland state that it was the intention of the Government to assimilate the law of Ireland in this respect to that of England. That was all the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Maguire) desired, and he had therefore succeeded in his object. Had it not been for the humane recommendations of the medical men, the prisoners would be subjected to treatment far more severe than the Government intended.

MR. LOCKE said, he only rose to observe, that if there was uncertainty in the law of Ireland, there was similar uncertainty in the law of England. Some years back he had called attention to the case of two gentlemen charged with the offence of fraud. They were sent to Newgate by an alderman, on remand, to be brought up for further examination, and were, therefore, innocent in the eye of the law, but they were, nevertheless, subjected to very severe treatment. The then Home Secretary, the right hon. Member for Morpeth (Sir George Grey), directed an inquiry to take place, and the result corroborated all he had stated; but the answer was that such were the rules and regulations which the law permitted magistrates to make for the regulation of gaols. What, then, was the inference he drew?—that an alteration should be made in the law, both for England and Ireland, that would not leave magistrates the power of making rules and regulations for the conduct of prisons at their own discretion; but that some regular principle should be laid down for their guidance in all such cases. The two persons of whom he spoke had been convicted of no offence, and were innocent persons, but they were subjected to all sorts of indignities in the prison of Newgate. They had to clean out their room, and were put into a bath in which a number of other persons had been put before. This was a matter which the Government ought to take into their own hands; and the sooner the laws of the two countries were assimilated, and both brought into accordance with the principles of justice, the better.

MR. REARDEN said, that if a like outrage were offered to the editors of any of the London morning papers, not only the House, but the whole country would be roused. He exonerated the noble Earl and the Government of Ireland from any blame in carrying out the Act of Parliament; but the penal code of Ireland was alike cruel and mean. No such prison rules were to be found in the most despotic countries. He said, without fear of contradiction, there was nothing in the history of Poland which exceeded the cruel treatment of those two gentlemen. He strongly urged upon the House to make the laws of Ireland more humane.

OVERLOADING OF PASSENGER STEAMERS.—QUESTION.

MR. SINCLAIR AYTOUN said, he wished to ask the Vice President of the Board of Trade, Whether the Regulations of that Board with regard to the overloading of Passenger Steamers, and other Regulations intended to secure the safety of Passengers, do not at present remain unenforced; and, whether he would have any objection to bring in a short Act to provide for the enforcement of such Regulations?

SIR ROBERT ANSTRUTHER said, he also desired information upon this subject.

Q

MR. WALDEGRAVE - LESLIE objected to the monopoly which existed with regard to certain ferries.

MR. STEPHEN CAVE said, the question of the hon. Member did not state the case quite accurately. Before a steamer could legally carry passengers she must be provided with certain equipments, which were, however, not required by regulations of the Board of Trade, but by the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854. On a vessel being so provided, a surveyor appointed by the Board of Trade gave a declaration that the provisions of the law were complied with, and that the hull, equipments, and machinery were sufficient for the service and in good condition. As regarded passengers, the law provided that the Board of Trade certificate should contain a statement of the number of passengers the ship was fit to carry. The power of the Board of Trade ended there. The statute required that this certificate should be placed in a conspicuous place on board, and imposed heavy penalties if the number of passengers was exceeded; but no power was given to the Board of Trade to prosecute, and no funds were provided. As a matter of policy, he did not think that a Department like the Board of Trade should undertake these duties, which more properly belonged to the police; and practically it would be impossible for them to have sufficient officers to count the passengers and to watch every case. Any persons aggrieved by overcrowding, or any local body who might think that the safety of the passengers was neglected, could take steps to proceed for the penalties incurred. This had been done in many instances. Where the law was not enforced in this and many similar cases, it was owing to apineness on the part of those who were most interested in enforcing it. The penalties went to the Crown, and not to the informer, which might account for this apineness. The Government were considering whether any alteration in this respect might be introduced into the Merchant Shipping Bill, but he did not think it advisable to introduce such a Bill as the hon. Member recommended.

Motion, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," by leave, withdrawn.

Committee deferred till Monday next.

House adjourned at a quarter before
Two o'clock, till Monday next.

Sir Robert Anstruther

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Saturday, March 28, 1868.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILL—Third Reading—Consolidated Fund (£362,398 19s. 9d.),* and passed.

Their Lordships met; and having gone through the business on the Paper, without debate—

House adjourned at Twelve o'clock, to Monday next, Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, March 30, 1868.

MINUTES.]—SELECT COMMITTEE—On Ecclesiastical Titles in Great Britain and Ireland nominated.

PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Consolidated Fund (£6,000,000)*; London Coal and Wine Duties Continuance* (59).

Second Reading—Sea Fisheries (46); Indian Railway Companies* (57).

Referred to Select Committee—Poor Relief (39).

Report—Railways (Extension of Time)* (36).

Third Reading—Non-Traders Bankruptcy (Ireland)* (38); Legitimacy Declaration (Ireland)* (27).

Royal Assent—(£362,398 19s. 9d.) Consolidated Fund [31 Vict. c. 10]; Public Departments (Extra Receipts) [31 Vict. c. 9]; Fairs (Ireland) [31 Vict. c. 11]; Court of Appeal, Chancery (Despatch of Business) Amendment [31 Vict. c. 12].

HOSTILITIES IN THE RIVER PLATE.

OBSERVATIONS.

LORD LYVEDEN rose, according to Notice, to call the Attention of the House to the Papers presented respecting Hostilities in the River Plate. The noble Lord was understood to complain that the official papers on that subject which had been produced were very defective, and failed to give their Lordships the information that was desirable on various points connected with that question. He entertained the greatest confidence in the intentions of the noble Lord the present Foreign Secretary, although during his tenure of office this country had been plunged into one of the most impracticable and useless, as well as costly, little wars—namely, the Abyssinian war—probably because he had thought that public opinion was in its favour. On the present subject Lord

Stanley lays down the positive rule to Mr. Lettison—

"I have to observe to you, as this is a subject in which Her Majesty's Government have no direct interest, they do not feel justified in expressing any opinion thereon to the Government of the Oriental Republics."

The state of affairs in the South American Governments had been of late years very curious; and it was almost impossible to ascertain the nominal motives of the hostilities in which they were engaged, although the real motives were obvious. He was glad to see that the Correspondence which had been laid on the table was entirely free from any notion of interference on our part in those wars, the origin of which appeared to be an attempt on the part of the Brazilian Government, in alliance with the Argentine Republic, to get possession of the territory of the Plata. It appeared, however, that the Government of Paraguay detained a number of British subjects, chiefly engineers and medical men, in a besieged place called Humaita, and refused to liberate them, lest they should give information to the enemy or engage in his service. Mr. Gould, the British Consular Agent there, stated that a party of forty-six Europeans were so detained; but President Lopez denied that there were more than six Europeans in Paraguay, and asserted that they were resident in the State of their own free will, carrying out a contract entered into with the Government. There was a great discrepancy between the statements of Mr. Gould and President Lopez; and it was desirable that their Lordships should have the means of knowing what was the exact number of the British subjects detained; whether they were really detained against their will, or under contract; and, if under contract, what the nature of the contract was, and whether it had or had not expired? Mr. Gould said, that without the presence of a British ship of war, he could not obtain the release of our subjects; but how was a British ship of war to get up there? The gun-boat Dotterel had been stranded three times in attempting it. Mr. Gould had told President Lopez that he would hold him responsible for whatever might happen to our countrymen. One question which deserved attention was this—Were we clearly entitled to say that International Law prevented a State in besieged warfare from detaining the subjects of a neutral, whether under contract or otherwise, if it suspected that they might join or help the enemy? It appeared to him that if the Government engaged in this dispute they ought to make sure of every step they took, or else the affair might end very perilously and expensively. He did not mean positively to accuse Mr. Gould of any partiality; but he was bound to notice the contradictions in his accounts and those of other officers. Mr. Gould said—

"The Paraguayan forces amount altogether to about 20,000 men; of these 10,000, or 12,000 at most, are good troops; the rest are more boys from twelve to fourteen years of age, old men and cripples, besides from 2,000 to 3,000 sick and wounded. The men are worn out with exposure, fatigue, and privations; they are actually dropping down from inanition. They have been reduced for the last six months to meat alone, and that of a very inferior quality. They may once in a way get a little Indian corn; but that, maddox, and especially salt, are so very scarce, they are, I fully believe, only served out to the sick. In the whole camp there is absolutely nothing for sale. There must be, judging from what I saw, a great scarcity of drugs and medicines, if not a total want of them for the sick, whose number is rapidly increasing. Few recover, as may naturally be expected under such circumstances. Cholera and smallpox, which exist to a certain extent in the allied camp, are spreading very much among the Paraguayans. The horses have nearly all died off, and the few hundreds that yet remain are so weak and emaciated they can scarcely carry their riders. The last 800 or 900 mares in the whole country have, however, just been brought in. The draught oxen are in a dreadful state, and cannot last much longer. The cattle in the camp, some 15,000 or 20,000 head, are dying very fast for want of pasturage."

Captain Micholl, on the other hand (the officer in command of the Dotterel), spoke of the forces in high terms. Writing on the same day, and describing the same army, he said—

"At Corupaity, while waiting for Mr. Gould and the British subjects, I had the honour of being presented to President Lopez, who received me most kindly, showing me from a high position, with a powerful spyglass, the whole of his lines and trenches at Corupaity, which are of great strength, and I believe impregnable to the allies. The troops appeared in good health and spirits, and are an extraordinarily fine race of men. They do not suffer half the hardships that are reported. Large quantities of cattle and sheep were in the camps."

The question was, which of these two reports was the more accurate. It was difficult to decide on which side the truth lay; but that was the more reason why the Government should act with caution, and should enlighten public opinion on this matter. In June last Lord Stanley wrote to Mr. Mathew, stating that he had called the attention of the Chargé d'Affaires of Paraguay in this country to the detention of British subjects in Paraguay, and suggesting that a gunboat should be sent to receive them on board. Since that time we had received a new Minister, and yet appointed none of our own. The public were entitled to know why, if President Lopez had so violated International Law, as asserted by Mr. Gould, we should retain and receive his Chargé d'Affaires, and why we had none in Paraguay? The public were also entitled to know whether the Government had any accurate information relative to these contracts; and, whether, assuming that they were acting in accordance with International Law, they had taken the best course to put an end to this dispute. If this country were carried into war there would be no knowing where it would end.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY: As my noble Friend has given your Lordships an accurate sketch of what has taken place in these countries I need say no more on that subject. I am happy to relieve the mind of the noble Lord of the notion that Her Majesty's Government are about to embark in another Abyssinian war in South America. There is not the slightest chance of our being engaged in such a proceeding. It is true that certain Englishmen are detained in the camp of President Lopez; but our information on that subject is extremely vague, and it is impossible for me to say how a list can be made out. Mr. Gould was in a difficult position when he first went out, and he had great difficulty in obtaining information. The same might be said of Captain Michell, and it was to be expected that their separate accounts of what they saw would not agree. But the most important point is one to which the noble Lord has not alluded—the chance of our being able to put an end to this sanguinary war. I do not know whether the noble Baron wished Her Majesty's Government to mediate between the two parties. I believe that our interposition would do more harm than good. There is, therefore, no intention on the part of the Government to interfere until we see a much better chance of success than that which now exists. It is quite true that the desirability of mediation has been hinted at, but the Government have confined themselves to instructing our Minister at Buenos Ayres to do what he can to obtain the release of these Englishmen. I will not go into the question of how far International Law has been violated in the detention of these six Englishmen in the camp of President Lopez. I can easily perceive from the character of President Lopez, that their position is anything but agreeable. At the same time it must be borne in mind that Lopez himself is in a very peculiar position. He is blockaded in his camp; and it is not to be expected that, as he is beleaguered, he will allow any person to leave his camp and give information as to his means of defence, which might be useful to the enemy. I am asked, whether the Government are aware of the contracts with those Englishmen, and whether they have expired or not? We have no information on that subject; but it would naturally become a question rather of a civil than any other process between these persons and those who engaged them. It would be very difficult for us to go into a country so wild and in such a state of warfare. All that can be done at present for those Englishmen, will be to recommend our Minister to watch carefully the course of events and to obtain their release as soon as possible. I do not think your Lordships will consider it wise on the part of the Government to make any offer of mediation at the present time, and there is not the slightest danger of our being involved in hostilities in these countries.

Lord Lynden

EARL GREY feared, from the temper of Mr. Gould's correspondence, that if any discretionary power were intrusted to that gentleman, he would sooner or later involve us in hostilities. He thought it was extremely wrong for this country to allow itself to be drawn into a war on behalf of persons who, for their own objects and interests, had become connected with barbarous or semi-barbarous Powers. If any persons placed themselves in positions in which they were very likely to be ill treated by such men as Lopez and others, they could not expect the power of this country to be put forth for their release. He hoped no force would be placed at the disposal of our diplomatic agents; for if ships of war were sent to the spot, they would be tempted to make use of them, and England might sooner or later be dragged into a war.

POOR RELIEF BILL [H.L.]—(No. 39.)

(The Earl of Devon.)

COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee, read.

Moved, "That the House do now resolve itself into a Committee on the said Bill."
—(The Earl of Devon.)

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH suggested that the measure should at once be referred to a Select Committee, that Committee confining its attention to the provisions it contained. The tendency of the Bill was to increase the power of the central Board, a spirit directly contrary to that of the original Poor Law. Now, he believed the more that power was increased the less disposition would there be to serve the office of guardian, and the essence of the system would be destroyed.

THE EARL OF DEVON said, he thought it due to their Lordships and to the importance of the measure that he should give an explanation of its provisions, in accordance with the understanding on which the second reading was agreed to. If, after he had made such an explanation, their Lordships were of opinion that sound legislation would be promoted by the course suggested by the noble Earl (the Earl of Ellenborough), he should offer no objection. The object of the Bill was to remove various obstacles which interfered with the satisfactory working of the Poor Law, and to enlarge the powers of the Poor Law Board with reference to local administration. The Board had not the slightest desire of unduly over-riding the discretion, generally exercised wisely and properly, of the local authorities; for they would prefer to see the improvements which were from time to time necessary initiated and carried out by the local guardians. Experience, however, had shown that, in some cases, an opposition was offered to improvements which might almost be designated pertinacious, and that serious evils would result were it not for the action of a central authority. It was to deal with such cases and to remedy evils at present existing that additional powers were now asked for. The 1st clause was designed to give greater publicity to the general Rules or Orders of the Poor Law Board, by directing their publication in The London Gazette. The 2nd dispensed, with a view to economy, with the necessity of sending copies of Orders to the justices' clerks of petty sessional divisions; for gentlemen attending petty sessions were ex officio guardians, and would therefore, in that character, become acquainted with such orders. The 3rd repealed the exception contained in 30 & 31 Vict. c. 106, s. 2, and thus brought under its operation unions and parishes in the metropolis. The 4th clause dispensed with the consent of a majority of two-thirds of the guardians in certain unions to an alteration in the composition of such unions by the Poor Law Board. It likewise gave the Board power to deal with Gilbert Unions, a proposal which had been distinctly recommended by two Parliamentary Committees. The 5th clause enabled the Board to combine parishes with a population not exceeding 300 with adjoining parishes. There were many small parishes which did not seem to require a separate guardian, and which frequently did not possess the opportunity of an adequate choice. These the Board would have the power of combining with other parishes for the purpose of representation. He now came to three clauses, which had for their object to give additional power to the guardians in reference to matters that had of late attracted a considerable amount of public attention. Those clauses were 6, 7, and 8. Their Lordships could not but be aware that much feeling had been aroused on the subject of various matters connected with the management of workhouses, although the points to which attention had particularly been drawn were, in certain instances, the inadequacy in point of numbers, or unfitness of the officers charged with the management of the poor. The absence of paid nurses had been particularly complained of. The effect of the 6th clause was to give the Poor Law Board power, when the guardians had been called on for twenty-one days to appoint the necessary officers and had failed to do so, to step in and nominate such officers and to fix their salaries. The next clause provided for the appointment of a paid visitor. At present the Poor Law Board were empowered to appoint a paid visitor under 11 Vict. c. 59, whenever the Visiting Committee, which must necessarily be appointed by every Board of Guardians, had failed, for a period of three months, to make such appointment. But it was obvious that that provision might be evaded, and instances of such evasion had taken place. Meetings might held nominally once a month by the Visiting Committees without in any way discharging their duties. The Poor Law Board should therefore have power to appoint a competent person to act as visitor in cases where the Visiting Committee had failed to do their duty, or had not been appointed. Under the next clause, the limited power which the Poor Law Board at present possessed with regard to buildings was extended to the providing of drains, sewers, ventilation, furniture, fixtures, medical and surgical appliances, and other conveniences. By a provision in the original Poor Law Act, and subsequently by Amendments under the 29 & 30 Vict., the Poor Law Board were empowered to spend upon buildings a sum not exceeding one-tenth of the average amount spent in the union during the three preceding years. But that power did not extend to the matters to which he had referred. Their Lordships could hardly have watched the investigations which had taken place during the last eighteen months or two years without observing the great and increasing importance which was attached to these things. Their Lordships were aware of the powers in Mr. Hardy's Act, which gave to the Poor Law Board, in the event of the failure of the Board of Guardians to do so, power to provide the necessary articles in the interests of the poor of the metropolis. That power it was now proposed to give with regard to the country in general. And on this subject, he would take that opportunity of saying that the Poor Law Board could have no object but to see that the requisite conveniences for the recovery of the inmates were duly provided. Supposing Parliament were to intrust them with the powers they now asked for, it would be their wish and their duty to bear in mind the sources from which the necessary expenditure would come—namely, the rates, and to take care that the workhouses and infirmaries should hold out no inducement to unfit persons to enter them. There was no necessity for dwelling on Clause 9; but Clause 10 was one of a very important character. By that clause it was intended to extend the provisions of the District Schools Act, so as to make them applicable to the insane and imbecile poor chargeable on the rates. Their Lordships were aware that those persons only could be kept in workhouses who came under the head of harmless insane, and this was a very large and numerous class, and one for which inadequate provision was made at present. The object of this clause was, where unions had obviously no means of dealing with the imbecile or harmless insane, to enable them to combine into districts, such districts to be managed in the same way as the school districts were, for the purpose of establishing and maintaining a common asylum. It was with a view to give necessary powers for dealing with harmless, insane, and idiots that Clause 10 and also Clause 14 were introduced. Clause 14 gave power to the guardians—but, in the first instance, with the consent of the Poor Law Board—to send the harmless insane either to asylums supported by public subscriptions, or to asylums for the reception of harmless idiots, or to remove them from one workhouse to another. It was a permissive clause, and he thought the guardians ought to be invested with that power. Clause 11 provided that, instead of, as at present, the major part of the whole body of guardians being required to give their consent, the consent of the majority of the guardians assembled after due notice should be sufficient for the formation of a school district. Clause 12 was one which involved matters which must be dealt with elsewhere, and to which, therefore, he need not then refer. The 13th clause contained a provision which was necessary in the event of a separation of a parish from a union in a school districts, or the addition of a parish to such union. He now came to clauses which were of very great importance, calculated, as he believed them to be, to carry out and secure the application of just and proper principles recognized in almost every measure upon the subject of the Poor Law since the original Act of 1834. He referred to the clauses bearing upon the religious rights and privileges of inmates of workhouses, and securing to them proper opportunities of religious instruction and freedom from interference with their religious opinions. The principles embodied in these clauses were recognized in the 4 & 5 Will. IV., in the Industrial Schools Act, and in Orders of the Poor Law Board, which had most justly for their object the protection of individual religious belief. Experience showed, however, that the means provided for securing this religious liberty had not been altogether effectual. From the opposition of the guardians in some cases, and from other causes, it had been found that there were no sufficient means of ascertaining and recording the religious views of the inmates of workhouses, and that it had become necessary to have some more definite and clear legislation. This point was distinctly laid down by the Committee of the other House, which terminated their sittings in 1864, and their recommendations formed the basis of the clauses now proposed. Clause 16 provided, that the master or superintendent of the workhouse should keep such a separate register of the religious creeds of the pauper inmates as should be prescribed by the Poor Law Board. That was no new regulation. A register was to be kept under the Industrial Schools Act, and in the Indoor Relief List there is a column in which the religious opinion of each inmate is to be inserted. But that column was mixed up with other entries in a book kept solely by the master; and experience showed that a clearer and more distinct record was required, accessible to the ministers of religious denominations, for the purpose of enabling them to take the necessary means of affording religious instruction to the inmates. He cordially concurred, therefore, with the recommendations of the Committee that a creed register should be kept. Clause 16 provided for the keeping of such a register, and Clause 17 enacted that the master or superintendent should enter in such register as the religious persuasion of any child under fourteen the creed of the father, if this could be ascertained, and if not, the creed of the mother. In the case of an illegitimate child under that age, its creed was to be deemed that of the mother. If, however, it could be shown that the child had been baptized in some other religion than that of the father or mother respectively, the entry in the registry was to be made according to the baptism, unless the father, or, in case of his death or absence, the mother, should otherwise require. Clause 18 provided that, where all other evidence failed, the certificate of baptism should be deemed sufficient evidence of the child's creed; and, further, that if any question arose as to the correctness of the register, the Poor Law Board, after inquiry, should have the power of directing any entry to be amended. Clause 19 provided that every minister of any denomination officiating in the church or chapel of such denomination which should be nearest to the workhouse or school should be allowed to inspect the creed register at reasonable times; and Clause 20, that such minister might, conformably with the regulations of the Board, visit and instruct any inmate of the same creed entered in the register. By Clause 21, every inmate for whom a religious service according to his own creed should not be provided in the workhouse on Sunday, and on any other day required by his religion to be kept sacred, should be permitted, subject to certain regulations, to attend once on such days some place of worship of his own denomination within a convenient distance of the workhouse. Lastly, no child visited regularly by a minister of his own religious creed for the purpose of religious instruction should, at the written request of such minister, be instructed in any other religious creed, or be required or permitted to attend any other religious service than that of the creed under which it was entered in the register; unless any child above fourteen should desire to receive instruction in some other creed, and should be considered by the Poor Law Board competent to exercise a judgment upon the subject. He trusted that these clauses would meet with approval, and that their Lordships would be of opinion that they embodied sound and necessary provisions. The next clauses to which he would refer dealt with the appointment of auditors. At present the whole of England was divided into groups of unions, each group having its own auditor, who is appointed by the chairman and the vice-chairmen of the unions within the group. It has been recommended that this system should be altered; that the districts should be enlarged; and that there should be a smaller number of auditors—men who would devote the whole of their time to the work, instead of men who, for the most part, had other occupations. There were clauses carrying out these recommendations, and it was hoped that, in this way, a regular supervision of accounts would be secured. By Clause 26 the Board abandoned patronage which at present belonged to them relative to the appointment, in certain temporary districts, of registrars, who were now to be elected by the guardians. Clause 29 would facilitate the bringing of appeals against rating in which two unions might be interested, thus reducing the expense of such appeals. Clause 33 gave power to the justices at petty sessions to make an order upon a husband to maintain his wife; and in the case of parents wilfully neglecting to provide adequate food, clothing, medical aid, or lodging for children under fourteen, whereby the health of such children was endangered, Clause 35 gave power to the guardians to institute a prosecution, and made the offence one punishable on summary conviction before two justices by imprisonment for any period not exceeding six months, with or without hard labour. These were, he believed, all the explanations in reference to the provisions of the measure with which he need then trouble their Lordships. He was quite willing to refer the Bill to a Select Committee; but it would be on condition that the Committee should confine itself to the clauses of this Bill, and not discuss the general question of Poor Law administration.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY, whilst approving the proposal to extend the powers of the Poor Law Board, concurred in the opinion that the increased powers should be scrutinized closely. This, however, was essentially a Bill of details, and it was exceedingly difficult to understand its clauses without reference to previous Acts and Committees. Therefore, it would be desirable to refer this Bill to a Select Committee, which would be better able to discuss the effect of the clauses than would a Committee of that House. He concurred with the noble Earl that the Select Committee ought not to go into the general question, but ought to confine itself to the clauses of this Bill. One of the clauses which raised a doubt in his mind was that relating to the appointment of a visitor. The character of it seemed to be peculiar; for it proposed to enable the Poor Law Board to appoint a person to superintend, control, and inspect the guardians appointed by the union at the expense of the union itself. The general principle on which legislation had hitherto proceeded was that local bodies elected by the ratepayers should control their own affairs and pay for the expense of such control, and that the Government should provide an adequate system of inspection, and pay for it out of the Imperial funds. Without very strong reasons that general principle ought not to be infringed. Boards of Guardians were supposed to enjoy the confidence of the ratepayers; and it would be rather hard to pay a person appointed by the Government to inspect them out of the funds they administer. While expressing a doubt with regard to this clause, he thought it might be worth while to consider whether one kind of inspection might not be introduced, and that was inspection by medical officers. The present Inspectors of the Poor Law Board were not able to make frequent visits to any particular union; and they did not possess the knowledge and experience necessary to enable them to advise guardians as to the management of their infirmaries, the accommodation required by patients, the arrangements as to nursing, and a variety of details upon which it was most desirable that guardians should be advised by a competent person. Those who acted as chairmen of local Boards would feel their hands strengthened by the appointment of such an officer. He was glad to observe that the noble Earl had taken a power of establishing infirmaries in certain places. He did not think those infirmaries were needed in rural unions; but in large and populous places such as Birmingham, he thought they might be established with great advantage, not only to the sick poor but to the ratepayers themselves, in the greater economy which would ultimately result from the good management of the sick poor. The clauses providing instruction for the children of poor persons in workhouses in the religion to which their parents belonged were entirely in accordance with the general principles of our legislation. The provisions for securing contributions from men who had deserted their wives and families were excellent. He would not now refer to certain Amendments of which he had given Notice, and which, personally or through some noble Lord, he proposed to move in the Select Committee.

The Earl of Devon

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH moved that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee.

EARL GREY pointed out that extreme inconvenience frequently arose in unions from the fact that guardians representing small outlying parishes, and who never attended the ordinary Board meetings, went down sometimes in a body on special occasions, and outvoted those who generally conducted the business of the union, often preventing important improvements from being made. He suggested that there should be Poor Law divisions in the nature of electoral districts; and that each division of a union should be represented by guardians who, in their number, bore a just proportion to the wealth and population of the district they represented, and who should be as few as possible.

THE EARL OF AIRLIE pointed out that there was no power taken in the Bill for the erection of infirmaries.

LORD REDESDALE said, he could not approve any provision tending to reduce the number of guardians attending a Board. It was never found inconvenient to have a large Board. On the contrary, it was extremely desirable that a Board should be large and that many persons in a country district should be made acquainted with the working of the Poor Law Board—an object which could be attained only by having large Boards of Guardians.

LORD STANLEY of ALDERLEY concurred in the proposal to refer the Bill to a Select Committee.

After a few words from The Earl of Devon in reply, Motion (by Leave of the House) withdrawn; and Bill referred to a Select Committee.

And, on April 2, the Lords following were named of the Committee:—

L. Abp. York	E. Duclo
D. Richmond	E. Ellenborough
M. Salisbury	E. Kimberley
E. Devon	V. Eversley
E. Denbigh	L. Clinton
E. Hardwicke	L. Egerton
E. Carnarvon	L. Northbrook
E. Grey

SEA FISHERIES BILL—(No. 46.)

(The Duke of Richmond)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND, in moving the second reading of this Bill, explained that it had been rendered necessary by the new Convention on the subject of the sea fisheries with the French Government. During the passage of the Bill through the House of Commons, some points of law had arisen as to the effect which the Bill would have on certain fisheries connected with Ireland, and he had thought it right that a case in reference to these points should be drawn up and submitted to the Law Officers of the Crown. In the meantime he proposed to take the second reading of the Bill, on the understanding that the Committee would not be proceeded with until after Easter, when he would be in a position to state the effect of that legal Opinion.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>a</sup>."
—(The Duke of Richmond.)

THE EARL OF CORK said, that the Bill would to some extent "disestablish" certain oyster fisheries of Ireland, as they were beyond the three-mile limit provided for by the Bill, and were therefore left unprotected by the present measure.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, the noble Earl referred to the Arklow fisheries on the coast of Wexford, which had been under the control of the Irish Fishery Board. But the noble Earl had forgotten to state that oyster fisheries outside the three-mile limit were not within the jurisdiction of the Irish Fishery Board at all.

LORD STANLEY of ALDERLEY said, he objected to the Bill passing in its present shape, as its effect would be to offer inducements to the Channel fishermen to go to Ireland during the close time in the English Channel.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, that under the Convention of 1839, a close time had been agreed to and acted upon between this country and France as regarded the English Channel; but by the operation of this Bill that close time would be reduced by six weeks, so that the inducements to which the noble Lord referred would be proportionably diminished by the measure.

Motion agreed to: Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> accordingly.

House adjourned at a quarter past Seven o'clock, till To-morrow, half past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, March 30, 1868.

MINUTES.]—SELECT COMMITTEE—On Scientific Instruction, Mr. William Lowther added.

PUBLIC BILLS—Resolutions reported—Election Petitions and Corrupt Practices at Elections [Salaries, &c.]; Land Writs Registration (Scotland) [Salaries, &c.]; Industrial Schools (Ireland) [Expenses].

Ordered—Marriages (Frampton Mansel)*; Prisons (Compensation to Officers).*

First Reading—Marriages (Frampton Mansel)* [79]; Prisons (Compensation to Officers)* [80].

Second Reading—Local Government Supplemental* [77]; Reformatory Schools (Ireland)* [65].

Committee—Perth and Brechin Provisional Orders Confirmation* [74]; Marine Mutiny.

Report—Perth and Brechin Provisional Orders Confirmation* [74]; Marine Mutiny.

Considered as amended—Mutiny.

Third Reading—Inclosure* [73].

Withdrawn—Local Officers Superannuation (Ireland)* [17].

IRELAND—STAKE-NETS ON THE SHANNON.—QUESTION.

COLONEL FRENCH said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether he intends, in the present Session of Parliament, to introduce any measure to put a stop to the re-erection of the stake and bag nets and other obstructions to the navigation of the River Shannon, removed by order of the Special Commission on Fisheries?

THE EARL OF MAYO said, in reply, that, in consequence of a decision in the Court of Queen's Bench, a number of stakes and bag nets had been erected in the Shannon and other rivers in Ireland; and it was the intention of the Fishery Commissioners to make inquiries into the matter, and until their Report was made it would not be desirable to legislate upon the subject.

COMMISSION ON FALSE WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.—QUESTION.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, When the Report of the Commission on False Weights and Measures, referred to by him at the close of last Session, is likely to be issued, and what prospect there is of his being able to introduce a Bill upon the subject this Session?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, the Secretary of the Commission informed him that great delay had been occasioned by the death of certain members of the body, and he was not able at present to state when the Report would be ready.

METROPOLIS—BURLINGTON HOUSE. QUESTION.

MR. COWPER said, he wished to ask the First Commissioner of Works, Whether arrangements are in progress at Burlington House to enable the Royal Academy to vacate, in the early part of next year, the galleries occupied by them in Trafalgar Square?

LORD JOHN MANNERS replied, that by the terms of the lease to the Royal Academy the Government reserved to themselves the use of Burlington House until Christmas, 1869. Considerable difficulties had arisen with regard to the alleged interference with the lights of the Albany, which had delayed the prosecution of the works, and he was not able to say whether the works would have so far progressed as to enable the Exhibition of the Royal Academy to be held there next year.

IRELAND—SEARCHING SUSPICIOUS PERSONS.—QUESTION.

MR. BLAKE said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether he has seen an account of the Government authorities at Cork having compelled two respectable girls who were present at Mackay's trial (one the sister-in-law to the prisoner) to undress in an exposed room, in disregard of their entreaties that the blind of the window should be drawn down while they were undressing; and to ask if he will direct inquiries to be made as to whether that account is true?

THE EARL OF MAYO said, in reply, that his attention had not been called to the circumstances of this case until he saw the Notice of the hon. Member on the Paper. He had made inquiries upon the subject, and he had been furnished with a Report from the Constabulary Officer, of which the following was an abstract:—

“On the day of Mackay's trial for murder much excitement prevailed, and a report was generally circulated that, in the event of conviction, an attempt would be made to rescue, and therefore orders were given that all suspicious persons should be excluded from the Court. The actions of three females while in Court attracted the attention of the police, and roused suspicion, as it was supposed that they might have revolvers or some explosive substance concealed about them. Accordingly, when the Court adjourned, they were brought to the housekeeper's room, where they were searched by the female searcher. Two submitted to the search; the other refused, and she was not searched. The room to which they were taken had no blind to the window; but no person could see into it, as it was only overlooked by the windows of the Judge's and Jury's room, all of whom had left the Court, which was shut up at the time.”

ARMY—COOKING APPARATUS. QUESTION.

MR. THOMSON HANKEY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, If an Army Cooking Apparatus, made and patented by Messrs. Jeakes and Co., has been submitted to or reported on to him; and whether it is not a much cheaper and much more efficient Cooking Apparatus than that of Captain Warren, R.N.?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON replied, that he was unable to answer the Question of the hon. Member, as the apparatus had not been reported upon. He had given directions that both apparatuses should be tried at the Wellington Barracks.

IRELAND—CASE OF MR. JOHNSTON.

QUESTION.

COLONEL FORDE said, he wished to ask, Whether the Government will authorize the Governor of Downpatrick Gaol to allow the friends of Mr. Johnston to see him in private, and on his parole to take exercise through the gaol grounds?

THE EARL OF MAYO said, in reply, that he would remind the hon. and gallant Gentleman that Mr. Johnston might, if he had pleased, have left the gaol on the 10th of March last, for his sentence was commuted by the Lord Lieutenant on condition that he should enter into his own recognizances. This he refused to do, and he therefore still remained in gaol. He had every reason to believe that the ordinary regulations of the gaol had been considerably relaxed in Mr. Johnston's favour; but, although it was not his province to interfere with these matters, he had written to the Governor to intimate that no objection would be offered on the part of the Government to the relaxation of the rules of the gaol, provided that relaxation were made in accordance with the wishes and views expressed by the Board of Superintendence.

ESTABLISHED CHURCH (IRELAND).

MOTION FOR A COMMITTEE.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I beg to move that the Acts relating to the Established Church in Ireland be read.

Acts [39 and 40 Geo. 3, c. 67; 3 and 4 Will. 4, c. 37; 1 and 2 Vic. c. 109; and 1 Will. and Mary, c. 6] read.

COLONEL STUART KNOX moved that the 5th Article of the Act of Union be read.

The CLERK then read the following Article:—

"That it be the 5th Article of Union that the Churches of England and Ireland, as now by law established, be united into one Protestant Episcopal Church, to be called the United Church of England and Ireland; and that the doctrine, worship, discipline, and government of the said United Church shall be and shall remain in full force for ever, as the same are now by law established for the Church of England; and that the continuance and preservation of the said United Church, as the Established Church of England and Ireland, shall be deemed and taken to be an essential and fundamental part of the Union; and that in like manner the doctrine, worship, discipline, and government of the Church of Scotland shall remain and be preserved as the same are now established by law, and by the Acts for the Union of the Two Kingdoms of England and Scotland."

MR. H. E. SURTEES moved that the Clerk read that portion of the Act of William and Mary that now applied to the Coronation Oath of Her Majesty.

The CLERK read the following formula prescribed for use on such occasions by the Act referred to:—

"ARCHBISHOP.—Will you solemnly promise and swear to govern the people of this United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and the dominions thereto belonging, according to the statutes in Parliament agreed on and the respective laws and customs of the same?

"QUEEN.—I solemnly promise so to do.

"ARCHBISHOP.—Will you to your power cause law and justice in mercy to be executed in all your judgments?

"QUEEN.—I will.

"ARCHBISHOP.—Will you to the utmost of your power maintain the laws of God, the true profession of the Gospel, and the Protestant reformed religion established by law, and will you maintain and preserve inviolably the settlement of the United Church of England and Ireland, and the doctrine, worship, discipline, and government thereof, as by law established within England and Ireland, and the territories thereunto belonging? And will you preserve unto the bishops and clergy of England and Ireland, and to the churches there committed to their charge, all such rights and privileges as by law do or shall appertain to them or any of them?

"QUEEN.—All this I promise to do.

"Then the Queen, taking the coronation oath, would say these words—'The things which I have here before promised I will perform and keep. So help me God.'"

MR. GLADSTONE: I now rise, Sir, to move that this House will immediately resolve itself into a Committee to consider the said Acts—that is to say, the Acts relating to the Established Church in Ireland; and I cannot for a moment regret that the Gentlemen who have just interposed Motions, accepted as matter of course by the House, should, by the passages they have caused to be read from the existing laws of this country, have reminded us upon how solemn a duty we are now about to enter. I likewise construe those Motions as implying that there are in this House men who intend to meet the plain, the broad, and intelligible proposition which I ask the House to accept by other propositions equally plain, broad, and intelligible, and that the great controversy—the solemn controversy, for such it is—in which we are about to engage, is not to be degraded.

into a warfare of trick and contrivance, but is to be conducted on the other side of the House, as well as on this, in a spirit which befits the magnitude of the issue. Now, Sir, I originally proposed the Resolutions which I have placed on the Paper under the expectation that I should have explained them to a Committee of the whole House; but the noble Lord (Lord Stanley) exercising a perfectly legitimate discretion, has appended to the comparatively formal Motion, as far as its words are concerned, which I now propose to make, an Amendment raising the merits of the case, and has thus thrown upon me the responsibility and duty of endeavouring to explain to the House without delay the general nature of the proposition which I wish to submit to it in antagonism to that of the noble Lord. Sir, I intend to ask the House, if it should go into Committee, to assert in the first place, that in our opinion the time has come when the Established Church of Ireland should cease to exist as an Establishment. I do not think it would become me, either at the present moment, or at any subsequent stage of the debate, which may or may not follow, to make myself responsible, in all its important and complex details, for a plan which shall have for its aim to give effect to my purpose. It would show, I think, entire forgetfulness both of the limits of my duty and of the resources which I have at my command, and likewise forgetfulness of the limits of duty pertaining to a party in opposition to Her Majesty's Government, were I to undertake responsibility for the details of such a plan. At the same time I think, on the other hand, that I should not be justified in endeavouring to shelter myself under the freedom of a Member of the Opposition from distinctly indicating to the Government, the House, and the country the general bases and conditions of the measure which I wish to suggest for consideration. Therefore, Sir, I say, partly repeating and partly enlarging words which I used on a former occasion, that the aim and purpose of that measure is to cause the cessation of the Established Church of Ireland as far as it is a national Establishment of religion. That cessation must, in my judgment—I will not merely say might, nor ought, but, in my judgment, absolutely must—be subject to the condition, in order to make it an honourable and worthy measure, that every proprietary and every vested right shall receive absolute compensation and satisfaction. And beyond that I go one step by saying that as in an operation so extended there will necessarily arise matters to be considered which are as much or more matters of feeling than of strict rule and principle, and as there will be likewise points which may be subject to fair and legitimate doubt, my opinion is that every disposition should exist to indulge and to conciliate feeling when it can be done, and in every doubtful case to adopt that mode of proceeding which may be most consistent with principles of the largest equity. Sir, if I am asked, what I look upon as the conditions under which the State should endeavour to enter upon a new state of things, as far as regards the religious Establishment in Ireland—if I am asked what it is that, in endeavouring to put an end to the present Establishment, I renounce for the future, I would again say that that which I renounce for the future is the attempt to maintain, in association with the State, under the authority of the State, or supported by the income of the State, or by public or national property in any form, a salaried or stipendiary clergy. But as those connected with the Established religion of Ireland are not the only persons interested in this matter, it is right that I should say, in regard to other bodies who now receive grants for purposes of religion, either directly for religious worship or for education having religious worship for its ultimate end, that, in my opinion, the more limited cases of those bodies must be met by the application of analogous principles of justice, equity, and even, I would say, indulgence; but beyond that I hold that the aim of all these proceedings would be to comply—as far as I understood the words read by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck) to comply with the language of the prayer of a petition he has presented, and to put an end within the realm of Ireland to all Grants from the Consolidated Fund to be applied for purposes of any religious denomination whatever. Having said this much I think I have only to add one more proposition, and to say that, when after satisfying every just and equitable claim, we shall have to contemplate at some future time the application of a residue, that residue will have, in my judgment, to be treated strictly and simply as an Irish fund for the benefit of Ireland. I think that with these words I have satisfied the duty incumbent on me, not of proposing a distinct and perfect project upon this great subject, but of indicating to Parliament the line which I humbly ask it, and would fain urge it to pursue. I cannot fail to observe, in the preliminary skirmishing on this important question—whether it be owing to a scarcity of other arguments I know not, and, perhaps, it would not be fair for me to insinuate that it is so; but, undoubtedly, there has been thus far a most copious use of that kind of argument which sometimes indicates a scarcity of other kinds—I mean the argumentum ad hominem. Much blame has been bestowed upon Liberal Governments and upon the Liberal party for not having sooner addressed itself to a settlement of the question of the Irish Church; and it has been contended that, as the Liberal party has not done so in former years, it is neither entitled nor warranted to attempt it now. There is no doubt about the fact that for thirty years—that is to say, since 1838—no serious effort has been made by the Liberal party as a whole, or by any Government, Liberal or Conservative, to open up the question of the Irish Church, and those who may think fit to review the various Motions that have been made by Members anxious, at all events, to keep alive the discussion will find that, for the most part they have been Motions of an exceedingly indecisive character, sometimes for a Select Committee, sometimes for a general consideration of the matter, sometimes to recommend it to the consideration of the Government, but never going to the root—never proposing that the existence of the Irish Church as an Established Church, should be brought definitively to a close. And, for one, I do not hesitate to say that, in my judgment, the Liberal party and Governments of all kinds—both Liberal and Conservative—have been perfectly justified in that course. There has been no state of things, in my opinion, in this country, and especially in Ireland—in the feeling and opinion of Ireland—which would have enabled this great question to be opened upon a basis of that breadth which it requires; and I own that the votes which I have myself given upon various Motions have been given against partial measures intending partial application of remedial principles, and those votes I am willing to admit I would repeat. I hold, Sir, that those who profess Liberal principles in this House are open to no charge of having failed to bring under discussion this great question, with a view to definitive settlement, until they saw that the time had arrived—this is a matter which I am not going to assume, but which I shall presently endeavour to prove—until they saw that the time had arrived when there was a prospect of carrying their views to a successful issue. As to myself, nothing could be more lowering to the tone of the debates in this House than that I should for a moment suppose that considerations personal to myself can affect the issue of a contest such as that which we are about to try. We have heard so much of late, not only of apostacy, but of sudden apostacy, that I will venture, without detaining the House for more than two minutes, to make this observation. Suddenness is a relative term; there are many in this House who know it to be a relative term. All I will say on that point is, that a change which extends itself over a quarter of a century, when estimated by the true standard—that is, with reference to the ordinary length of human life—is hardly to be esteemed a sudden change. In 1846 I was invited by a person of great influence—having then lost my seat on account of the Corn Laws—to oppose a Member of Lord Russell's Cabinet, and thus endeavour to obtain for myself a seat in Parliament. I have in my possession the reply which I made, and in which I state that it was impossible for me to oppose that Gentleman—first, because we were then engaged in the controversy of Free Trade, in which we had fought upon the same side; and, secondly, another great question which I then thought might come forward was the question of the Irish Church: he was opposed to it, and it was impossible for me to pledge myself upon principle to maintain it. In the following year I had a more searching test, for I had a contest of four months' duration for the University of Oxford. Application was made to me to know what position I took up with respect to the Irish Church, and my answer was that I did not anticipate the proposal of a plan which would lead me to vote for a change in the Ecclesiastical Establishment of Ireland; but that to maintain it in principle I must entirely decline. I saw no such likelihood. But in the year 1865 it appeared to me that in the then coming Parliament we probably should have to deal with this question of the Irish Church. And therefore I took the opportunity, for the fair warning and notice of my constituents, of making a speech in which I detached myself entirely and absolutely from the maintenance of the Irish Church, either on a larger or on a more contracted scale. Having had that notice they, as they were perfectly entitled to do, took advantage of it; and the consequence is that I am not Member for Oxford University, but Member for South Lancashire. I pass on to describe what I own I have a strong persuasion has not presented itself in full to the minds of hon. Gentlemen on that side of the House—perhaps not in full to the minds of hon. Gentlemen on this side. Having undertaken the great and heavy responsibility—for a heavy responsibility it is—of making this proposal, I wish to indicate concisely to the House the position in which, as it appears to me, the proposal, if accepted, would leave what I should then have to call, not the Irish Established Church—but, for the sake of distinction, I will call it the Anglican Communion in Ireland. We should begin by a recognition of every vested interest. And I am bound to say, in speaking of vested interests, that it appears to me at least a matter for argument and consideration, whether we can strictly and absolutely limit the phrase to those who are in possession of benefices, or whether some regard ought not possibly to be had—though it would be premature to give an opinion upon the point—to the case of those who have devoted themselves to an indelible profession, that separates them from the great bulk of profitable secular employments, in expectation of the benefices which we have kept in existence by law under our authority, even though they may not actually have entered upon them. Do not suppose that I wish to commit anyone by any admissions upon that subject, or to say that these cases rest on the same foundation as well-defined vested interests. I say nothing of the kind. All I say is that I, for one, do not at this moment absolutely shut the door against them. Well, Sir, with regard to this question of recognition of vested interests, I apprehend that, if the Irish Church were disestablished, none would propose to deprive those who have worshipped in its sacred fabrics of the future possession and use of those fabrics, provided they are willing to maintain them, and to apply them to religious purposes. On that subject I feel the utmost confidence, and I feel almost an equal confidence that the very same lenient judgment which goes to the Church would go likewise to that which is inseparably connected with the Church—I mean the residences of the clergy. In addition to this, we are told, and fairly told, that the great bulk of the proprietors of the soil of Ireland are members of the Established Church of Ireland. I apprehend I am not wrong in assuming, first, that the proprietors of advowsons would have the strictest and the most absolute claim to full compensation for the value of their property; and, secondly, that these proprietors of advowsons—who, I am aware, are not nearly as numerous, relatively to the whole number of benefices, as they are in England, the benefices in private gift in Ireland only amounting, roughly, to one-sixth of the whole—are in the vast majority of cases, members of the Established Church, and to them would be paid the money which the State would find to be the value of these advowsons. There is another class—I am afraid not a very extensive one—the category of recent endowments; of persons, some of them even now living, some of them but lately gone from among us, who have out of their own means and liberality, built churches and devoted funds for the purposes of the Established Church in Ireland. Such endowments, I apprehend, would, under all circumstances, be respected. Now, putting together these various items—and this is but an imperfect sketch; it has no pretence whatever to be a definite statement—I believe that the effect of this much-dreaded disestablishment of the Church, conducted as I have endeavoured to describe it, would be this, that if the full money-value of the entire possessions of the Irish Church, fairly sold in open market, were estimated, certainly not less than three-fifths, possibly two-thirds, would remain in the hands of members of the Anglican Communion. I know not with what feeling hon. Gentlemen may listen to that announcement. It is an announcement which, as far as I am concerned with it, I make quite irrespective of the reception it may meet with. It is a matter of fact. It is the best estimate that I can make: and my belief is, that between these limits of three-fifths of the whole and two-thirds of the whole would be found the share remaining to the members of the Anglican Communion in Ireland. Nor let it be said that that which is paid on the score of vested interests would not be paid for the purposes of the Anglican Communion: because, I apprehend it is quite clear—indeed, I assume, without argument—that when you say you will respect vested interests, you do not intend to say that you will give to the bishop and clergy, for doing nothing, incomes which they now receive under an engagement to do something. Their duties to their flocks, slight as they may be in some cases, onerous in many others, would still remain; and those gentlemen would still be available and remain engaged in the service of the religious communion to which they belong for their lives, even after the disestablishment of the Church. Well, but that proportion, whatever it may be, the Irish Church, the Anglican Communion in Ireland — call it what you like — would not only possess, but enjoy. It would hold its property no longer amid an estranged and alienated population; it would hold it, I believe, with the perfect and cordial good-will of all sects, all parties, and all persuasions, both in this country and in Ireland. And along with that share, at least, of its temporalities, which I apprehend it would receive—I have no authority to say so, but it appears to me a logical and moral necessity in the case — along with that, from the very moment when its title is cancelled as an Established Church, it must receive that freedom of action, that power of falling back on its own internal energies, and developing them for its own good, which so many religious communities in this country value at such a price that they feel it to be a treasure far greater than all that the State can protect or all that the law can give. I own I cannot see that the condition sketched prospectively for the members of the Established Church in Ireland is, in itself, at all a lamentable or a deplorable condition. That, however, is no reason why we should do the act that I now recommend. Nor will I endeavour to recommend that act by any plea which, as far as I can perceive, involves exaggeration. It is, in my opinion, an exaggeration to make the Irish Established Church, in its present form dating from the Reformation, responsible for the great grievances of ascendancy and of national estrangement in Ireland. It is very true, as has been said, I think, by Dr. Brady—I mean Dr. Maziere Brady—who has written on this subject—

Mr. Gladstone

“The Establishment was Papal, but anti-Irish from 1172 to 1560, and from 1560 to 1808 it was anti-Papal and anti-Irish too.”

There is no greater authority on this question than Mr. Burke. His writings, with regard to Ireland, as well as upon other matters, are full of wisdom. In his tract upon the Popery Laws he gives it as his opinion—

“Either that a ‘religion not very remote from the Protestant’ prevailed in Ireland before the English came there”—

Or at least—

“That Papal authority was much lower in Ireland than in other countries.”

And that—

“It was the working of English power and influence, and the English immigration into Ireland, which first thoroughly knit the Church of that country into organic communion and subjection to the Church of Rome.”

And he winds up by saying—

“No country, I believe, since the world began, has suffered so much on account of religion; or has been so variously harassed by the same persons, both for Popery and for Protestantism.”

But, dismissing any charge of that kind, I can only say that the case is much strengthened when we consider that it has been the particular misfortune, the dark fatality of this Church question, that all along, though no doubt in varying degrees, religious Establishments under English protection have been associated with British power, and, instead of tending to unite the feelings of the Irish nation in unity with the people of this island, have unhappily been—as Mr. Burke says, first for Popery and next for Protestantism—all along a cause of estrangement and disunion. Well, now the arguments very generally advanced for the maintenance of the Irish Church are something of this nature:—That to disestablish it would be contrary to the Act of Union and dangerous to the Church of England; that such a measure would be injurious to the Protestant religion; that it would be subversive of property; that it would be contrary to the assurance given by the Roman Catholic party; and that the tithe is paid by the landlord. Now, I think the tithe is not paid by the landlord; and as for the assurance of the Catholic party, I cannot consent that any such assurance should bind me to uphold what I conceive to be unfair to the Catholics and injurious to the Empire. In this matter I say we should exercise our own freedom and judge what is for the common good; and it is on the ground of the common good I ask you to consent to the disendowment of the Established Church in Ireland. Then it has been said that such a measure would be subversive of property. I have not heard that argument in the present controversy, though it was in vogue with high authorities five-and-thirty years ago. I shall Therefore abstain from dealing with it till it is brought before us. As for the measure being contrary to the Act of Union, I do not think that at this time I need dwell upon that point; but one remark I may make with reference to it, which is this — that when we come to argue the point in detail, it can, in my opinion, be shown that the view of the great Minister who framed the Act of Union was as far as possible from the view of those who are now maintaining that an Established Church in Ireland is the peculium—particular privilege and monopoly of the Protestants. Mr. Pitt, according to his biographer, used these words, and they are very important, showing that he did not contemplate by a relief to the Catholics from political disability; but that his large and comprehensive mind contemplated putting them on a footing of religious equality with their Protestant fellow-subjects, as soon as the opportunity for so doing should arise. He said—

“By many he knew it would be contended that the religion professed by the majority of the people would at least be entitled to an equality of privileges.”

What was Mr. Pitt's answer to that? That was a thing intolerable in principle? No, but that it could not be done while Ireland remained a separate kingdom; that—

“No man could say that in the actual state of things, while Ireland remained a separate kingdom, full concessions could be made to the Catholics without endangering the State, and shaking the constitution of Ireland to its centre.”

I think, therefore, there is ample room for the opinion that Mr. Pitt contemplated at least a system which is now becoming wholly impossible—namely, that of general endowment. But that general endowment is but a means by which he sought to attain an end, and the end which he sought to attain was nothing but religious equality. That we are endeavouring to reach by the means now open to us, and in doing so we are acting in accordance with the views and the spirit of Mr. Pitt. But it is said, however, that this disendowment would be dangerous to the Church of England. This appears to be a favourite argument. But objection may be met by assertion; and while, no doubt, many persons may believe that the disendowment of the Irish Church would be an injury to the Church of England, I claim for myself the liberty to hold an entirely opposite opinion. I maintain that to relieve the Church of England from a position which politically is odious and dangerous, and which socially is unjust, will be to strengthen her foundations, and give her fair play in the exercise of her great mission. We shall, no doubt, hear much more on that subject; but there is at least one form of that objection with regard to which I think sufficient attention has not been paid. There is a famous saying of Mr. Hallam—I do not remember the precise words, but of which this is the sense—that there is no medium in the policy of a State between persecution and expatriation, and toleration and admission to a footing of equality. Certainly, as far as the history of Ireland is concerned, it tends in a remarkable degree to afford proof of the wisdom of that proposition. I have, with such materials as were open to me, endeavoured to obtain the estimates formed at different times of the respective numbers of Roman Catholics and Protestants in Ireland. It is very remarkable, but this appears to be the case—that the un-Christian, barbarous, and abominable Penal Laws were in a manner successful. The number of the Roman Catholic community in a certain degree, though slowly, diminished so long as the pressure of these Penal Laws weighed upon them; but from the time when those laws were relaxed and when the feeling of liberty and civil life began to glow in the breast of the Roman Catholic, and there was some field for the development and exercise of his energies—from the time of our embarking in an intermediate system to maintain the Established Church in Ireland—our experiment has been a total failure; the proportion of Roman Catholics to Protestants has increased in a remarkable degree. In 1672, Sir William Petty gave numbers, which when I reduce the fractions to a common denominator, as I have done in respect of all the figures I am about to quote, show that the Protestants were at that time to the Roman Catholics as three to eight, or forty-five to 120. In 1730, or about that date, a very careful inquiry took place, entirely under the direction of the Government, and it was found that the Protestants were as two to five as compared with the Catholics; they had grown to the proportion of forty-eight to 120. But at that time, according to another authority, Bishop Burke the Roman Catholic Bishop of Ossory, the Protestants were as two to four, or as sixty to 120, when compared with the Roman Catholics. In 1762 Bishop Burke published a work, in which he complains that under the influence of the Penal Laws and the charter schools the Protestants had steadily increased; but, as there is no precise estimate of the numbers, I cannot give them. In 1784, only six years after the first relaxation of the Penal Laws, a computation was made, which must necessarily have been of a loose character, but to which great value appears to have been attached by persons of authority. I dare say it will create a smile in the House when I mention in what way this estimate was made. It was founded on the number of beggars who came to the House of Industry in Dublin. There were no Poor Laws in Ireland at that time; and, as it was believed that the applicants for relief at the House of Industry included persons from all quarters of the country, it was thought that they represented the different religious creeds in about the proportionate numbers which the members of those creeds bore to one another in Ireland. The result is important, as showing that in 1784 the proportion was the same as in 1730—namely, that of sixty to 120, or as two to four. In 1801 an estimate was given from the Protestant side. In Sir Richard Musgrove's History of the Rebellion in Ireland, second edition—the second edition was published in 1801, and I suppose the figures refer to 1800—there is an estimate which shows that the Protestants had sunk to the proportion of forty to 120. The Catholics themselves claimed still more. In 1834 there was an accurate investigation made under the authority of the British Government. By the Census Returns of that year it appears that the Protestants had still further sunk. Instead of being as sixty to 120 in their proportion to the Roman Catholics—as they had been 100 years before; or as forty to 120, as they had been in the beginning of the century—they were only as thirty to 120, or one-fifth of the whole population. In 1861 they were a trifle over one-fifth, but the change was so slight as to be scarcely worth notice. If we are told that the removal of a public religious Establishment from Ireland will be injurious to Protestantism, I would ask what is the meaning of the words “injurious to Protestantism?” The meaning must be this—that the maintenance of this religious Establishment has been beneficial to Protestantism. And yet it is shown by evidence which, although in all its details it may not be perfectly precise, is nevertheless clear and conclusive for every practical purpose, that ever since you receded from the cruelty of the Penal Laws, the attempt to maintain your Establishment has had this effect—that along with it there has been an immense increase in the proportion of Roman Catholics to Protestants in Ireland. It may, indeed, be said, “Yes, the case is very bad, though it would have been still worse but for our religious Establishment.” I trust, however, that that argument will not be used in a House of Commons which, by an overwhelming majority, is a Protestant House of Commons; for dismal, indeed, is our condition if, as professors of a certain religion, we cannot look our Roman Catholic fellow-citizens in the face and meet them on a fair field; and if, the moment we are threatened with civil equality, we are obliged to utter doleful vaticinations about the extinction of our faith, and to confess that we have only been prevented by extraneous and factitious aid on the part of the State from being swallowed up in the great vortex of the Papal faith. At the same time, I am bound to say I am not one of those who greatly regret the loss of what was termed the Appropriation Clause. I repent undoubtedly of certain arguments which I used against it in speeches, of which the most recent was delivered thirty-two years ago; but that Appropriation Clause did not satisfy the principle of justice, and it certainly tended, in my opinion, to give a new charter to the Protestant Church, upon a principle of pure personal preference to members of that communion, and to place it on a footing which, in my judgment, was not tenable. But there are other reasons why it is very well that these thirty years of trial should have afforded us an opportunity of arriving, as we all wish to arrive, at a determination as nearly perfect as possible; and I think it but fair to the Established Church in Ireland to admit that, until very recent times, it has not had a perfectly fair trial as a religious community, for so incredibly perverted was the system under which Ireland was governed during the last century, that the Established Church could hardly be called a religious institution. I must ask the House to listen to a most remarkable passage—and it is the only other one which I shall read to the House—from the writings of Mr. Burke. He is describing the spirit and operation of the Penal Laws—and the multitude of noble passages on the subject that might be quoted from him, if there ere time, would be far better than anything I could say. He says—

Mr. Gladstone

“From what I have observed it was pride, arrogance, and a spirit of domination, and not a dogmatic spirit of religion that has caused and kept these oppressive statutes. I am sure I have known those who have oppressed Papists in their civil rights exceedingly indulgent to them in their religious ceremonies, and who really wished them to continue Catholics in order to furnish pretences for oppression. These persons never saw a man (by converting) escape out of their power but with grudging and regret.”

admit it is difficult to realize the whole spirit and meaning of these words, and to see to what depths of degradation a politico-ecclesiastical system misapplied can unhappily descend. But, undoubtedly, those days have gone by. Between the beginning of this century and the year 1830 there was a great revival of piety and zeal among the clergy, and great improvement in the ecclesiastical laws of Ireland. But by the year 1830, which was about the date when you had for the first time a zealous and active clergy in Ireland, they found themselves unhappily involved in the tithe wars, and at that unhappy period, before the passing of the Tithe Commutation Act, the collection of the tithes was in the hands of the tithe proctors, who levied them from even the humblest occupier of the soil. In such circumstances it was almost vain to think of the progress of religious work. This difficulty, however, was taken away in 1838, when the Tithe Commutation Act was passed without an Appropriation clause. Undoubtedly, many of us are open to some reproach for having, by the Tithe Commutation Act and the Church Temporalities Act, wasted to some extent the ecclesiastical property of the country, in order to work down the argument drawn from the existence of the tithes. A commission of 25 per cent was given to the landlord for collection, and undoubtedly that was a most liberal percentage. I do not, however, intend by that remark to weaken the landlord's title in the slightest degree; for I believe that the arrangement which was come to has been regarded as a final arrangement, and therefore what has been done cannot be undone. But during the thirty years which have elapsed since 1838, what have we had in Ireland? In the first place we have had the clergyman pursuing his vocation in perfect tranquillity, and without an external barrier of any kind to impede him. In the second place, we have had a clergy claiming and well earning the name of an able, a zealous, and a pious clergy. What more could be desired to test the capacity of the Church? And yet, Sir, more there has been, because there has been a great calamity—a famine, which pressed principally, though not entirely, on the Catholic population of Ireland, and which gave to the Protestant clergy, as the dispensers of alms, both on their own behalf and on that of England, access to every cottage in Ireland, and placed in their hands such a leverage of social power as can hardly be over-estimated. The plague was followed by emigration, and all these burdens weighed chiefly on the Roman Catholic population. Yet, with all these advantages on the side of the Establishment, and with that terrific calamity reducing the numbers of the Catholic population, it appears from the Census of 1861 that, although some change has taken place, it is so insignificant that we may fairly call it imperceptible; for I believe, if we contemplate the conversion of Ireland at the rate indicated by these figures, some 1,500 or 2,000 years at least must elapse before we complete the task. I have dealt with these general considerations, and now I will endeavour further to justify the proposal which I am going to submit to the House. I ask the House in substance to do two things. The first is to make a declaration which by itself is in the nature of an abstract Resolution—namely, a declaration that it is necessary that the Established Church of Ireland should cease to exist as an Establishment, due regard being had for vested interests and the rights of property. But I also ask the House to take a further step. I ask them to arrest appointments which might be made from this time forth, with a view of reserving to the new Parliament, in the most convenient form of which circumstances will admit, the final disposal of this great and complicated question. The object is to arrest in the first place episcopal appointments; the state of the law being such that where a vacancy occurs in a see, and no provision is made for filling it up, the law itself provides for the exercise of jurisdiction and the performance of all necessary spiritual acts. I need not, I think, go into details for the purpose of sustaining the correctness of this statement, nor do I think it will be maintained that any intolerable grievance would arise from a short suspension of these episcopal appointments, if we are to judge of the capacity of bishops to perform spiritual duties for a given amount of population by the scale which prevails in England, and which, on the whole, is not an unfair scale. Undoubtedly there is in the case of the twelve Bishops of Ireland, with their 700,000 adherents, abundant space and scope to enable temporary provision to be made without any serious inconvenience. With respect to capitular appointments, I think the policy of suspending them still more clear. As to parochial appointments, I do not propose to attempt any interference with that limited number of parishes which are in private patronage; for we cannot touch those parishes without interfering with proprietary rights, and we can only deal with proprietary rights in a satisfactory manner when we come to consider the conditions of a final and conclusive measure. With regard to parochial appointments not in private patronage, I may point out that provision is already made for the case of certain parishes in Ireland which only contain a very few Protestants; and in reference to parishes having a larger proportion of Protestant inhabitants, there are provisions suitable in the main for the purpose to which I am now referring. Besides the stopping of such appointments, it appears to be necessary to stop the proceedings of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners in Ireland, and this, like the suspension of appointments, can only be done by passing an Act of Parliament. It would, in my judgment, be most unconstitutional, and I do not think the House would entertain it if I were to propose it, that any of these things should be done by the mere will of the House of Commons. It is plainly the affair of the Legislature; it is the business of the Crown Estate and the Bishops' Estate to continue to fill the office until the law is altered. In the same way it is the business, I have no doubt, of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners to do all they are now doing with the large revenues which they possess until the law steps in to restrain them. In my opinion, it is very necessary that the law should step in to restrain the Commissioners, and for this reason—their duties are not confined to meeting the exigencies of divine worship, whether in the case of the expenses of service or the expenses of the necessary repairs of fabrics. The Commissioners from year to year lay out large sums in the entire re-fitting of churches, and in the renovation of the fabrics, and in the foundation of the new churches. Not only so, but I find the erection of new benefices is within the jurisdiction of the Commissioners, and from time to time they perform that operation. In order to show how far I am justified in asking the House to endeavour to reserve the status quo, and to prevent the growth of new vested interests and new permanent charges, I would just take two cases of benefices. Newtown Lennan, in Lismore diocese, was erected into a separate benefice in 1867. It was appointed to by the patron—the Crown or the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. That new benefice, I understand, erected in 1867, has a population stated to consist of four Anglicans and 1,143 Roman Catholics, and the net annual value is £331. The other case is Kilmoylan-with-Cummer, and the appointment is in 1868. Here the statement shows that the population is four Anglicans and 2,769 Roman Catholics, and the net annual value is £291. The number of four Anglicans is so very remarkable that, if I had not received the same from a person of some authority, I should have suspected the accuracy of the statement; but whether it be accurate, or whether it be not, my contention—as is said in Courts of Law—is, that these new benefices ought not to be erected if the House of Commons intends to deal seriously with the question of the Established Church in Ireland. By the first part of the proposal I have to make, I wish to test the question, whether the House does or does not think the time is come for dealing thus seriously with the Established Church in Ireland; but if we do think that the time is come, then I must say that I hope we shall not be content to launch forth upon the winds of heaven that most unsatisfactory creation of human wit, when it stands alone, which is known within these walls by the name of an abstract Resolution. During all my public life I have seen nothing but discredit, false hopes, and bitter disappointments come from these abstract Resolutions. I do not think I have ever been responsible for one, and I am not willing to be responsible for one on this occasion. I know very well that this Parliament—competent as it is in all authority, and not less than any Parliament that has ever sat in this House—must, notwithstanding, look forward to a limited existence. It would be folly to attempt to charge it during that limited period of existence with duties which are beyond its capacities and its power. The duty I would point out to the House is this: not of forestalling, not of determining the final arrangement that may be thought fit for disposing of this whole question, but the duty of preventing the fresh and constant growth in the interval which is yet remaining before a final measure—an interval which may be shorter or which may be longer—a growth of a new crop of vested interests; a creation of permanent engagements which may fetter to a most serious extent the judgment of Parliament. In order to estimate the importance of that topic, suppose that we were in circumstances in which I could ask you, and in which you could agree, to pass a conclusive measure at this moment for the disestablishment of the Irish Church. If you chose to make the course for that measure such as Coleridge describes to be the course of the cannon-ball, shattering what it may reach, and shattering what it reaches," then indeed you would have but a short future with which to reckon. But every man in this House denounces that. You are determined to give the fullest consideration, not only in a matter of property, but of privilege and of duty, to those who are now in possession. But, right and indispensable as this is, let us not conceal from ourselves that the practical effect is to involve us in many and complicated difficulties, and to postpone the sensible operations of measures for many years, and the final and full operation of it for almost one generation; because it will not be ten years nor twenty years—it will hardly be thirty years perhaps, unless prudence in the meantime should dictate, with the good-will of all parties. If you think it is right, in the language which will be proposed to you, that the Established Church should cease to exist as an Established Church in Ireland, and if you choose to adopt the mode of operation proposed, the final effect of this Resolution will have to be postponed. Is it not obvious common sense; is it not necessary, in order to give assurance in all good faith and to maintain our credit, that we should without hesitation do that which is perfectly simple in its character—namely, arrest the progress of operations which tend greatly to fetter the future discretion of Parliament? My noble Friend opposite (Lord Stanley) has given notice of an Amendment upon my Motion. I think—indeed, I have such a respect for the noble Lord's knowledge of the English tongue, that I feel satisfied that the Amendment has been drawn so as to allow of a critical consideration in regard to its terms; but if my noble Friend can contrive to show that an inquiry now in progress can be called a pending inquiry, he certainly would be a new light upon the English language. But, passing from that trifle, I ask myself what benefit is to be attained by a dilatory Amendment such as that of the noble Lord. It is, I think, a safe assumption that that Amendment will carry no consolation to the mind of the Irish Church. I will illustrate my meaning. Suppose instead of proposing the disestablishment of the Irish Church, some hon. Member of wild counsels and intentions had put upon the Notice Paper of this House, a proposition that it would be expedient, with due regard to vested interests, to make provision by law for the extinction of the House of Peers, would the noble Lord have gone forward and have told us that he thought it was possible considerable modifications might, perhaps, appear to be expedient, as the result of the great constitutional change which he recently has been an instrument in bringing about; but that he was of opinion that any proposition tending to the disestablishment of the House of Lords ought to be reserved for the decision of a new Parliament? [Laughter.] That may seem like a jest; it is but too sad earnest. It indicates a mode in which, so far as depends upon the counsels of the Executive, this great question of the Irish Church is to be dealt with. For myself, I avow that I have carefully avoided all endeavours to stir agitation. I have waited until, as it appeared to me, the hour had come when the call of duty summoned. That having come, I thought it but due in justice to every one concerned to speak in the plainest language, and we are met with a Motion that says that the question of the disestablishment and disendowment must be reserved for the decision of the new Parliament. Well, Sir, much shall I be surprised if the House of Commons adopts an Amendment such as this. That Amendment cannot be meant to show respect to the new Parliament; because it only does, and I think much less perfectly, that which will be effected by the Motion—namely, reserves the final handling of the question to the councils and deliberations of that Parliament. The very words of the Resolutions I propose contain a reference to the decision of the new Parliament. In that respect, therefore, the Motions are alike. But, again, perhaps, I may be told that if we are not going to legislate finally on the question it is not expedient to express an opinion on the question. Then, why are we invited to admit that "considerable modifications in the temporalities of the United Church in Ireland may, after the result of the present inquiry, be found expedient?" Why, I ask, is this House to be called on to give that opinion? The difference between us is this, the opinion I ask the House to express is an opinion no one can mistake, every one can understand. Who can understand what are these "considerable modifications?" What kind of modifications are they? Do they mean to carry the tithes of Connaught to the congregations of Dublin and Belfast? Do they mean to investigate the question of surpluses of capitular estates, and, after having competently provided to all eternity for Protestant rectors and curates, to hand over to those who are not Israelites the crumbs that fall from the table? Why go into the assertion of such vague generalities as these? But the noble Lord, I contend, shows no regard to the coming Parliament. I invite him to join with me, if he is anxious to show regard to that Parliament. I am trying to show regard for the coming Parliament by keeping out of its way all those embarrassments which, if these Resolutions are not adopted, will infallibly grow up. I certainly must say that the vested interests are a very great embarrassment. Why, it may be the duty of the Commissioners—for aught I know they may be erecting a new benefice of four Anglicans at this very moment. I so respect the judgment of the new Parliament that I will endeavour—so far as depends on me—to clear up the ground on which it is to enter. But it is said there is no end to these concessions—that a liberal policy has been long pursued—that it has not produced its natural fruits—that the Roman Catholics still continue dissatisfied, and that, instead of gratitude, we are met with fresh demands. Well, Sir, my answer is—as we have sown, so we reap. The method we have pursued, according to laws higher and deeper than any we can make, has produced the fruits that were inevitable, and that we ought to have foreseen. It is quite true that we have conceded. There has been, as I said before, a connection of 700 years. Almost the whole of that connection has consisted of a succession of storms—fierce and bitter storms—and uncertain, temporary calms. From time to time the Irish problem has been dealt with; but it never has been dealt with by removing the whole cause of dispute. For 100 years we have been moving at least in the same direction. In 1778 a great concession was made. In 1793 another onward stride was effected in the Parliament of Ireland. In 1800 the promises of Mr. Pitt for a moment gilded the sky of that island. In 1829 our Roman Catholic Colleagues in this House first took their seats among us, and obtained a substantial equality, which I rejoice to think was carried within the last year or two to its farthest limits by the removal of a useless and objectionable oath. But what have been the circumstances under which these changes have been made? Have they been freely made? Have they proceeded from our spontaneous bounty? Have they been drawn from us in our melting mood by our recollection of the woes and sufferings of Ireland? Sir, the dates, I am loth to say, speak for themselves. The first step was in 1778, when the prospects of the American war were growing more and more gloomy. The second was in 1793, when you began to be locked in a struggle of life and death with France. The third was in 1800, when that struggle, great and formidable as it was at all times, had assumed, perhaps, its very darkest and most desperate aspect. And the last was in 1829; you gave to the Roman Catholics seats in this House when the Minister who proposed the measure intimated to you, in terms distinct enough, that unless you were prepared for concession you must look for civil war in Ireland as the only alternative. And when we thus have written, inscribed, engraven upon our own acts the motives from which they have proceeded—when we have ourselves, by the time at which they were carried, taken care to characterize them as more properly the fruits of our fearful anticipations than of our generous bounty, can we be surprised that they have failed to elicit the abundant gratitude it seems we were to expect? I believe the laws of human nature have been too strong for us, and they ought to have enabled us to predict what has happened. Hence it has been that the proverb arose—England's difficulty was Ireland's opportunity, and that Mr. Grattan, speaking of the independence of the Irish Parliament, said—

Mr. Gladstone

"The weakness of England made the strength of Ireland; for Ireland was saved when America was lost. When England conquered Ireland was coerced; when she was defeated, Ireland was relieved."

Now, at last, let us see whether it is in our power to make some amendment upon this most deplorable method of proceeding. I hope it is not too late. It is certainly not too soon. I have urged that there is a crisis in the affairs of Ireland; and I am answered that the crisis is one made and set up by me—as if I were like the mysterious person who in a theatre behind, or rather above, the scenes has custody of what are termed the thunder, lightning, and rain, to do with them as he pleases. No, that is not the character of the Irish crisis. Much depends upon this. Let us put the questions to the bottom. We had a crisis in 1829. What followed? Certainly nothing like a complete measure, but still a measure of relief. But about sixteen years afterwards the attitude of Ireland again became formidable. Sir Robert Peel endeavoured to meet the exigency of the day by measures he proposed of a highly liberal character; one relating to the establishment of the Queen's Colleges, the other to the increase of the Grant in Maynooth—a Grant opposed by the right hon. Gentleman now the Prime Minister of the Crown, on the ground that Sir Robert Peel was a person totally unfit to make that proposal, since his policy up to that time had lain in a different direction. But it pleased providence to interpose and check the currents of the political atmosphere by the tremendous visitation of the famine. That famine gave another turn to the minds and thoughts of men. But we have gone on, I am afraid less alive than we ought to have been to the real demands of Ireland. It has only been since the termination of the American war and the appearance of Fenianism that the mind of this country has been greatly turned to the consideration of Irish affairs; and it is vain to attempt to preach in the wilderness, to anticipate conclusions at which the nation has not arrived, even though those conclusions may be recommended by rethought as well as justice. But what has been happening all this time? Has Ireland been in a stationary condition? I do not speak of its material condition. I speak of other causes. The discontent of the agricultural population has continued; and the virtual pledge given by public authority in the Report of the Earl of Devon's Commission, twenty-three years ago, has for all these years remained unfulfilled. If millions of the Irish people have taken an acuter view of their own rights and wrongs than we may approve, and the cheap Press, which with myriad wings, we have sent among them, has stirred from time to time those breasts, that cheap Press, if causes of dissatisfaction had not existed, would only have attached all classes to the institutions of the country. It used to be said that steam had bridged the Channel—it has now bridged the Atlantic—steam now bridges the Atlantic—and the echoes of whatever dissatisfaction exists in Ireland come back to us over the waves of that wide ocean. These are fatal and enormous changes—they are changes preparatory and predisposing to the latest manifestation—the manifestation, I mean, of that Fenianism that has come into this country, which, and I say it upon the authority of the noble Earl, who stated the fact in words that cannot be forgotten, found existing in the hearts of the Irish people a great amount of dissatisfaction—we may almost say of disloyalty and of dislike to England and to the English rule, the small occupiers to a great extent sympathizing with it, and in several of the large towns in the South the population being deeply tainted with it, and ready to participate in it to any extent. And then, with these words falling from the mouth of his own Colleague, that Colleague being the responsible Minister for Ireland, the Prime Minister for the Crown denies that a crisis exists, and ridicules it as the creation of a fevered brain. I want to know what is the sign of a national crisis. To those who refuse to read it in the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, four times, I think, successively, what answer is it to say to us, "You yourselves proposed the suspension?" Certainly we did; but this is an act which grows not less, but more significant by repetition. Does the right hon. Gentleman suppose that when we asked the House of Commons to suspend the Habeas Corpus Act we were not aware that that suspension would draw after it political consequences? It was my duty on that occasion, to follow the powerful and impressive speech of the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright), and what I said was—

Mr. Gladstone

"I do not deny that we must persevere in legislation in the direction in which we have been engaged for some time, and which has already in a certain measure produced most satisfactory results. What I pleaded for was this, that we should provide for the exigencies of the day, for that is an absolute duty which cannot be deferred."

On all occasions when the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act has been renewed the same course has been pursued, and no impediment has been thrown in the way of that proposal. Indeed, we found that the Government were almost ready to complain of those who now propose remedial measures that they did not oppose that suspension. My opinion is that the readiness and the cheerfulness—no, that is a bad word—the readiness and full conviction with which the House has acceded to the proposal is a true measure of the conviction that the House entertains that it must at the earliest possible moment address itself in earnest to the work of remedial legislation. What does the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act mean? It means the giving up of the charter and Palladium of personal liberty in that country. And what are its accompaniments in Ireland? A police—which is virtually an armed force for purposes of repression—admirably discharging its duties, but not discharging the same duties that are discharged by the police of England and of Scotland. An army maintained in Ireland, unhappily not for the same purposes for which an army is maintained in England and in Scotland, but for purposes much more nearly approaching those which are most peculiar to some of the worst governed States of Europe. For my part, I know not what is worse than tranquillity purchased by the constant suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, unless it be that last extremity of public calamity—civil war. This being the state of things, I for one, Sir, am not willing to wait. It appears to me that our responsibility is quite sufficient for having waited thus long, and that it befits us now to do all that the time will permit towards clearing our account with Ireland. I know there is a feeling in this matter which, I admit, it is difficult to get over. There are many who think that to lay hands upon the national Church Establishment of a country is a profane and unhallowed act. I respect that feeling. I sympathize with it. I sympathize with it while I think it my duty to overcome and repress it. But if it be an error it is an error entitled to respect. There is something in the idea of a national Establishment of religion, of a solemn appropriation of a part of the Commonwealth for conferring upon all who are ready to receive it what we know to be an inestimable benefit; of saving that portion of the inheritance from private selfishness, in order to extract from it, if we can, pure and unmixed advantages of the highest order for the population at large—there is something in this so attractive that it is an image that must always command the homage of the many. It is somewhat like the kingly ghost in Hamlet, of which one of the characters of Shakespeare says—

“We do it wrong, being so majestic,
To offer it the show of violence;
For it is, as the air, invulnerable,
And our vain blows malicious mockery.”

But, Sir, this is to view a religious Establishment upon one side, only upon what I may call the etherial side. It has likewise a side of earth; and here I cannot do better than quote some lines written by the present Archbishop of Dublin at a time when his genius was devoted to the Muses. He said, in speaking of mankind—

“We who did our lineage high Draw from beyond the starry sky,
Are yet upon the other side
To earth and to its dust allied.”

And so the Church Establishment, regarded in its theory and in its aim, is beautiful and attractive. Yet what is it but an appropriation of public property, an appropriation of the fruits of labour and of skill to certain purposes, and unless those purposes be fulfilled that appropriation cannot be justified. Therefore, Sir, I cannot but feel that we must set aside fears which thrust themselves upon the imagination, and act upon the sober dictates of our judgment. I think it has been shown that the cause for action is strong—not for precipitate action, not for action beyond our powers; but for such action as the opportunities of the times and the condition of Parliament, if there be but a ready will, will amply and easily admit of. If I am asked as to my expectations of the issue of this struggle, I begin by frankly avowing that I, for one, would not have entered into it unless I believed that the final hour was about to sound.

“Venit summa dies et ineluctabile fatum.”

And I hope that the noble Lord will forgive me if I say that before Friday last I thought that the thread of the remaining life of the Irish Established Church was short, but that since Friday last, when at half-past four o'clock in the afternoon the noble Lord stood at that table, I have regarded it as being shorter still. The issue is not in our hands. What we had and have to do is to consider well and deeply before we take the first step in an engagement such as this; but having entered into the controversy, there and then to acquit ourselves like men, and to use every effort to remove what still remains of the scandals and calamities in the relations which exist between England and Ireland, and to make our best efforts at least to fill up with the cement of human concord the noble fabric of the British Empire.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House will immediately resolve itself into a Committee to consider the said Acts."—(Mr. Gladstone.)

LORD STANLEY: Sir, I rise to move the Amendment of which I have given notice; and I can assure the House that I do so with a full sense of the gravity of the crisis which is impending, and with a desire quite as anxious as that of the right hon. Gentleman can be, that no trick, no contrivance, no ambiguity, shall interfere with the straightforward course of this debate, and that the ideas and intentions of Her Majesty's Government in objecting to the Resolutions of the right hon. Gentleman shall not be misconstrued or misunderstood, either here or out of doors. And I say that the more earnestly, because I think I see already that in the debate upon which we are about to enter, long as it inevitably must be, and impassioned as it probably will be—a debate in which party feeling must necessarily run high, and party prejudices be to some extent appealed to—every attempt will be made—I almost said every art will be employed—to place upon a false issue the question we have to decide. Now, Sir, what are these Resolutions that are to be moved by the right hon. Gentleman? They have been repeatedly described out-of-doors, and I do not doubt we shall hear them described in this House, as Resolutions directly implying and involving the disendowment of the Irish Church. No doubt the speech of the right hon. Gentleman was calculated to impress that idea upon me. But when I look to the Resolutions, I find in them nothing of the kind. They asserted the principle of disendowment, we should at least know not only what we are discussing, but, which is a different thing, what it is upon which we are about to vote. But nowhere have we been favoured with any such information. Let us examine these Resolutions and see what principles they really do involve; for I need not remind the House that it is not upon the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, but upon the Resolutions as they stand upon the Paper, that the Vote of this House is to be taken. My first objection, therefore, is that we are called upon to say

Mr. Gladstone

"Aye" or "No" to a plan which is no plan at all—to give or to refuse an assent to a proposition which is not before us in any definite shape, and which twenty different people may interpret in twenty different ways. Now, Sir, the first and leading proposition of the right hon. Gentleman is that the Church of Ireland ought to cease to exist as an Established Church. Well, but what do you mean by an "Established Church?" It is not so easy to define the meaning of that phrase. Does it mean merely a Church whose endowments were originally derived from the State—that is one view of the question; of course, as everybody knows, a great controversy hangs upon that question, whether Church endowments can be said to be originally derived from the State; or does it mean, what is entirely different, a Church controlled and regulated in its administration and discipline by the State? These Resolutions are so general that I can perfectly well understand an ardent and zealous Protestant accepting the words of the first Resolution, and admitting the propositions it involves—admitting it upon the ground that the State had often interfered in what he would call an injurious manner with the Irish Church, had crippled its efficiency, had discouraged Protestant zeal, and had restrained the vehemence of its more ardent supporters. Such a man might say, and say with perfect consistency, as regards both the words and the spirit of these Resolutions—"Very well, we accept the terms which the right hon. Gentleman offers, but we put our own construction upon them. Let us, if that be your decision, cease to be a State Church; let us choose our own Bishops; let us make that not very important sacrifice of ceasing to send them to the House of Lords; let us choose our own officers, sever our connection with the State—only recollect that, in so doing, we claim to retain all the endowments. They are ours; the State has nothing to do with them. We will keep them, and our self-appointed governing body will do with them as it pleases." If any man chose to accept the Resolution of the right hon. Gentleman in that sense, I see nothing whatever in its words to prevent him; but I do not apprehend that an arrangement of that kind, which would leave the Church, not indeed the name of an Establishment, but all its wealth, with more power and more independence than it at present possesses, would exactly meet the views of those who support the Resolutions of the right hon. Gentleman. That it would not meet the views of the right hon. Gentleman himself we have had evidence enough in his own speech. Then, I say, in the first place, that these Resolutions tell us absolutely nothing as to what you mean to do with the funds of the Irish Church, and that is the real question at issue. And I say further, that the acceptance of them would be perfectly compatible with an arrangement which should do the very opposite of that which you are meaning and intending. Whether the wording was purposely arranged, so that those who do not accept the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman may vote for the Resolutions, or whether—which, considering how many eminent hands have been employed upon these words, I cannot think likely—it is matter of pure accident and oversight, I venture to say that it is preposterous to ask this House to affirm a proposition which is so worded and so framed that when you have carried it no two of those who have voted in its favour will agree the next morning as to the principles you have been asserting, or as to what is to be the consequence of its adoption. If this were merely matter of verbal criticism I might allude to it in passing; I should certainly do no more. But I think it goes a great deal deeper into the root of the matter than mere verbal criticism. Disestablishment is one thing, disendowment is another. It is conceivable that a Church might be disestablished, and yet might retain all its endowments. It is equally conceivable that a Church might retain the style and title of an Establishment, whatever that may amount to, and yet be so deprived of the bulk of its possessions as to be compelled to rely for its support in the main upon the voluntary principle; and my objection is, that while you profess to be laying down a principle which is to guide the nation in its dealings with the Irish Church, you are touching only a corner of the question—you are avoiding all notice of the real difficulties—you are disposing of what, in my view at least, is very little more than an empty title, and you do not say how the taking away of that title does or does not affect the succession to the estate which has hitherto gone with it. I may be told, "Look at the second and third Resolutions; see what provision is made for vacancies not being filled up by the Crown; what can that mean but disendowment?" My answer is, that the third Resolution, whatever its constitutional bearings may be—and there will be something to be said as to the legality of the course to be taken under it—leaves us just as much in the dark as the first, whether the House pledges itself to take away from the Church all its endowments, or half of them, or to leave them all as they are. The Resolutions are perfectly reconcilable with an arrangement which should leave the Church still endowed to the full amount, but relieved from State control; and they are equally reconcilable with the adoption of the purely voluntary system, or with a proposal for the division of the endowments between different religious bodies. They do, indeed, show that you contemplate the probability of Parliament doing something with these endowments; that you contemplate some legislation that shall affect them; but what that legislation shall be, by what principles it is to be guided, or what direction it is to take, we know no more than we knew before. No doubt the right hon. Gentleman has done something in his statement to-night to supply the deficiency of the proposition which he has laid on the table. But that affords me still more reasonable ground of objection, because I want to know upon which of two questions we are to vote. Is it upon the specific plan the right hon. Gentleman puts forward in his speech, but does not bring forward in the form of a Resolution; or is it upon those general and vague Resolutions, which no doubt include the plan of the right hon. Gentleman, but which I have endeavoured to show would equally include a great many other schemes entirely different from it? I cannot consider this as a light or immaterial objection, because it seems to me that the real question which the next Parliament will have to consider will not be whether anything ought to be done as regards the Irish Church, but what the particular thing to be done shall be. Probably there is not one educated person in a hundred who will stand up and pretend that the Irish ecclesiastical arrangements as they exist are of altogether a satisfactory kind. I certainly am not that one. If we had thought so, or if the House had thought so, what would have been the meaning—what would have been the use of that Commission which is now inquiring into the whole subject, appointed as it was with the full concurrence of both the present and the late Governments? But the real perplexity of the question, and that which ring thirty years has rendered Parliament so unwilling to touch it, is this: you alter in any way the present application of the endowments, what do you mean to do with them? And I say that I have a right to call upon those who invite us to approach what is undoubtedly the most difficult and perhaps the most dangerous question of our time, who invite not only to discuss it, but to pledge ourselves to early action upon it—we have the right, I think, to ask them to say whether they or anybody else will undertake to produce for the consideration of Parliament a solution of that question which Parliament and the public will accept. Let us look at the number of plans which you have had either now or quite lately brought forward. First comes the plan recommended by the names of gentlemen prominent in their line, the plan of which, I suppose I may say, Mr. Miall and Mr. Newman Hall are the principal champions of the plan that is of absolute and entire endowment. These gentlemen are, I will not say denouncing, but they are, as we see by the newspapers, expostulating with even the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) because he hesitated, and I thought very wisely, to go that full length. I do not know how numerous the supporters of that idea may be, but undoubtedly they have the advantage which the partizans of extreme ideas always possess, that of a logically strong and consistent position. Next in order is the plan lately propounded by the hon. Member for Birmingham. His idea, if I understand it rightly, was to take the Church property of all kinds, to assign a certain amount to each religious denomination that should take it, and to turn over the bulk of the remainder to secular uses. Thirdly, I remember Lord Russell with a scheme, which he also put forward in a pamphlet, published not more than six weeks ago—a scheme which, as I understand it, does not contemplate the appropriation of Church endowments to secular uses, but proposes to divide those endowments among all denominations in the ratio of their numbers. Fourthly, you have the old appropriation scheme of thirty-three years ago—a scheme which rested upon this basis:—to provide first for the reasonable wants of the Irish Protestant population, and then to apply whatever surplus may be left, either to education or to making such provision for the Roman Catholics as they may be inclined to accept. Then we have the proposal sketched out by the right hon. Gentleman, which has been too recently laid before the House to admit of discussion at this moment; and lastly comes an idea which finds great favour, I believe, among a portion of Irish Churchmen, although I am bound to say I do not think it is one that a reformed Parliament is likely to adopt—the scheme, I mean, of leaving untouched the Protestant endowments as a whole, but re-distributing them so as to get rid of the scandal which everybody admits to exist—of sinecure livings and empty churches. You have thus five, not to say six, projects at least, all of them differing in essential principles, each of them irreconcilable with all the rest, all of them supported probably by a respectable minority in the country; and that is the chaos in which the right hon. Gentleman asks us to plunge at a day's notice, when, whatever else public opinion may have decided, it is perfectly clear that it does not see its way as to which of any of these schemes it intends to adopt. Well, then, Sir, I think I have shown that the Resolutions before us come to very little more than this: that in the opinion of the House it is expedient that something or other should be done affecting the Irish Church; but that, at present, the movers of the Resolutions do not ask us to say in express terms what that something shall be. That does not seem to be a very practical conclusion, but that is not all. Suppose you carry your Motion. Suppose you go into Committee, and being in Committee you pass your Resolutions. Well, I should ask in the words on the title-page of one of Mr. Cobden's pamphlets, "What next, and next?" What do you mean to do with your Resolutions when you have got them? You do not intend to legislate this year. The right hon. Gentleman said as much.

MR. GLADSTONE: That there may be no misunderstanding, I would explain, if the noble Lord will permit me, that what I disclaimed was final legislation. What I recommended, and what would be required by the spirit of the second and third Resolutions would be legislation to prevent the growth of new interests.

LORD STANLEY: That is not legislation in the sense I mean. You do not intend to ask us to legislate so as to dispose of the question. But if the right hon. Gentleman had given me a different answer my case would have been just as strong, because the reply would obviously have suggested itself, "If you have a plan, why do not you embody it in a Bill, and place that Bill before us, instead of proposing Resolutions?" But you say, "No, we cannot legislate this year, but we pledge the House." Whom do you pledge, and to what? If you meant to pledge this House to legislation on the question, there would be something in that; and, though it might be rash to give a promise as to action in a future Session, still the importance of the subject and the excitement of the public mind would perhaps justify such a step. But we stand in a very peculiar position. We all know that after the legislative changes of last year, it is simply impossible, according to all constitutional rule, that the present Parliament can continue in existence any longer than is necessary to complete the arrangements for creating new voters. You therefore—the present Parliament—will never have this question to deal with. It must be dealt with in a new Parliament, and that Parliament elected by a new and greatly increased constituency. What power have you over them? How can you give a pledge in their names? Either they will agree with your views or differ from them; that is one of the very few propositions not disputed even in an Irish debate. But if they do agree with you, what you propose to do within the next twelve months would simply prevent the filling up of one or two livings. You are, in fact, in that view of the case, advocating a superfluous measure, designed to secure an insignificant end. If you expect them to differ from you, then I do not see what you gain by placing on record what, on that hypothesis, is a mere protest by anticipation in favour of views which you cannot enforce. My opinion may be prejudiced, perhaps singular, but I hold that the Parliament of England is not a debating club; and that it is not its business to lay down general and vague propositions where it is impossible that action should follow. I have heard it said, "It is true this is a dying Parliament, but a dying man may make a will;" my answer is, certainly, but he can only bequeath what belongs to him, and, I say it with all respect, the legislation of the future is not within your competence to dispose of. The right hon. Gentleman claims a right precisely similar to that often set up by an Irish tenant-at-will, who bequeaths to some member of his family the farm, over which he has not the slightest legal right.

Lord Stanley

Well, seeing how obvious these considerations are, and that they cannot have escaped the notice of eminent politicians, I should have felt some surprise at the Resolutions being brought forward—some perplexity as to the motive and meaning of the Liberal party, if it had not been for a pamphlet which Earl Russell, the head of the great Liberal party, has most opportunely published—the same pamphlet, by the way, in which that eminent Parliamentary Leader has not thought it inconsistent with courtesy to describe his political opponents by comparisons derived from the brute creation. Earl Russell comments on a speech of mine, in which I said what I say now, and his criticism is as follows:—

"If the question is postponed till next year, the Tory party, whether forming a majority or a strong minority in the new House of Commons, may come from their elections so invigorated by hustings' speeches, and so intoxicated by the old 'Tory policy of Lord Eldon, as to refuse to their Leaders any reduction of the Irish Church Establishment."

Now, I think that passage quite perfect in its way. In the first place, it is a good measure of the faith which a Liberal Leader feels in the triumph of Liberal principles when they are to be submitted to the judgment of the people. If the poorer class of voters in the new constituency are really so open, in Earl Russell's opinion, to what he would call prejudice or fanaticism, I should have thought it was hardly worth while for one who held that opinion to pass the greater part of his political life in unceasing Parliamentary efforts to obtain the right of voting for them. But, in the next place, I admire the political morality of the doctrine implied. "If we really appeal to the people," says Earl Russell, "there is every chance of their deciding against us. Therefore, don't let us run any risk; let us make all safe now. Let us do the thing in their name at once, and take care they are never consulted about it." But, looking at the matter from a different point of view, I should like to know what is the practical result which you expect to obtain—what is the danger which you desire to avert, by forcing through this Resolution, on which you cannot act, and to the displacement of other business hardly less important, and certainly more urgent in point of time? Do you think the new Parliament unfit to deal with it? Constitutionally and consistently you cannot hold that language. Are you really afraid that the new Parliament will neglect or ignore the question of the Irish Church? No man will rise here, and, with a grave face, express that apprehension. The House knows perfectly well that under any circumstances, with any Government in power, it must be one of the first questions—probably the very first—which will attract notice from the House of Commons of 1869. Then, what is it you fear? Can it be that the apprehension entertained on that Bench is not that nothing will be done, but that something will be done—that opinion will declare itself in the constituencies—that the necessity of action will be felt—that the Legislature will take the work into its own hands, and that Liberal Leaders, if they do not pre-occupy the ground now, will not be able to claim the initiative on which they rely for their popularity and power? If so, I cannot deny that they have good personal and party reasons for what they are doing; but it is a little hard that all the business of the Session should be interrupted, not to forward a public object, but to furnish the Liberal party with an election cry—that of Reform having ceased to be available. I will not say the course taken is unprecedented; we have not forgotten the Appropriation Clause—which is not exactly the brightest page of Whig history—and some may remember the Resolution of June, 1859, framed by the same experienced hand, and which ended, no doubt, in a transfer of power, but ended, also, in shelving the Reform question effectually for the next seven years. Are you quite sure that these two precedents are desirable ones to follow, or that a repetition of them will form the most dignified and desirable conclusion for the Parliamentary system of 1832? I am never fond of dealing with personal topics, and I do not mean to inquire how far the language and conduct of those who put forward these Resolutions are in accordance with their speeches and policy when they were charged—as for the greater part of the last generation they have been—with the responsibilities of power. I give the right hon. Gentleman the full benefit of his personal defence, though I do not think, by the way, that defence quite covered the case of some speeches which I have heard delivered from this spot by those who held office with him—notably one, that of the right hon. Member for Morpeth (Sir George Grey) no longer ago than 1865, to which I suppose the right hon. Gentleman assented—at least, he did not dissent from

Lord Stanley

it. I admit that in these days events move rapidly, and that in such matters we all have to make allowances for one another. But I do say that when a change of policy is conscientiously adopted—that there has been a change no one can deny, and I certainly will not say it is not conscientious—it ought, if only as a matter of prudence, not to assume a shape in which, by outside observers, it is likely to be confounded with an electioneering manoeuvre. For thirty years Gentlemen opposite have had this question before them; and what have they done, or attempted to do, during that time? By their own confession, they have done absolutely nothing at all. I do not blame them for that. If they thought it best not to touch this question, they had a perfect right to abstain from doing so. But it is a little singular that now, being no longer in power, they cannot even wait for their own Commission to report—for it was at the instance of Earl Russell that the Commission now sitting with regard to the Established Church in Ireland was appointed)—that they cannot even allow the most necessary business of the Session to be transacted, so great is their zeal to pass, without an hour's delay, a Motion on which by no possibility, even if they can agree as to what it means, can they act until next year. Sir, I think the country will form its own judgment on all this. And if the right hon. Gentleman repeats on the hustings the phrase which he uttered in his most emphatic tones the other night, "Justice delayed is justice denied," I think he will find among the crowd some one with common sense enough to ask, "If this be justice, by whom has it been delayed? You have had the power in your own hands for twenty-five years, why did not you do justice?" But then it is said, "The passing of these resolutions will be a message of peace to Ireland?" Will it be a message of peace to the North of Ireland? Do not let me be mistaken. I am not arguing that you are not to do what you think just and right—that you are not to follow your own conscience and conviction, whether by so doing you satisfy or dissatisfy either North or South, or both, though as to the time and manner of even doing acts of justice considerations of policy may intervene. But if you put what you are doing on the ground of conciliation, I think it only fair to ask you to look at both sides. You have in Ireland 1,500,000 of Protestants, Presbyterians, and members of the Established Church, all, I apprehend, feeling alike on this matter. They may have their faults; but with all their faults they are by far the most energetic and active part of the Irish population. These Resolutions have undoubtedly come upon them by surprise; and if they pass I am afraid you will have created in their minds a feeling of rage and resentment that will go among many of them, in a country where passion runs high, very near to disaffection. Will you have conciliated the Catholic peasantry? I am not here to put forward any plea which I do not believe to be sound, and I admit that these Resolutions, or rather what is meant to be conveyed by these Resolutions, will find favour among the Catholic peasantry to a certain extent. But do not imagine that you can conciliate and satisfy the Catholic peasantry of Ireland by dealing with this Church question alone. The first question with them is the land question, and the land question, in the mind of a Celtic peasant, means something very different. Behind the question of the Church is the land question. Behind the land question, again, is the education question, on which your allies of to-day will be your most determined opponents to-morrow; and behind them all lies a difficulty more grave and permanent than any—a difficulty felt at this moment in almost every civilized country in Europe—the difficulty of reconciling the modern, the Protestant, and liberal (using that word not in any party sense) idea of administrative and social arrangements with the totally different notions of both which are held by a devotedly Catholic community under the influence and guidance of its clergy. This, I know, is touching upon delicate ground, and I am the more anxious not to let my argument be warped to a purpose to which I do not apply it. I repeat, do by all means that which you think right and just. Only guard yourselves against that common and tempting fallacy of believing that certain political consequences will follow from what you are doing, merely because from your point of view you think it right and just that they should. I do not propose to go at this time into the question of what I individually think ought to be done in the matter of the Irish Church. There will be plenty of opportunities for that. And it is not a question upon which anyone would wish to speak unadvisedly or impulsively. But I have seen and heard, and with extreme surprise, some criticisms on the Amendment which it is impossible for me to leave without answer. The right hon. Gentleman in the course of his remarks has called it "dilatory." Other critics out-of-doors have called it "disingenuous." How it can be dilatory I do not know; for I have endeavoured to give the House the earliest opportunity of voting "Aye" or "No" upon these Resolutions. How it is disingenuous I am still more puzzled to conceive; for I do not know what plain speaking is if it be not found in the words which I have put upon the Notice Paper. We affirm two propositions—one of which I conceive to require no proof—namely, that some modification, be it what it may, in the status of the Irish Church Establishment is to all appearance inevitable; the other, that for which I have been arguing, that the question is one for a future and not for the present Parliament to settle. With regard to the verbal criticism expended upon the Amendment, I should be quite prepared to defend my own English, if it were worth while occupying the time of this House in so doing. But, whatever verbal criticism you may pass upon the earlier portion of the Amendment—striking out of consideration, if you will, the first clause—it does not affect my argument. We are all free to form our own judgment as to what will, or may, or ought to happen in the future; but the practical proposition remains, and it is on that that the Vote of the House will be taken. We deny the expediency of dealing, or rather of attempting to deal, with the question which you bring before us in the present Parliament. Then it is asked, "Why not meet the Motion by a direct negative, or by the Previous Question?" Simply for this reason: either one or the other of those courses would imply, or might possibly be considered as implying, that we objected to this question being dealt with at all, in any form or at any time. And that is a misconstruction against which we reasonably desire to guard. We say that the work of the Session is quite sufficient for the Session. Whenever action shall appear to us necessary and possible we shall be ready to tell you how we are prepared to act. But our case is that at present action is neither necessary nor possible; and that being so, we will not by premature propositions or vague assertions of opinion fetter our own discretion in the future, or interfere with the judgment of a reformed House of Commons. That is position, which we submit with full confidence both to the judgment of the House and of the country.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "House" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "while admitting that considerable modifications of the temporalities of the United Church in Ireland may, after the pending inquiry, appear to be expedient, is of opinion that any proposition tending to the disestablishment or disendowment of the Church ought to be reserved for the decision of a new Parliament,"—(Lord Stanley),

instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. E. A. LEATHAM said: I approach the consideration of this great branch of the question of Ireland, especially in its relation to Irish disaffection, with great diffidence and without the high hopes of political consequences which appear to actuate some. Do what we will, establish or disestablish what we please, endow or disendow what we may, I fear that the youngest Member of this House will never live to see Ireland what she might have been if our ancestors in their dealings with her people had not read backwards every precept of Christianity and every postulate of policy. But, by the magnitude of the wrongs which Ireland has sustained in the past, we are able to measure the strides which we have already made in the direction of restitution and right. It is true that we have taken nearly a century in learning to be just; but what is there in the condition of Ireland now to excite disaffection compared with the state of things less than a century ago? Then an Irish Catholic could inherit a single acre of land, discharge the humblest and simplest duties of the political citizen, fill any office of emolument or trust, exercise any single liberal profession, teach a child. Irish manufactures were shut out of this country by law, and, from one end of Ireland to the other, tithe was exacted by force of arms and with perpetual shedding of blood. Now, to say, as has been said, that the feeling against us in Ireland is as intense as ever it was seems to me not only to fly in the face of fact, but to utter a positive satire upon all that has been done. For if, after all these ameliorations, there is no amelioration in the fierceness of her attitude towards us, then, taking for granted as we must that the bond between the two countries is indissoluble, the question which will present itself to some minds is not whether we have done enough but whether we have not done too much, whether we have not loosened our grip without tightening our embrace. But, Sir, they are not the best friends of Ireland who propagate these exaggerations. As injustice has abated so, too, has abated the sense of injustice. With the sense of injustice have abated the force and courage of sedition. Will anyone compare the vagaries of Fenianism with the outbreaks of former times? So long as you have two rival races and two hostile creeds face to face—so long as you have bitter memories on the one side and an arrogant assumption of superiority, backed by law, upon the other, so long will you have precisely that atmosphere in which disaffection delights to breed; but in proportion as you remove inequalities—in proportion as you do away with any unfair advantage which one race or one creed enjoys to the detriment of the other, depend upon it you will strengthen that love of order which is an instinct in the whole human family, and which becomes a powerful and prevailing instinct in proportion as laws are just, and men are active, prosperous, and free. What, then, is the class of measures to which we ought to trust in attempting to deal by legislative enactment with Irish discontent? Not, I think, to those whose authors profess to cure everything by a single stroke, nor yet to those whose aim is merely to tide over the crisis of the moment, but to measures which, while they are gradual in their operation, are at the same time safe and sure. We must purify the air—we must give free play to the healing force of nature—we must remove those conditions which are the perpetual source of mischief. Is it not simple folly to hope for lasting tranquillity in Ireland while we leave standing in every parish a staring monument of everything which it is essential should be forgotten? The Irish Catholic can scarcely leave his own door without breaking his shins—I beg pardon for the homeliness of the phrase—over an institution which reminds him at every turn that he belongs to a subjugated race, and, moreover, one which is still made to wear a portion of its fetters in public. The existence of the Irish Church—the Church of a pitiful minority, regarded with hostility by the great bulk of the population, but fed publicly and ostentatiously from the proceeds of their industry—the existence of a Church alien—this is not my epithet — parasitical, scandalous, yet still supreme, gives the lie to those who say we have abolished the inequality of race, and we have effaced the brand of conquest. It is impossible to take another step forward in the way of pacification while you leave this lion of Protestant ascendancy still in the path. But, Sir, if these inequalities are to be redressed, in what spirit are they to be redressed? I listened with the greatest possible pleasure to what fell from the right hon. Gentleman in this relation, for it is not in the spirit of a conqueror that we must proceed to exorcise the spirit of conquest. The fall must come, but let it be broken by every means in our power. But, Sir, the case is not to be met by a partition of revenues. You may joint-stock a private firm. You cannot joint-stock a National Church. For what is the fundamental notion of a National Church? Is it not an assumption of orthodoxy patented and guaranteed by the State? But you cannot have half-a-dozen true faiths. And if this principle be sanctioned in Ireland, what is to prevent a general scramble for the revenues of the Church of England?—and when that scramble takes place who can consistently withhold his share from Mormon? Now, Sir, let me say a few words with reference to the arguments which are adduced on behalf of the Irish Establishment. We are told that it is a corporate body, and that it has inherited its property from another corporate body — the Roman Catholic Church—and that, therefore, that property must not be disturbed. But putting on one side the fact that there has been a formidable break in the succession, it may, I think, be matter of doubt whether the Irish Church has a right to the full privileges of a corporate body, because there must have been an original and vital flaw in the constitution of a National Church which has never been able to identify itself with the nation. But even if we grant the existence of these privileges, we have still excellent authority for disendowment. What does Archbishop Whately say upon this point? “I freely acknowledge,” he says—

Lord Stanley

“That the State has a right to take away the property of all or any of these corporations—indemnifying, of course, those individuals actually enjoying the revenue—whenever the manifest utility or hurtfulness of the institutions renders their abolition important to the public welfare”— circumstances which we maintain have actually arisen. But it is contended that if we disendow the Irish Church, we shall have established a fatal precedent against the endowment of the Church of England. I deny the parallelism of the two cases. Place the Church of England in the same position in relation to the mass of the population in England as that which is occupied by the Church of Ireland in relation to the population there—and does any one believe that the Church of England, in the face of the wide and free suffrage which you have given to the people, could endure for a single Session of Parliament? But the Church of Ireland is a Missionary Church, and therefore it is to be protected. Now, you have other Protestant Churches in Ireland which are Missionary Churches, but which are not established by the State. There are nearly 200 parishes in Ireland in which there is not a single Churchman—but in how many parishes does the House suppose that the Church of Ireland has gained a footing since the year 1834? In five. What have the other Protestant Churches been doing? The Presbyterians have gained during the same period a footing in 623 parishes, and “other Dissenters” in 526. So much for the efforts of this Missionary Church. Now, before this debate commenced two hon. Gentlemen opposite proceeded to knock us down with the 5th Article of the Act of Union and the Coronation Oath. I listened attentively to the 5th Article, but I failed to hear a single word about temporalities. And if I had, surely the Legislature is competent to undo what it has done. As regards the Coronation Oath, it is difficult to reply to the objection with gravity. Perhaps it is better to do so in the words of Archbishop Whately, who, when it was raised in his presence, is reported to have said, “Why this would give us four Estates of the Realm — King, Lords, Commons, and Oath.” Material changes have been made in the Constitution since the Sovereign’s accession. To these changes Her Majesty has been graciously pleased to give her Assent, but no one accuses Her Majesty of violating her Coronation Oath. There is one more argument which has been raised in these debates with which I will attempt to deal. It has been said that if we disendow the Irish Church, we shall cause the withdrawal from all parts of the country of a number of useful and amiable gentlemen who at present hold benefices. Hon. Gentlemen treat the Church as though she were a society for the diffusion of useful and amiable gentlemen. But who is proposing that these useful and amiable gentlemen should leave their posts? Are we to suppose that the moment State aid is withdrawn the Church of Ireland will collapse like a punctured wind-bag? Is this what is meant by the force of Protestantism in Ireland? Is this the result of 300 years' petting and coddling by the State? Now, in the course of these remarks, I have said nothing about the abuses which—I will not say have crept into the Irish Church, but marched into it with head erect. I have avoided all such reference for two reasons—first, because any such allusion is calculated to embitter this controversy; and secondly, because any such allusion is altogether beside the mark. For it is not the pruning knife that we are asking for, it is the axe; it is not reform, but disendowment. But let me say a few words before I sit down with reference to the arguments of the noble Lord. The noble Lord (Lord Stanley) tells us that he cannot understand these Resolutions, and that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) has left him in the dark. I imagine that the noble Lord is the only man in this House who, reading the Resolutions together with the commentary of the right hon. Gentleman has not had his eyes opened. But the noble Lord objects that the Resolutions contain no definite plan for the disposal of the revenues of the Irish Church, and therefore refuses to listen to them. But the right hon. Gentleman has told us how he would dispose of at least two-thirds of those revenues. Then the noble Lord proceeded to argue that this Parliament was incompetent to deal with this question at all. Do not let us pronounce so harsh a judgment against ourselves. This Parliament has been thought competent to deal with the most vital and most difficult question that can come before any Parliament; and it has dealt with it in such a manner as to excite the liveliest satisfaction in the bosom of the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, and of the jubilant party which he instructs. But the noble Lord says that we are about to die. Do not let the serenity of the closing scene be disturbed by distressing importunities. Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die. But I have always understood that it was precisely upon their death-beds that people were brought to a true sense of their responsibilities. "But," says the noble Lord, "we have made our wills; we have handed over everything to our successors." Can hon. Gentlemen opposite entirely trust their successors? What in all probability will be the character of the Parliament which follows this? Will it be distinguished by the qualities which grace the Benches opposite? Will it be a peculiarly cautious Parliament, full of reverence for the past and of anxiety about the future? or will it be a Parliament of buoyant hopes—a Parliament which walks by faith rather than by sight? But, is this exactly the kind of Parliament to which to entrust a question requiring great delicacy of touch, a nice regard for the rights of vested interests, a gentle handling of prejudices, and of those better and nobler predilections which, if they belong to the family of prejudice at all, are at least its most reputable members? I am quite of the noble Lord's opinion that the new Parliament will be prepared to deal with this question, and to deal with it resolutely. But will it deal with it kindly—will it deal with it as we are dealing with it—without passion? The hand which you have enfranchised is vigorous and strong. It will soon be skilful; but, of necessity, it comes, comparatively speaking, raw to its work. The new Parliament must be, in one sense, a 'prentice Parliament, and it is not to a 'prentice Parliament that we ought, in our indolence, to leave arrears of work—and work, too, which will tax to the uttermost the skill and experience of statesmen. Yet it cannot be contended that any decision which we may arrive at now will be flagrantly at variance with the wishes of those who follow us. The policy of the new Parliament is already casting its shadow over us. We have caught its tone without as yet catching what the noble Lord would perhaps call its temerity. In us the caution of the past and the courage of the future seem for the moment to join hands. Surely this is a great opportunity. "But," says the noble Lord, "You are not going to legislate." No, but we are going to lay down the landmarks which will limit future legislation. We are proposing to establish these three principles—disestablishment, disendowment—but disestablishment and disendowment in the gentlest, fairest, most indulgent way. And what is the alternative if you reject these Resolutions? A year's fierce agitation in Ireland. A year's angry recrimination in England. A year's passion. One would have thought that hon. Gentlemen opposite had had enough of popular agitation. Two years ago another great question oc-occupied exactly the same position as that which is now occupied by this. You treated that question as you are treating this. You met argument and entreaty then as you are meeting them now, not in the old manly Tory fashion, but by equivocation. And what did it all end in? A leap in the dark! The right hon. Gentleman is already preparing to take another leap in the dark. Mark how punctiliously he follows the precedents of last year! You had a perpetual change of front then; you have had a perpetual change of front now. You had a fierce blast of the trumpet then; you have had it now. Will the education of hon. Gentlemen opposite never come to a close?

Mr. E. A. Leatham

MR. O'NEILL said, he did not know why the Irish Church should be subject to such severe attacks as had lately been directed against her from various quarters. Somewhat similar attacks were made in 1834, but she survived those attacks; she remained the Established Church of the country, notwithstanding them. Had her position changed so as to make her justly the subject of severe attack now? Her position had certainly changed since 1834; but he would tell the House in what manner. From 1834 to 1861 the population of Ireland had decreased; but relatively the Roman Catholics had decreased and the Protestants had increased; and, of all the Protestant denominations in Ireland, the Established Church had increased the most. During the same period the Irish Church had been dealt with severely by legislation. In 1838, one-fourth of her tithes had been given to the landlords; and in 1854, she lost £12,500, ministers' money. She had lost over £240,000 since 1834. But while the Church had been losing a portion of her revenues, she had increased in efficiency. Since 1826, the number of her clergy had increased by 195, of her churches by 387, and of her glebe-houses by 210. Then as to the missionary character of the Church. She had increased her labours among the Roman Catholic population. The late Bishop of Tuam had furnished statistics to show how the number of congregations and that of churches had increased in the district of West Connaught within the last twenty-five years. During that time the number of churches there had risen from 7 to 27, that of congregations from 13 to 57, and of clergy from 11 to 35; and, in a very interesting letter to The Times, the Archbishop of Dublin bore testimony to the missionary work in the West of Ireland. In a Charge delivered by the late Bishop of Derry in 1866, the allegation that the Church Establishment was felt by the Roman Catholic population as a badge of servitude was ably met. The Bishop said—

“Who desires its destruction? Not, surely, the great mass of the people belonging to the Roman Catholic communion—shopkeepers, small farmers, and labourers—who live in peace and harmony with their Protestant neighbours, and who recognize the Church clergyman, if not as their pastor, at least as their friend and neighbour, living among them, and expending at home, not only his Church income, but usually more or less of his private income also—ever ready to help them all with advice and assistance.”

It had been said that the Irish Church was a “grievous wrong,” a “crying injustice,” a “badge of conquest.” He presumed that the alleged injustice consisted in the enjoyment of glebe lands and tithe rent-charge by the Established Church. Now, with regard to the glebe lands, many of them were given to the clergy by the native princes and landowners when Ireland was an independent country; while those in Ulster were granted at the time of the plantation of that province in the reign of James I. Those lands, moreover, were confirmed to the Church by the Act of Settlement, the same statute which confirmed to Roman Catholic proprietors lands which they or their ancestors had forfeited. The title of the Church to its property was therefore as good as that of any landed proprietor, resting as it did on a prescription of some three centuries, and it would surely be a great injustice to confiscate it. As to tithe, this was of the nature of a reserved rent, belonging neither to the occupier nor the landlord; and it was one of those charges which the landlord and tenant were bound to pay—although they might not approve the purposes to which they were applied—since they had come, the one into possession of his estate, the other into the occupation of the land, on the express or implied condition of bearing those obligations. In the North of Ireland, too, land in the country districts did not yield on an average a rental of more than 20s. per acre, and the tithe charge was of course proportionately small. It was true that the Established Church occupied a more favourable position than other communions, her clergy being paid, while the clergy of other bodies were not so to any great extent; but if the principle on which we acted in England and Scotland were a sound one, that the State was bound to provide for the religious teaching of its subjects—a pure and scriptural form of religious worship, free of cost—he could not see why the Irish Establishment should be abolished, especially as such a step would be a flagrant breach of the Act of the Union, which provided that—

“The continuance and preservation of the said United Church as the Established Church of England and Ireland shall be deemed and taken to be an essential and fundamental part of the Union.”

It would also be a violation of the pledge contained in the Emancipation Act of 1829. The Resolution passed on the 6th of March of that year, and without which the Emancipation Act could not have been carried, provided—

“For the full and permanent security of the Establishments in Church and State; for the maintenance of the Reformed Religion, established by Law, and of the rights and privileges of the Bishops and of the Clergy of this Realm, and the Churches committed to their charge.”

In fact, as Dr. Lee had well put it, in the event of the Irish Establishment being done away—

“The Act of Union in its most fundamental article would have to be repealed, much of the Act of Settlement cancelled, and the spirit of the Roman Catholic Emancipation Act of 1829 openly violated: the Constitution will have received the most violent shock it has sustained since the Reformation. Let every English citizen count the cost before he embarks on this perilous crusade.”

And here he must express his acknowledgments to those whose writings he had consulted on this subject; and especially the Rev. Dr. Lee, from whose able publications he had derived much valuable assistance. Then let the House reflect what would be the social consequences of this proposal. Political and religious feelings were perhaps the strongest which agitated men's minds, even when they acted separately, as in England they generally did.

In Ireland, however, unhappily, they very often acted together, and each one was strengthened and intensified by the other. On the one side there would be an excitable Celtic population, who did not regard the Established Church as a grievance except in so far as they were led to do so by persons who had objected to all State Churches; but on the other, if public opinion in Ireland were excited on this question, would no doubt enter into the matter with all their native ardour; while on the other side would be an influential portion of the community who, while anxious to live on friendly terms with those of a different faith, yet believed that the solemn pledges given by Parliament constituted their Church's property secure to them and their descendants, and would be prepared to use every constitutional means in defence of the property of their Church. If the political and religious feelings of these two parties were brought into conflict, the agitation would neutralize much of the harmonizing effect of the beneficent legislation of the last half century. And lastly, Ireland being an integral part of the kingdom of Britain, it was for the welfare and happiness of her people that they should participate closely in all that is intimately connected with the British Constitution. If the Church of Ireland were disestablished, on the ground that it was not the Church of the majority, consistency would require the application of the same principle to Wales, and it might next be put in operation in Scotland, since in some parishes the majority of the inhabitants were not connected with the Establishment. [Mr. HADFIELD: Hear!] The hon. Member for Sheffield agreed in that view, and was prepared to apply the principle of disestablishment universally; but he could not believe that the House would rashly commit itself to so vital a change in our Constitution. The principal ground, however, on which he defended the Irish Church was that it was the ancient Catholic Church of the land; that it existed 700 years before the English set foot in the country, and before the supremacy of the Pope was acknowledged; and that its apostolic doctrine was the same as that which was taught by St. Patrick, and which was re-asserted and restored at the Reformation.

MR. POLLARD-URQUHART said, that the hon. Gentleman who had last spoken, referring to the relative numbers of Protestants and Catholics in Ireland in 1861 and 1834, had stated that the proportion of Protestants had slightly increased. It was true that the proportion had increased, but only slightly; in spite of the severe sufferings of the people from famine and plague and the large emigration which had greatly thinned the Catholic population. The hon. Gentleman had argued for the maintenance of the Established Church in Ireland on the ground of its missionary character. But, if it was a missionary Church, that was a reason why it should no longer be retained as a State Church. He knew nothing more irritating to the feelings of the Roman Catholic population of Ireland than that a Church should be paid and maintained by the State for the purpose of converting them from what they believed to be the only true religion. As long as an Established Church was retained in Ireland on these principles it would be a constant source of hatred to England, and would keep up the desire of getting rid of English misrule. The hon. Gentleman had alluded to the increasing efforts that were made by the Protestants of Ireland. Well, he rejoiced that there was vitality enough still left among them to support their Church under any circumstances, and for that reason he hoped every sincere Protestant would give his support to the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone). He could not help thinking that the two great debates of this Session—the one on the Motion of the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Maguire), and the other now in progress must afford matter of astonishment to all our contemporaries who looked on at a distance, as they would also to our posterity when they came to view these things in a calm spirit. What was the reason that Englishmen had succeeded in the government of a colony which they had taken from France more than 100 years ago—indeed, had succeeded so well that the only difficulty would be in persuading that colony to set up for itself? What was the reason that they had succeeded so well in governing a vast tract of territory situated at the other side of the globe, and that they had failed in the case of Ireland, a country scarcely separated from Great Britain, and this after so many centuries of conquest, and after a legislative union nearly three-quarters of a century ago? There were simple people who said it was because they had attempted to maintain a State Church there, and to force, by more or less partial laws, a distasteful religion upon the people. He regretted the circumstances under which Parliament had been brought to think seriously about this matter. It had been remarked that the Penal Laws had been relaxed under the fear of Paul Jones and the American privateers; the Emancipation Act passed when the Duke of Wellington himself stood appalled at the prospect of a civil war; and that the miserable Maynooth Grant had been thrown as a sop to the people of Ireland, when, as Mr. Macaulay said, Mr. O'Connell and President Polk had made the House a little uneasy. And now, more than twenty years after, they had begun seriously to think whether the Established Church ought any longer to be maintained, because the murder of a policeman at Manchester and the explosion at Clerkenwell had made them a little afraid.

Mr. O'Neil

"When the devil was sick the devil a monk would be;

When the devil was well the devil a monk was he."

These lines very well expressed the policy of this country towards Ireland. He regretted very much the way in which this Motion had been met by the noble Lord opposite, and also by some hon. Members on that side of the House. They fancied that, because the Fenian conspiracy was scotched and there was no immediate fear of war, the people of Ireland might be put off to a more convenient season. It was as if the personage already alluded to was, on feeling a little better, to say to his father confessor, "Go thy way, and when at a more convenient time I will hear thee." That game had been tried too long. There was a time when the Irish people looked with some degree of confidence upon the Imperial Legislature. That was during the period of Lord Melbourne's Administration. When Sir Robert Peel was in office in 1844, the Opposition made a Motion almost justifying Mr. O'Connell's Repeal agitation because the Government of that day was doing nothing for Ireland; and again, in 1846, they turned out Sir Robert Peel because he had done nothing for Ireland. But when the Whigs came in they said that was not the proper time for dealing with the grievances of the Irish people; the question would keep; let them go their way. When such had been our policy, was it any wonder that many well-meaning men in Ireland declared that they had no hope whatever except in a national Legislature; that many mischievous men had set up a party, the avowed object of which was to make representative Government altogether impossible; and that men still more mischievous had said,—"It is all in vain to look to England, you must look to the United States, there is your only hope;" and that they had found a great many foolish and deluded people willing to listen to them? He entreated the House and the Government no longer to carry on this game of delay. If they disapproved the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, let them meet it by a direct negative. They might think matters quiet now; but they did not know what a year might produce. Was Europe so tranquil; were our International relations with the United states so good that they could dismiss all easiness? Was the public mind of Ireland so quiet because they had brought a few men to punishment? He had heard it said that if the Church were disestablished to-morrow there would not be a Fenian the less. There might still be mischievous men coming from America, but they could find very different materials to work upon. We ourselves might now laugh at little boys letting off squibs and crackers in the streets, but we should cease to laugh if we found this House was underlaid with gunpowder. Depend upon it, the whole of the social fabric was undermined with most explosive materials, ready to be ignited at any time. It was said that the people of Ireland themselves cared very little about the Established Church in that country, and that they complained of high rents and other material evils—very likely. A duty patient often assures his medical adviser that he feels none the worse for his daily bottle of port; that what he really wants is something to sooth the pain in his head or foot. The physician, if he is honest, will assure him that he will continue to feel pain somewhere if he does not adopt temperate habits. So it is with Irish grievances and ills. Why have they not found their remedy in Ireland, as like grievances had in other parts of the United Kingdom? This social virus of religious ascendancy had spread through the whole social system of Ireland, and so long as it continued to poison that system, so long would the material state of the country be unsatisfactory. He entreated the House to treat this question thoroughly and resolutely. Once let these enormous iniquities cease to exist, then Ireland would soon after cease to be an anomaly and a by-word among nations.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, he regretted that a question of such vital importance, and involving so many serious difficulties, should be made a party question. It was really lamentable that, while the whole House felt impressed with the importance of the subject, it should become a mere party discussion to decide who were to sit upon the Treasury Bench. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone) had read the first Resolution submitted by him to the House, and had stated the second in substance. Granting to the right hon. Gentleman the first Resolution, what did the second amount to? The right hon. Gentleman, admitting that it was impossible to interfere with private patronage, did not hesitate to come down to the House to propose a Resolution to interfere with and arrest the direct Prerogative of the Crown. The question, it must be admitted, was involved in great difficulties. The Established Church in Ireland presented an anomaly. There were 5,000,000 Roman Catholics, whose Church had no endowments, while the Church of 700,000 or 800,000 Protestants was amply endowed. He believed that no man of sane mind could be found who would propose the establishment of a Church under similar circumstances in a new country; and if a plan could be devised to remedy this anomaly, and which at the same time would protect vested rights and the rights of the State, he for one should be willing to enter frankly and fairly into the consideration of such a plan. But the right hon. Gentleman opposite came down to the House and proposed to destroy the State Church root and branch, by a simple Resolution, and would not even allow the next Parliament an opportunity of discussing this question. The Church in Ireland was an anomaly; but what was the precise quality of the grievance? Some persons said that the grievance consisted in the endowment of so small a number of Protestants, and that the Establishment as it stood was viewed by the Roman Catholics as a badge of slavery and an insult. Now with respect to endowment they met the startling fact that the Roman Catholics declared that they did not want the revenues of the Church—that they cared nothing for them, and would not, under any circumstances accept them. The same Gentlemen who expressed anxiety for the interest of the Roman Catholics in Ireland were also the very Gentlemen who, two years ago, in discussing the Italian question, were in favour of the confiscation of Church property in Italy. That seemed to be a very strange inconsistency. He could only apply the word confiscation to the object aimed at by hon. Gentlemen opposite, whether he considered their conduct in relation to the Italian question or to the Protestant Church in Ireland. Those hon. Gentlemen knew well that confiscation was one step towards very great changes. As to the Church being in a state of bondage in Ireland and an insult to the Roman Catholics there, he (Mr. Cochrane) might say that he was a Dissenter in Scotland, being a member of the Episcopalian Church. As a landlord he had to support the Presbyterian Church, the revenues of which were taken from the Episcopalian Church. While he did so, he did not regard, nor had he ever heard in Scotland, that the people there regarded the giving of support in that way as a badge of servitude. On the contrary, the Episcopalians entertained the kindest feeling towards the Presbyterian Church in Scotland. When we begin to confiscate Church property we take one step towards revolution. It had been so in France in the Revolution, after the peace of Luneville. The same thing had been done in Italy. The whole of the Church property in Italy was confiscated. It was reserved for an honoured and distinguished and independent Member of this House, his noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and for Members of the English Parliament on the Government side of the House, to rise up and plead on behalf of that noble and magnificent institution, the Monte Casino. At the recommendation of the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) his noble Friend had a correspondence on the subject, while Roman Catholic Members opposite were perfectly silent with reference to it. The argument based upon the prevalence of Fenianism, and the miserable state of Ireland in consequence, his noble Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland completely disposed of on a previous occasion. An admirable work had been written by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Cork (Mr. Maguire); it was full of information, yet every word in that book refutes his own argument. If you go to such places as Canada, Prince Edward's Island, to Nova Scotia, or wherever the Irish people might be found, there they were a prosperous, a happy and contented people. There was not not one word in that book to show that the Irish entertained those bitter feelings towards England which hon. Members opposite were constantly alleging in support of their views, but the contrary was proved to be the fact. So that, indeed, the Fenian movement had not arisen from distress or dissatisfaction in Ireland; but, as had been truly said by his noble Friend, it arose from the American War. The Tenant Right Society in Meath, which was set on foot in November, 1865, by a Roman Catholic Bishop, Dr. Nulty, passed the following unanimous resolution:—

Mr. Pollard-Urquhart

"The one, the great, the sole question for Ireland is the land question. Other agitations, such as that against the Established Church, are got up for party purposes, would infuse an element of bigotry into the already disturbed relations of landlord and tenant, would effect the ruin of thousands of tenants, and precipitate that social catastrophe which we are anxious to avert."

The Tablet, a Roman Catholic organ, a few years ago, said—

"If the Irish Church Establishment were abolished to-morrow; if its churches, lands, and rent-charges were applied to secular and even to Catholic purposes; or if the Catholic Church were put upon a level of perfect equality, we should only have dealt with one symptom, and not have reached the seat of the disease. The wound of Ireland is that, whereas the great majority of the population are Catholics, such a large proportion of the soil belongs to Protestants, and that Protestants form such a large portion of those classes which are raised in social station higher than the others."

And only last May the same journal added—

"We are of those who think that the notion of settling the Irish Church question by simply confiscating the property of the Protestant Church and abolishing its privileges is a foolish notion, and ought to be opposed as foolish, futile, and wrong."

The fact was, that these people liked a grievance. If you abolished the Church and gave them the land of Ireland into the bargain, they would still be dissatisfied; just as it was said of somebody that if you gave him Great Britain and Ireland for an estate, he would still want the Isle of Man for a potato garden. Apropos of this, Earl Russell, in his pamphlet, told a story which was taken from Spanish biography—

"It is related of Gonsalvo de Cordova, called the Gran Capitan by his countrymen, that he was promised by King Ferdinand the high post of Grand Master of the Order of Calatrava. But the King having afterwards altered his mind and disposed of the post otherwise, sent to the Great Captain to offer him the city of Loja. 'No,' said Don Gonsalvo; 'tell the King that I prefer my grievance to the city of Loja.'"

In 1838 the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone) wrote a pamphlet, which made a deep impression. He did not quote it now to show that the right hon. Gentleman had changed his opinions, but to cite the admirable arguments he had then used in defence of the Irish Church—arguments as sound and forcible now as they were then. The work was dedicated to the University of Oxford—

"Tried and not found wanting through the vicissitudes of 1000 years, and in the hope that the temper of these pages may be found not alien from her own."

In that work were these passages—

"The governing body of the State, in order fully to discharge its duties, must profess, must support, must propagate a religion, must profess it personally and collectively. Upon us of this day has fallen—and we shrink not from it, but welcome it as a high and glorious, though an arduous duty—the defence of the Reformed Catholic Church in Ireland, as the religious Establishment of the country. The Protestant Legislature of the Empire maintains in the possession of the Church property in Ireland the members of a creed professed by one-ninth of its population, regarded with partial favour by scarcely another ninth, and disowned by the remaining seven; and not only does this anomaly meet us in full view but we have also to consider the fact that the maintenance of the Church for nearly three centuries in Ireland has been contemporaneous with a system of partial government, and of gross inattention to the interests of a noble and neglected people. But, however formidable at first sight these admissions are, they in no degree affect the foregoing arguments, they do not change the nature of truth, they do not relieve Government of its responsibility; a common form of faith binds the Irish Protestants to ourselves.”

He was sure that the right hon. Gentleman was most sincere in any change of opinion he had undergone, but the right hon. Gentleman had not succeeded, in 1868, in answering the arguments which he had urged in 1838. In another instance the right hon. Gentleman had not been quite candid with the House. He stated that his opinions had been undergoing a change for the last twenty or twenty-four years. But in 1865 there was debate in this House on the Irish Church, and the right hon. Baronet the Member for Northampton (Sir George Grey) then made, in the name of the Government, a speech, in the course of which he said—

“That being the case, Her Majesty’s Government have no hesitation in saying, that they are not prepared to undertake the responsibility of proposing to Parliament a Bill calculated to effect that object. They believe that this object (disestablishment) cannot be obtained except by means which must inflict great injury upon Ireland. . . . To have the Irish Protestant Church established as an existing institution in Ireland; it is not recent creation, it rests upon the prescription of centuries, and, to use the expression of a distinguished Roman Catholic layman, it is rooted in our institutions: the firm belief of the Government is that it could not be subverted without revolution, with all the horrors that attend revolution.”—[3 Hansard, clxxviii. 398, 400.]

It was remarkable if the opinions of the right hon. Gentleman were undergoing a change at that time, that he should not have risen and denied the statements which his Colleague then made in the name of the Government. It was a strange example of inconsistency. Again Earl Russell said in 1853—

“I am obliged, then, to conclude—most unwillingly to conclude, but most decidedly—that the endowment of the Roman Catholic religion in Ireland, in place of the endowment of the Protestant Church in that country in connection with the

this country ought to adopt or sanction. Sir, these opinions of mine may lead to conclusions unpalatable to many who belong to the Roman Catholic Church. They may lead to a persistence in a state of things that I quite admit to be anomalous and unsatisfactory; but I am obliged, as a Member of this Parliament, to consider—and to consider most seriously in the present state of the world—that which is best adapted to maintain the freedom and permanence of our institutions. . . . Seeing these things I give my decided resistance to the proposal of the hon. Gentleman for the abolition of the Established Church in Ireland.”—[3 Hansard, cxxvii. 946.]

Well, then, was there much encouragement to be derived from the course of policy which had been pursued towards Ireland of late years? The House would recollect the oath, not now taken, but formerly administered to Roman Catholic Members—

“I do hereby disclaim, disavow, and solemnly abjure any intention to subvert the present Church Establishment as settled by law within this realm; and I do solemnly swear that I never will exercise any privilege to which I am or may become entitled to disturb or weaken the Protestant religion, or Protestant Government in the United Kingdom; and I do solemnly in the presence of God profess, testify, and declare that I do make this declaration and every part thereof in plain and ordinary sense of the words of this oath, without any evasion, equivocation, or mental reservation whatsoever.”

He admitted the anomalous position of the Irish Church, alluded to by Mr. Gladstone in 1838, and if there were any means of removing that anomaly with a due regard to vested rights he would gladly do so. He felt the danger with which we were threatened. He concurred in the opinions he had quoted, that interference with the Irish Church would lead to revolution; at any rate it must lead to great disturbance, and that not among the Protestants only in Ireland. He dreaded all this because it involved the fulfilment of a prediction made by the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) a few years ago. Speaking at Birmingham, he said, “Let the Reform Bill be carried, and I will at once attack the Establishment in England and the feudality of the dark ages.” That was ten years ago, and the statement appeared in an edition of the hon. Member’s speeches corrected by himself. He was delighted if he might infer from the gesture of the hon. Member, that he was now penitent, and was becoming moderate in his views under the guidance of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire. For himself he thought the words of the Coronation Oath should be impressed upon every man’s heart. He had been educated to support the principles of Church and State, advocated by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, to whom he owed a part of his education. Therefore he would do his best, as long as it was possible, to maintain that union, in the interests of this country and as a means of rooting religion in the affections of the people.

Mr. Baillie Cochrane

MR. MONCREIFF said, he entertained a hope that from that time a better day was about to dawn for Ireland. Looking at the speeches of the right hon. Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone) and the noble Lord opposite, it appeared that the obstacles that had so long stood in the way of the pacification of Ireland would, at no distant day, be finally removed. If no further obstacle were presented to that consummation than was contained in the Amendment which was the subject of debate, its ambiguous terms, and the faltering tone of the noble Lord who moved it, would afford no grounds for fearing the revolution or strife apprehended by the last speaker. The noble Lord scarcely realized the magnitude and importance of the issue. The Motion was only the offspring of the discussion which took place a few days ago. We were told that this was to be an Irish Session; that the state of Ireland was one fraught with imminent peril; that it was desirable, and it was intended, to have the matter discussed; and we were promised, some time ago, with some parade, a declaration of the policy of the Government. That was made in the speech of the noble Earl (the Earl of Mayo), which disclosed a policy which neither the House, nor Ireland, nor this country could accept. If we were to believe the Amendment of the Government, it amounted to a confession that their propositions did not amount to a cure for the state of Ireland. Under these circumstances, the right hon. Member for South Lancashire had offered these Resolutions as a contribution towards a policy for Ireland, and the question was, "Will the House accept that policy?" It was satisfactory to note that the Irish Church had met with no defence or justification. Many statements had been made, and arguments brought forward; but not a word had been said in favour of the Irish Church Establishment itself. No wonder it should not be defended. Formed by injustice, nurtured in discontent, the fertile source of heartburnings—a great obstacle, as he apprehended, in the way of the Protestant religion—the scandal of the principle of Church Establishments, and an obstruction in the way of good government, its history, associations, and principle alike precluded the possibility of defence. When the right hon. Gentleman gave notice of his Motion, the knell of the Irish Church was rung, and the mode in which Government met that Motion placed the matter beyond all doubt. The first note sounded was a letter from the Prime Minister to a noble Earl (the Earl of Dartmouth), published in the newspapers. The Prime Minister said—

"We have heard something lately of the crisis of Ireland. In my opinion the crisis of England is rather at hand; for the purpose is now avowed, and that by a powerful party, of destroying that sacred union between Church and State which has hitherto been the chief means of our civilization and is the only security for our religious liberty."

The noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs could not find disendowment in the right hon. Member's Resolutions; he could not find in them any indication of an intention to take away the endowments of the Irish Church; yet the Prime Minister had said, not only that the Church of Ireland was to be destroyed, but that the purpose of attacking the English Church was not only entertained, but avowed. This, according to the Prime Minister, was seen on the face of the Resolutions; but, at all events, it was only because they went to destroy the union between Church and State in England that the Resolution was to be opposed. As regarded the Church of Ireland, there was nothing to be said. When they came to the discussion of that night, the subject was treated with all becoming solemnity; but the noble Lord's Amendment was not in harmony with these demonstrations. The Amendment of the noble Lord might mean anything or nothing. It did not imply that the disestablishment of the Irish Church would destroy the security for our religious liberty; on the contrary, it looked forward with complacency to the possibility of a new Parliament dealing with the question in that way. That view was supported by the fact that the noble Lord, in a moment of forgetfulness, said, in effect, "The right hon. Gentleman is making a party move for party purposes; he and his party want the credit of doing it; they want to be the first in the field; we are quite ready to do it if only you will give us time. True, their proposition is to destroy the only security for our religious liberty; but if you leave this Establishment until the new Parliament, we will take the credit from them, and carry their measure ourselves."

(Mr. Moncreiff) wanted to know the principle on which hon. Gentlemen opposite intended to discuss the question. Was it to be a question of the inviolability of Church revenues, the Coronation Oath, and the Articles of Union? Was the Conservative party going to maintain the ground it had so often maintained, or had it abandoned that ground? The House was entitled to a distinct and clear answer. The cries of "Protestant ascendancy" and "No surrender" were once and for ever abandoned, surely the patriotic course was to say so plainly. The evil done by ambiguous speaking was not to be told. It was said this was a party move; but hon. Gentlemen opposite could if they liked destroy its party character at once. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department declared in 1865 that as long as he had a seat he would maintain the connection between Church and State. Had hon. Gentlemen opposite abandoned those opinions? If they had let them say so, and not palter with the House; let them state plainly whether the Irish Church was to be maintained, or whether both sides of the House were jointly to arrange a plan of adjustment based upon its disestablishment. The noble Lord said they were ready to admit that considerable modifications in the temporalities of the Irish Church might appear to be necessary after the pending inquiry. But why the House of Commons was to admit that he (Mr. Moncreiff) did not know. Why was the House of Commons to admit that something was to appear necessary on a pending inquiry—especially when this was a moribund Parliament? He could understand a person's declaring that the Irish Church was an anomaly, and therefore should no longer exist. What the noble Lord said was equivalent to this: "You may be perfectly right—I do not know if you are wrong—but you must not say it in this Parliament." But it was forgotten that they were dealing with a crisis in Ireland, and, as the right hon. Gentleman the First Minister of the Crown had said, a crisis in England also. It was not the Resolution of his right hon. friend which made the crisis, but the substance of the Resolution. As a Scotchman, he entertained, in common with all his countrymen, the warmest sympathy for Ireland, produced partly by the analogy and partly by the contrast of the countries. Both had had their struggles. Scotland as well as Ireland had the Celt and the Saxon, and a climate not more propitious than that country. Scotland had had her difficulties, ecclesiastical, political, social, and agricultural. But there the analogy ended, and the contrast commenced. The result produced in Scotland was one of unexampled prosperity and peace. There were 20,000 soldiers in Ireland, while in Scotland the number was so small that it could hardly be called a garrison. In fact, there were not sufficient to control a determined mob. He had listened with profound interest to the debate introduced by the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Maguire). In some respects, he thought the hon. Member had made but a weak case of grievance, although a strong one of disaffection. He did not think Fenianism could be said to be directly caused by any of the matters referred to. It did not arise from the land question, from mixed education, or from the Church, and certainly not from the want of Government subsidies, for whilst Scotland contributed one-fifth more to the revenue, she received only one-fourth of the amount of the Irish subsidies. But the fact remained, and if no grievance they could lay their hand upon was the cause of disaffection—if they had disaffection and no visible cause for it, there could be no more dangerous symptom. When they knew the precise evil, they could apply a remedy to it. They could remove disaffection by removing the cause. It had been said that the state of Ireland was not now so alarming as in 1798 and 1848, but he (Mr. Moncreiff) could not agree in that opinion. The Rebellion of 1798 was a common-place rebellion; that of 1848 was very much the same. There were recognized leaders; they struck the leaders, and the rebellion went out. But Fenianism was a monster without a head. It cropped up everywhere. It was not confined to Ireland; it made its appearance also in England and Scotland; its ramifications extended all over the country. There was nothing to take hold of; yet there were indications that, if it had succeeded, it would have been a rising against everything venerable, respectable, and valuable. It had no leaders, but spread down to the lowest basis of society. That was the evil they had to guard against. The noble Lord talked of leaving this matter to the next Parliament; but who knew what might happen in the interval? It had often been said that England's difficulty was Ireland's opportunity, and that difficulty might arise. He might be asked, how would the reform of the Irish Church stop Fenianism? He said, in the only way in which it could ever be stopped. Fenianism was the recoil of the wave of oppression, and it was only by removing the sense of oppression that it could be dealt with. They might think that a tardy repentance would atone for former sins ; but it would do nothing of the kind. It was only Ireland that could put down Irish disaffection. They wanted to have the spirit and feeling as well as the act of loyalty ; and this could never be had till they dealt justly with Ireland, and removed those things which were felt, and could not but be felt, as marks of degradation. He believed that passing the Resolution of his right hon. Friend the Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone) would do more to bind the Irish to this country, and to renew those feelings which naturally sprung up in the breasts of the Roman Catholic population, than anything which had been done within this century. But it was said that this was only a party movement. The noble Lord said he respected a change of opinion, except in one particular set of circumstances—that was upon the eve of an election, and for a mere election cry. The noble Lord, he supposed, had no particular objection to changes of opinion under certain other circumstances—for instance, to maintaining one set of opinions on one side of the House, and another set on the other side. But when it was said that his right hon. Friend had got up this cry simply for the occasion, he must say a more unjust accusation could not be conceived. It was not true ; but if his right hon. Friend had changed his opinion, no one could have blamed him—he was but acting the part of a wise statesman. He had seen everything else fail. Was it not plain that something must be done to put the axe to the root of the injustice complained of ? His right hon. Friend did not see his way till now. [Ironical cheers.] But no one could read the speech he made in 1865 without seeing what his conviction was. There was not a sentence in it that did not breathe the sentiment expressed in these Resolutions ; and he ended by saying that the evil of the Irish Church was not the superfluity of its funds, but its false position. So strong was the speech in this direction that the then Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Whiteside) complained that his right hon. Friend had made a speech for the destruction of the Irish Church, while the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) said he read in the words of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that this great grievance was very near its end. That was in 1865, before they had Reform, while Lord Palmerston was in office, and before any change of Government was impending. He denied, therefore, that his right hon. Friend was liable to the charge that was made against him. As far back as the year 1835 the Liberal leaders declared their policy upon the subject, and Sir Robert Peel accepted the position, and said that the promoters of this movement lagged behind their opinions. It was perfectly true that between that period and this no proposition had been laid before Parliament on this subject. But why ? Because of the power of the Tories in obstruction. Hon. Gentlemen opposite cheered derisively when he said that the time had never come till now ; but they should recognize the change which the events of last year had made in the whole course of political warfare. They must learn that since the action taken at that time political questions would be brought to a much shorter and sharper decision. The old modes of political fighting—the long sieges, the marches and counter-marches, the winter and the summer campaigns—would be no longer resorted to. When hon. Gentlemen opposite left the entrenchments which they had so long and sturdily defended, to march in search of a more advanced position, they left them for good. For one reason, among others, he did not in the least regret this. This Irish Church, and other great political questions, would now be brought to the test of truth and reason and justice as rapidly as the Prussian war of last year was decided—a war which, under the old system, would have lasted for years, but which was terminated in six weeks. The changes of last Session have produced another result which hon. Gentlemen opposite must also recognize. When the present occupants of the Treasury Bench called upon their friends to support them, no one believed that they were really going to fight. When they said they were going to nail their colours to the mast to-day, every one believed that those colours would probably be hauled down to-morrow. The Prime Minister shouted his war-cry of “No surrender ;” and the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary, in this House, like echo, gave back “Surrender.” It was no wonder that the proposition made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire was never made before. The party opposite were wont to obstruct, and they would and could have obstructed that proposition if made previously. The difference now is that although they might have the wish, they had not the power, to obstruct now. It was suggested that the present Parliament was not competent to deal with the question. Apparently it was intended to be conveyed that, as the franchise was extended last year, the Members who had seats for English constituencies no longer represented those constituencies. In that case, what was to become of the Scotch and Irish Reform Bills? However, since the right hon. Gentleman opposite had told the House that it might deal with those measures as it pleased, perhaps there would be less difficulty in the matter. But was there any truth in the allegation of the incompetency of Parliament? The noble Lord the Chief Secretary for Ireland proposed to introduce a Bill on the much-vexed question of the relations of landlord and tenant in Ireland, with the view of having that subject dealt with by the present Parliament. He (Mr. Moncreiff), therefore, did not understand what the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary meant by denying the competency of the Parliament to deal with the subject now under consideration. The Parliament was competent to promote the pacification of Ireland by doing justice to that country, and he was greatly mistaken if that House would listen to the plea that it was not competent to deal with what was, in his mind, one of the most urgent and important questions of the day. The noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs found nothing better to say than that he did not see anything in the proposed Resolutions which might not be made consistent with endowment. The right hon. Member for South Lancashire, however, explained that what he intended was that endowment should be withdrawn, excepting so far as related to life interests. There was, in fact, no doubt in that House, or in the country, as to what the right hon. Gentleman meant. It was said that the cause of Protestantism would suffer by the disestablishment of the Irish Church; but he thought that any one looking to the condition of the Established Church in Ireland must admit that Protestantism would gain by it. How could the Established Church in Ireland have weight with the people, when they regarded it as a badge of their inferiority, and when from father to son it was pointed out as a record of the degradation and humiliation of Ireland? In England the Norman and Saxon had mingled together, and in Ireland, if there had not been kept up this landmark, this Church of the minority, giving to the minority in the most sacred relations a position above the majority, he did not doubt but that the state of things in Ireland would have been very different from what it now was. It was idle to say that the Roman Catholics did not look upon Protestant ascendancy in their country as a grievance. Although his hon. Friend the Member for Honiton (Mr. Baillie Cochrane) said that he did not feel himself humiliated because Episcopalians, who were a minority in Scotland, had to contribute to the support of the Scotch Church, there could be very little doubt that their forefathers in Scotland would have felt greatly humiliated if there had been any successful attempt to uphold the Episcopal minority as a State Church in Scotland. With respect to the principle of Church Establishments, he did not think that any such alarm needed to be felt as that expressed by the hon. Member for Honiton. No one imagined that the Resolutions struck at the Church of England, or the Church of Scotland; and whoever would suggest that the standing or the falling of the Church of England depended on the fate of the Irish Church, must either be a concealed enemy or a very injudicious friend of the English Church. Nothing could be more unwise than to persuade the people that the Irish Church was mixed up with the existence of the English Church. The Irish Church was doomed; but he would be very sorry to think that the Church of England was in the same position. On the contrary, whatever might be its internal dissensions, the English Church was a strong and vigorous institution. With regard to Church Establishments, the only ground on which they could be defended was, that it was within the province of a State to establish what it deemed to be the true religion, if it thought that thereby religion would be promoted; but it could not be contended that it was right to establish in the midst of a community an alien Church, or that it was possible thereby to promote the spread of religion. It was said that these Resolutions, if carried, would lead to further attacks. He entertained a different opinion. The Motion for the Resolutions would be carried by the feeling of the Protestant people of this country; and he trusted that it would be accepted in Ireland, as from England and Scotland, as an offering laid on the altar of justice, as some atonement for past oppression, and as a presage of harmony and prosperity for the future.

Mr. Moncreiff

Mr. Moncreiff

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE: Sir, the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition has made a Motion to-night which he has rested on great principles, and which has raised important issues. The representative of the Government, my noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, has made a speech in which he has limited the issue to petty differences and excuses for delay. It is very difficult to know which of the two guides we ought to follow in the conduct of the debate; but my feeling on the whole is, that as we may have future opportunities of dealing with the Motion and sentiments of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, (Mr. Gladstone) we ought rather to confine ourselves to the issue which the Minister of the Crown has authoritatively laid down for us, and I will, therefore, merely indicate my views on the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman spoke of a sentiment in favour of the Established Church with respect, although he avowed that he himself had escaped from its spell and felt bound to oppose it now. I most frankly avow, that I am not of his opinion, and that that sentiment still exercises a hold over me that I regard as sacred. It appears to me that there is no problem in the development of modern society more important and more difficult, and yet which touches more deeply the sacred springs of human feeling and the most important interests of human society than the connection that exists between Church and State. Under these circumstances, I cannot look upon the sentiment in favour of the Established Church as a thing to be praised, but to be disregarded. This sentiment appears to me to be bound up with our national life—to enter deeply into our Constitution, and, even if no higher motives restrained us, we could not, in my opinion, abandon it without imperiling all the greatness and all the material advantages of which we are so proud. And, therefore, although the principle involved in that sentiment be applied to a part of the United Kingdom where it is severely tested, and where we have to rely more upon abstract principle and less upon expediency than I could have wished, still my feeling is that, even as applied to the case of Ireland, it is a principle which I will not desert—it is a principle which has done so much good in past times—it is a principle from which we may hope so much hereafter—it is a principle which I have always supported, that even if I were inclined to doubt of its soundness it would not be in this moment of its trial and adversity that I would shrink from upholding it. I do not wish to go to a lower motive; I should rather choose to rely upon the importance of maintaining the connection between Church and State, and of having some organization by public authority and of higher principle than the mere material interests which ordinarily guide politicians. I would rather look to something more noble than to the ordinary dictates of political economy or to the necessities of our political organization. But if I did seek for lower motives I think I could easily find them—I confess that I doubt whether the object for which this great change is to be effected would be attained, even were the sacrifice made. We seek for peace; peace above all things is what we desire in Ireland. And you are going to do what?—to secure peace? Why, you are going to draw down upon yourselves the certain and bitter enmity of one-third of the population—the most able, the most wealthy, and the most influential portion of the population of Ireland—without your having any security whatever that you will conciliate the remainder of that population. I have said that I should not argue the question upon this ground. I have merely made these few remarks in order that there may be no misunderstanding as to the position I hold upon this point. But now I must pass to the immediate issue before us—I mean to the Amendment of the noble Lord. I must frankly confess that, forgetting some of the dark passages of last year, I had indulged in a pleasing dream that when the question of the Irish Church was mooted there would be again a united party contending for a great principle—ready to fight for it—ready to sacrifice for it—ready to maintain its views without flinching, and if necessary, ready to carry the question before the great tribunal of the nation. In that anticipation I have been disappointed. We have had, instead, nothing more than the ambiguous utterances of a more than Delphic oracle. We have had this Amendment commented on in a speech from which I defy the most acute critic to extract any idea of the future policy of Her Majesty's Government. Now, what is this Amendment? I confess when I first heard it I listened to it with great suspicion, and that suspicion has not been at all lulled by the speech by which it was recommended to us. The Amendment commences thus—

“That this House, while admitting that considerable modifications in the temporalities of the United Church in Ireland may, after the pending inquiry, appear to be expedient.”

Now, what are "modifications in temporalities?" The English of this Resolution has been commented upon before; but I confess that I am utterly unable to understand this particular phrase. There is only one thing it can mean. I put it to any landed proprietor in this House what he would think if any person came to him and proposed to introduce modifications into his landed estate? Or what would a gentleman think who, upon the high road, was requested by a man on the other side of the hedge to permit him to make modifications in the ownership of his purse. For my own part I can only describe it by using the words of which it is composed. It means the "modification in the temporalities." The phrase may cover anything or nothing. It may mean giving to Belfast what is taken from the South; or it may mean modifying the temporalities out of existence altogether. There is absolutely nothing in the phrase to tell us what it means. Still this Amendment is a concession. The House is said to be perfectly incompetent to pronounce upon any great question; yet it is held by Her Majesty's Government to be perfectly competent to pronounce an opinion that modifications are to take place in the temporalities of the Irish Church. But, going a little further, we are told—

"That any proposition tending to the disestablishment or disendowment of that Church ought to be reserved for the decision of a new Parliament."

Is any hon. Member able to tell me that disestablishment or disendowment is excluded by that proposition? Some years ago a very eminent Gentleman (Mr. Miall) made a proposition in this House that all the temporalities of the Irish Church should be applied to lunatic asylums, roads, and canals; and I should like to know whether there is anything in this Amendment which should exclude the proposition from the répertoire of Her Majesty's Government? The noble Lord raised some objections to the Resolutions of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, because they only contained the word disestablishment and not disendowment; but I confess I should have wished the noble Lord had confined himself to the use of the latter word, and had left the former alone. We could not gather much from the speech of the noble Lord, in reference to the future policy of Her Majesty's Government, but he certainly said one thing that filled me with astonishment. He discussed the various alterations and treatment that might be applied to the Irish Church, and, in doing so, he talked of the solution of the connection between Church and State, of the exclusion of the Bishops of the Irish Church from the House of Lords as the loss of a mere empty title. That is the way in which the Minister of a Conservative Government is prepared to discuss the disestablishment of the Irish Church. I am bound, however, to say that I have something to re-assure me on this subject. We have had a letter of the Prime Minister to the Earl of Dartmouth. I hope I have it in my pocket, because I look upon it as the charter of the Irish Church. Oh, here it is, and now what does the right hon. Gentleman say in it—

"We have heard something lately of the crisis in Ireland. In my opinion the crisis of England is rather at hand; for the purpose is now avowed, and that by a powerful party, of destroying that sacred union between Church and State which has hitherto been the chief means of our civilization, and is the only security for our religious liberty."

And that in the opinion of the Foreign Secretary is little more than a mere empty title. How am I to reconcile these conflicting authorities—what hope am I to draw from these differences for the security of the Irish Church? I dare say I shall be told that the Home Secretary and the Irish Secretary have uttered very earnest and able encomiums upon the Irish Church. That I am ready to admit, but I hope those right hon. Gentlemen will acquit me of any intentional disrespect towards them when I say that their utterances do not yield to my mind any consolation with regard to the security of the Irish Church. I cannot forget last year. I cannot forget that last year Secretary of State after Secretary of State pledged himself to a restricted franchise in boroughs; that one affirmed that he could not consent to household suffrage? and that another declared upon his honour that nothing could induce him to assent to the policy of the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright), and yet, in two short months, all these pledges were mere waste paper, and were absolutely repudiated by the action of the very men who had given them. Therefore, while giving the right hon. Gentlemen credit for sincerity, in the views they have expressed, I am utterly sceptical of their power to restrain their erratic Leader. And I am bound to say that the right hon. Gentleman will have language of his own which he can quote in support of whatever policy he may feel disposed to adopt ; for it is part of the political skill of the right hon. Gentleman to be able to refer to phrases of his own in favour of any course he may deem it advisable to take. For instance, if it should suit him to take the Protestant line, here is the Dartmouth letter ; should it suit him to take an opposite course, he can always refer to his speech of 1844, the spirit of which, as I heard him declare the other evening, is still right. Now, when we consider this Resolution, what inference are we to draw from precedents. We have for some years been voting against a £10 county franchise, and when in 1858 a Conservative Government came into office the proposal for a £10 county franchise was, to my great surprise, met, for the first time for many years, not by a direct negative, but by the Previous Question. I looked upon it, however, as one of the ordinary incidents of politics, and thought nothing of it. But, Sir, the next year the £10 county franchise was accepted by a Conservative Government. Well, in 1866 we had a Reform Bill, introduced by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, and the Resolution on the second reading of that Bill was seconded by the noble Lord who has moved this Resolution to-night. ["Question!"] I am very sorry to trespass so far on the patience of hon. Gentlemen at that end of the House (behind the Ministerial Benches) ; but when a Minister of the Crown will not tell you what he means to do, I maintain that it is within the Question to show from his past conduct what is likely to happen in the future. The Resolution on that occasion was pitched in the same key as the Resolution of to-night. There was the same balance of sentences—

Viscount Cranborne

"That this House, while admitting that considerable modifications in the temporalities of the United Church in Ireland may, after the pending inquiry, appear to be expedient, is of opinion that any proposition tending to the disestablishment or disendowment of that Church ought to be reserved for the decision of a new Parliament."

That is the Resolution to-night. Well, the Resolution on that occasion, if I recollect rightly, was—

"That this House, while recognizing the necessity of a just and moderate measure of Reform, is further of opinion, &c., and that the Reform Bill ought to be deferred till the next year."

That was the Resolution which was seconded by the noble Lord. On that occasion all who were opposed to the reduction of the franchise supported the noble Lord in a body, thinking very little of the admission that was made and the postponement that was suggested ; but what was the result ? In the next Session, with the assistance of the same noble Lord, household suffrage was adopted. Here, again, we have the same phenomenon—an opinion steadily maintained by the Conservative party when out of office is changed when in office for the same plea for delay and the same admission that considerable modification is required. What will be the result ? If we are to judge by what has happened before, the result will be that those Gentlemen from the North of Ireland who are especially anxious for the maintenance of the Established Church in Ireland exactly as it is, will find themselves much as we who were in favour of restricted borough suffrage were last year—they will probably find themselves voting very humbly next year in the wake of the right hon. Gentleman for the total disestablishment and disendowment of the Irish Church. I have seen the process once, and I do not want to see it again. It is quite clear that this ambiguous Resolution would not have been put forward by any Ministry, unless they either had no policy to bring forward, or had only a policy which they dared not avow. If it were otherwise, it would be easy enough for them to state on what principle they intended their policy to rest ; it ought to have nothing to do with any inquiry, for the questions to be decided are not dependent upon inquiries. The general facts are already perfectly well known ; and if the Government refuses now to tell us what they intend to do, you may depend upon it that there is something behind which they do not wish us to know anything about. I cannot help feeling that this is one of the Motions which, to use the expressive words of the hon. Member for Nottingham (Mr. Osborne) are constructed on the principle of "cross-fishing"—that the Motion is one which is intended to fish on both sides of the House. It whispers to the Gentlemen from the North of Ireland, "Vote for me ; I am the champion of the Protestant Church. I am seeking for delay in order to secure your interests." It whispers to other hon. Gentlemen, "Vote for me ; I am educating my party, and the moment that the process is complete, all your wishes shall be fulfilled." And I have no doubt if I could unveil the secrets of the Lobby, we should find Gentlemen professing to speak in the name of the Government, whispering suggestions of this kind in accordance with the respective views of those whom my address. Now, I hope I may not be mistaken. I do not pretend to predict the probable course of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government. I should as soon undertake to tell you which way the weather-cock would point to-morrow. It may be that the Gentlemen who are taken by this device will find that the pea is not always under the same umbrella, and that the hopes that they have been led to entertain will be frustrated. It may be that hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House, if they vote for this Motion and carry it, may next year find themselves in the condition in which we found ourselves last year—that by their party alliance they have contributed to the very result they desired to avoid, and to the destruction of those principles to which the whole of their political life has been devoted. I cannot help feeling that such proceedings, such a system of management is unworthy of the House of Commons. It is to the Executive Government that we have to look for guidance. The speech of the noble Lord to-night seemed to me more like the speech of a Member in opposition than that of a Member of the Government, as much as it assumed and even exaggerated all the privileges of a Member in opposition. It was almost entirely confined to criticizing the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, but it studiously and ostentatiously abstained from laying down any principles of its own. He told us in the first place, that the question of the Irish Church must be the first, or one of the first subjects that must occupy the attention of the new Parliament, but then he declined to make any statement that would fetter the Government when dealing with the question. Is that an attitude which the Executive Government ought to assume towards the House of Commons? Hitherto it has been held that the Executive Government guides the deliberations of the House of Commons. It lays down principles clearly, and argues them, supporting them with all the weight of its authority and asking the House of Commons to express its opinion on them. Until the last two years we have not seen the spectacle of an Executive Government sitting upon the opinion of the House of Commons, refusing to lay down any opinion of its own, and almost openly avowing that it merely looks to see which way public opinion will point, admitting, that it will act as an instrument of that public opinion, and that it has no opinions of its own to express. It seems to me that such an attitude is destructive of the position of the Executive in this House. I will go even further, and say that it is a fatal blow to the efficiency of Parliamentary Government. The House of Commons cannot initiate the policy; the House of Commons cannot undertake the functions of the Executive Government and point out the path which it is to take. It is the duty of the House of Commons to select those Ministers in whom it places trust, and as long as it places confidence in those Ministers to support the policy which they may announce. I know that with a certain number of Gentlemen on this side of the House this Amendment is popular. I have heard it spoken of as being very clever. It is clever, Sir; it is too clever by half. If the Government intend to conduct the Irish Church to a painless death, this is, probably, the best way to secure that result; but if they propose to defend and adhere to the principles contained in the letter to which I have alluded, it is the very worst way to attain the object they have in view and to revive the enthusiasm of the people. If you wish to support the Church, you must come forward and fight in the light, and not shelter yourselves behind ambiguous phrases and dilatory pleas. I admit that the right hon. Gentleman opposite has spoken to-night with perfect candour and openness in expressing his opinions, and I would reciprocate that candour by telling him that I shall meet his Motion with a straightforward and direct negative. But I cannot support an Amendment of which the object, as it appears to me, is merely to gain time—merely to retain the cards in the hands of the Executive that they may shuffle them as they like—merely to enable them to repeat on the Irish Church the process which they last year applied to Reform—merely to enable them to utilize great questions of public policy and matters which excite the feeling of the people out-of-doors to the utmost for the purposes of party and the maintenance of a Government in place. I think that such tactics are not honourable to the House of Commons, nor honourable to the Government which resorts to them; and, while earnestly resisting any attack upon the principle of the Established Church, I say that, in the interests of that principle, in the interests of the Irish Church, in the interests of all those convictions which the Conservative party has ever entertained, it does not seem to me wise, it is not fair, it is not creditable, to lay on the table of the House, and to take issue upon, an Amendment such as this.

Mr. LAING said, he thought that, as he had given notice of an Amendment to be moved when the House went into Committee, it might be convenient that he should now briefly state the object he had in view, so that they might know the position in which they would find themselves on going into Committee. He confessed that, if that or any other Motion on the present question had been brought forward merely for a party purpose, he for one would be found among those on that (the Opposition) side, whom the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie) called "followers who did not follow." He was of opinion that Her Majesty's Government having, in the last Session, carried a Reform Bill which, on the whole, was accepted as satisfactory to the country, might, under ordinary circumstances, have been left to appeal to the new constituencies which they had created. He would also add that, with respect to several branches of administration, and more especially with respect to foreign policy, he, for one, preferred the course pursued by the present Government to that adopted by their predecessors. For those reasons he would not have been disposed to join in any mere party vote in order to drive the Government prematurely from office. But while he would not have been prepared to sacrifice the Ministry to party he was equally not prepared to sacrifice Ireland to the Ministry. The Motion now before them raised an issue of first-rate and Imperial importance. For the raising of that issue at the present time the speeches made from the Treasury Bench on a recent occasion were in a great measure responsible. If the question had rested simply on the able speech delivered that evening by the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, there might have been a fair case for asking for delay. If the Government had merely come forward and said, "This being the last Session of an expiring Parliament, and this being a question of first-rate importance, which cannot be practically settled till another Parliament has been elected by the newly-created constituency, we regard this as an open question, and we ask for time to make up our minds upon it." That might have been a fair position for them to take. But after what had fallen from the Government on the subject of the Irish Church in a former debate, and also after the letter of the Prime Minister, it was impossible for anyone calling himself a Liberal to shrink from the issue which had been raised, or any longer to avoid coming to a vote upon it. That issue distinctly involved this among other points. Could they maintain the existing Protestant Establishment and the present system of religious inequality in Ireland? On that point it was enough to say that when a prominent Cabinet Minister like the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs told them that not one educated man in a hundred in this country would advocate the maintenance of that system, it was surely impossible that things could permanently remain as they now were in Ireland. While no impartial person would affirm that the Irish Church was a practical injury to Ireland, on the other hand no impartial person could deny that it was a practical insult to the great majority of the Irish nation. If such an institution were sought to be forced upon the people of Scotland, they would not, as history showed, stand it; neither would the people of England for a moment stand any such treatment of themselves. No people with any sense of national honour and self-respect could submit to the Church of one-sixth or one-seventh of the country remaining for all time to come the Established Church of their nation. That was a grievance which time would not remove, but, on the contrary, one which, as Ireland grew more educated, more prosperous, and more imbued with a feeling of self-respect, would become magnified, and would rankle more and more in the minds of her population. Then, he asked, was it consistent with the safety of the Empire to allow that state of things to continue in Ireland? He did not exaggerate the importance of Fenianism; but if we were unhappily to be involved in war with America or some other great Power, would any responsible Minister like England to enter the conflict with one arm tied behind her, as would practically be her position if Ireland were disaffected? What would have been the condition of Prussia, if in her late struggle with Austria, the whole of her Roman Catholic population had been in a state of discontent? Then, with regard to the suggestion of the Chief Secretary for Ireland, that they should "level upwards," or, in other words, equally endow the Roman Catholic and the Presbyterian Churches with the Episcopalian Establishment in Ireland, whatever might have done in Mr. Pitt's time or fifty years

o, that was now simply impracticable. What possible alternative, then, except establishment remained? It had been urged, as an objection to the Resolutions, that they had not yet decided what to do with the endowments of the Established Church. But he replied that before they could do anything else, they must decide at the disendowment should take place, and if they affirmed that principle they could accomplish two objects—first, they could hold out to the Irish people a pledge that England was now going to do them justice; and in the next place, they would bring that long-contested question to a practical issue, because at the next Election the question would be, “Would they or would they not ratify what had already been done by the last Parliament?” When it was said that a religious people must necessarily have a State religion, he would remind them that in the United States of America there was no such thing as a State religion, and yet no one could say that the Americans were not a religious people. There was no State religion in our colonies. On the other hand, let them look to France before the Revolution, and to the present state of Spain and Portugal. There they had a State religion existing, while the great mass of the people were profoundly religious. It was a question of political expediency whether the State should take charge of the religious organization of the people as of the telegraph or post office. They could understand the State maintaining an Established Church when the great majority of the people belonged to that Church; but the advantages might be overborne by the objections when the Church was that of a minority of the people. The worst enemies of both Church and State were those who, like Archbishop Laud, announced the highflying principle of a sacred union between the two. Laud had said that to touch Church property would be to render insecure all private property. He denied that. While the right of the incumbent to a life interest in the living was like that of any man to his private property, the right of the Church in its property was like that of a person enjoying a grant of an estate for a public purpose, but who would no longer enjoy that grant when the object that justified it ceased to exist. For these reasons he had resolved to give a vote at all hazards in favour of the propositions of the right hon. Member for South Lancashire; but, at the same time, he felt the question could not be solved by the present Parliament, which could only pave the way for a great national decision; and, therefore, although under ordinary circumstances such a Motion, carried by the Leader of the Opposition, would, in accordance with a most important constitutional principle, require either a resignation of the Ministry or a dissolution of Parliament, the circumstances of this case impelled a different decision. Considering that an appeal to the new constituencies must take place in the ensuing year, a dissolution now would be a perfect absurdity; and he did not think that because it would be absurd to appeal to the present constituencies it, therefore, followed that the Government should be driven to resignation. He accordingly intended, if the House should go into Committee, to declare that which the common sense of a great number of Members felt to be the only practical course—namely, that the carrying out of the Resolutions of the right hon. Member for South Lancashire must be deferred until after the new constituencies had elected a Parliament. If this proposal were adopted the Government would understand that its duty was to further the course of business, and that these Resolutions were not come to as a party vote for the purpose of turning them out of office, but as the assertion of a great principle on which the country should be asked to pronounce as early as possible.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, the decision which was asked for might be regarded in two lights: either as the decision of the House, or as the decision of the two great parties of which it was composed. It might well be that the House should decide that it would not now express an opinion on the policy suggested, while at the same time the two parties should clearly disclose each its separate view. If the right hon. Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone) intended only to force each side of the House to express itself clearly upon the great question of the day, and so prepare the way for a fair trial at the next Election, he would not object; but he suggested the right hon. Gentleman was not justified in asking for a decision of the House as such. He personally would not shrink from expressing a very strong opinion on the policy indicated; but he would first endeavour to show that the House ought not to give a decision at present, but should rather support the proposition of the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn (Lord Stanley). That Amendment only amounted to this, that the House should not come to a decision, but it did not at all say that the Government on one side or the Liberal Members on the other should not declare themselves. The plan of procedure sketched by the right hon. Member for South Lancashire clearly showed that he was of opinion that the House was not competent to determine the question, because otherwise the second and third Resolutions he had placed on the Paper would not have been needed, inasmuch as they merely provided for an interregnum between the present Parliament's expression of an opinion and the final decision of the Parliament to come. If the right hon. Gentleman had rested only on the Resolutions, as he at first seemed to intend, he (the Solicitor General) would have had no hesitation in declaring the second illegal and the third unconstitutional. He suspected that when the Resolutions were first announced it was intended to rest content with them, but that the discovery of a defect had led to the conditional promise of Bills. It was now stated that the Resolutions would be incorporated in an Act of Parliament, though when the Act of Parliament would pass might be matter of considerable doubt. As to the second Resolution, he remarked that by the Irish Church Temporalities Act of 1833, 3 & 4 Will. IV., c. 37, Ecclesiastical Commissioners were appointed with arduous duties to perform, and those duties were imposed not for the destruction but for the regulation of the Church: he therefore maintained that if the Commissioners should fail at any time to perform those duties they could not answer a mandamus by pointing to the Resolutions of the House. Now, however, the House was promised a statute—a temporary Act, he presumed, until the new Parliament could pass another. It became necessary then to observe what were the terms of this second Resolution, the basis of the future Act? "That, subject to the foregoing considerations"—namely, those contained in the first Resolution. "it is expedient to prevent the creation of new personal interests by the exercise of any public patronage." How was that to be defined in an Act of Parliament? Should Bishops not be allowed to present? Should chapters and incumbents who had the right to present not be allowed to exercise it? The Resolution proceeded:—"And to confine the operations of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners of Ireland to objects of immediate necessity." What two people were likely to agree as to the meaning of the words "objects of immediate necessity?" And the Resolution concluded as follows:—"Pending the final decision of Parliament." When would that occur? It might be next year, or the year after; it was certainly an indefinite time. Did the right hon. Gentleman mean that the next House of Commons was to be bound to decide finally or not? As to the third Resolution, the right hon. Gentleman had not stated that he intended to propose an Act giving effect to it; and, under these circumstances, that Resolution would be entirely unconstitutional. Had or had not the Sovereign duties to perform, or could the Sovereign act or refrain from acting by mere caprice? If not, then there must be a duty. And what imposed that duty? Clearly the Coronation Oath, the wording of which not only defined the duty of the Sovereign, but established at the same time a compact with the people—

Mr. Laing

"Will you to the utmost of your power," the Sovereign was asked, "maintain the laws of God, the true profession of the Gospel, and the Protestant reformed religion established by the law?" "And will you preserve unto the bishops and clergy of this realm and to the Churches"—

Obviously pointing to more than one Church—

"committed to their charge all such rights and privileges as by law do or shall appertain unto them or any of them?"

The answers given to these questions constituted the duty of the Sovereign, and, therefore, he apprehended, the Queen was bound to appoint the Bishops, and to maintain in every way the rights and privileges of the Church. If there was a duty it was obvious that the Sovereign could not constitutionally refrain from performing the duty imposed by that Oath in consequence merely of an Address of the House of Commons, and not an Address of both Houses. The only way, he ventured to say, in which the Queen could act upon such an Address was by giving her consent to an Act of Parliament. What was it that the Queen was asked to do? To take a particular course, "with a view to the purposes aforesaid"—that is, to carry out the first proposition, "that the Established Church of Ireland should cease to exist as an Establishment." That was clearly asking the Queen to break the terms of her Coronation Oath. He knew that by a convenient doctrine it had of late years been held that if Parliament were willing to absolve the Sovereign, the Soereign was not bound to observe the Oath. And speaking as a lawyer he did not pretend that the Queen might not agree to a disestablishing Bill; but he did most distinctly aver that the Queen ought not to be asked to do aught in derogation of the contract with Parliament and Her People contained in that Oath on a mere Address of the House. The only way that She should be required, if at all, to act should be by asking Her Majesty's consent to a Bill. When this Resolution was also open to the objection of unpardonable vagueness. What was meant by "placing the temporalities at the disposal of Parliament?" Did the right hon. Gentleman mean that before the final decision mentioned in the second Resolution—that is, before a final decision that the Church should be disestablished—Parliament might dispose of the temporalities of the Establishment? The words were open to that construction. And what was meant by Parliament? Did the right hon. Gentleman mean the House of Commons, or both Houses, or that the temporalities were only to be disposed of by Act of Parliament? And what was meant by saying that the Queen was to give up her interest in the custody of vacant benefices? Who was to have the custody of them? Was it the House of Commons, or were Commissioners to be appointed? And if the final decision were delayed, what in the meantime was to become of the Protestant inhabitants of vacant and populous benefices? The right hon. Gentleman, with a fallacy that was very transparent, had spoken of cases, which might or might not have been accurately stated, where there were only four Protestants, or "Anglicans," as he called them. But his Resolutions would apply to the largest parishes in Ireland, and to those which were fullest of Protestants, as well as to the smallest parishes. In the case of one of those parishes becoming vacant the right hon. Gentleman insisted that there should be no appointment. How, then, were the inhabitants to be dealt with? Were they to be left for an indefinite time without the offices of the Church? Were there to be no marriages, baptisms, burials, sacraments? The fact was those Resolutions amounted to an excommunication of Irish Protestants from all religious rites. He could not think that the House would agree to pass the second and third Resolutions; and, if not, of what utility would it be to pass the first as a bare Resolution which could not bind the next Parliament?

The Solicitor General

Even if the present Government were to resign, and the right hon. Gentleman were to form a Ministry, he could not attempt to carry out these Resolutions in the present Parliament; he could not pass any Act on the subject, during the present Session. As to the first Resolution it must be considered both with regard to the present action of the House and as an intimation of a future policy; and the first thing that struck one's mind was the immense importance of the question opened. What was the full meaning of that Resolution? First, it in terms applies to disestablishment only. But did the meaning end there? Remarks had been made upon the framing of the Amendment, which was said to have been put forward for the purpose of conciliating persons holding different views. But if it were the intention of the right hon. Gentleman, as he had declared it to be, to disendow as well as to disestablish the Irish Church, why was not that policy distinctly expressed in the first Resolution? Why was the Resolution couched so as to conceal the design of disendowment, unless it were thought that some persons might be frightened by such an avowal? Assuming, then, that it was the intention of the right hon. Gentleman to disendow as well as to disestablish the Irish Church, why was it stated to be necessary to do these things now? "Because" it was said, "the Church in Ireland is a minority Church, and there is a crisis." But it had always been from the beginning, from the time of its first establishment, a minority Church, and the crisis of Fenianism spoken of had already ceased to exist. Was it necessary, in order to heal the sentimental grievance of the Irish Roman Catholics, to outrage every sentiment of the Irish Protestants? If the Irish Church were disestablished, it could only be by repealing, in great part, the Act of Union. The 5th Article had been already read at the table, but its terms could not be too strongly insisted upon. These were—

"That it be the 5th Article of Union that the Churches of England and Ireland, as now by law established, be united into 'one Protestant Episcopal Church,' to be called 'the United Church of England and Ireland,' and that the doctrine, worship, discipline, and Government of the said United Church shall be and shall remain in full force for ever, as the same are now by law established for the Church of England; and that the continuance and preservation of the said 'United Church' as 'the Established Church of England and Ireland' shall be deemed and taken to be an essential and fundamental part of the Union; and that, in like manner, the doctrine, worship, discipline, and government of the Church of Scotland shall remain and be preserved as the same are now established by law, and by the Acts for the Union of the two kingdoms of England and Scotland."

These last expressions well deserved the attention of Scotch Members, for the guarantee in the case of the Scotch Church was in language identical with that of the Irish. The solemn terms employed in the Irish Act of Union were, in fact, but a reproduction of those used on the occasion of the Union with Scotland, which ran as follows :—

"That the said Acts, with the Establishment in the said Acts contained, be and shall for ever be held and adjudged to be and observed as fundamental and essential conditions of the said Union, and shall in all times coming be taken to be, and are hereby declared to be, essential and fundamental parts of the said Articles and Union."

The words employed being the same, it would therefore be for the Scotch Members to consider what would be the natural result of the step they were now invited to take as affecting the Church of Ireland. These solemn words in the Acts of Union respectively were borrowed from that still older national compact, the first Article of Magna Charter, by which it was declared—

"We have granted to God, and by this our present charter have confirmed, for us and our heirs for ever, that the Church of England shall be free, and shall have all her whole rights and liberties inviolable."

And when they came to the Emancipation Act, they found in the 107th section the same words used—

"And whereas the Protestant Episcopal Church of England and Ireland, and the doctrine, discipline, and government thereof, and likewise the Protestant Presbyterian Church of Scotland, and the doctrine, discipline, and government thereof, are by the respective Acts of Union of England and Scotland, and of Great Britain and Ireland, established permanently and inviolably, &c."

He would not now discuss whether it was necessary to repeal all these solemn Acts, but it was of great importance that the House should carefully weigh what they were about to do, and that between then and next Friday night they should weigh this much more carefully than there had been time to do since the right hon. Gentleman made to the House the startling disclosure of his conversion upon this question. The House and the country had a right to more time. It would be necessary to pass another Act of Parliament (if they disendowed) to repeal the principal section of the Act of Settlement of Ireland. It was, however, right to consider the effect of disestablishing and disendowing the Irish Church. In what condition, if they did so, would they leave the Government of Ireland and the Protestants of Ireland? In order to support the right hon. Gentleman's assertion that Parliament ought immediately to disestablish the Irish Church, because it was a minority Church, they must treat Ireland as a distinct country and leave her without any Established Church at all. That might or might not be right, but, at all events, it was quite new. It was the first time such a principle had been established in these kingdoms. It had been heretofore one of the most fundamental propositions in this country that they could not have a Government that did not join a Church to it; that they could not have a Government that was not founded upon religion, and the main object of which was not to support religion. But if Parliament thus destroyed the United Church, and reduced Ireland to the position of a kingdom without an Established Church, of what Church would the Irish Protestants be members? Parliament, so far as it could, would leave them of no Church at all. They must form a new Church, neither established nor endowed but a free and voluntary Church. And if they did thus form a new and free and voluntary Church, in what relation was it to stand to the Church of England, which also must be newly formed? How were the clergy of the new Irish Church to be ordained? How was discipline to be enforced? How many Acts of Parliament with regard to discipline did the right hon. Gentleman ask the House to repeal or alter? And, considering the question not merely as religionists, but as statesmen, what social advantages did they propose by taking from Ireland so many of the resident gentry? To whom did they propose to give the property? And what would be the natural result of disestablishing the Irish Church? Was there not great danger that Parliament would next be pressed to disendow the Church of Scotland, and afterwards to disendow the Church of England? The Church of Scotland stood as he had shown in terms on the same guarantees as the Church of Ireland, and the House would surely wish to know, whether those who drew up these Resolutions in Carlton Terrace, in the absence of their own party, confined their views to Ireland? They knew what was the opinion of many of their supporters, and the House would not fail to observe how guardedly the right hon. Gentleman abstained from saying one word in favour of the Established Church of England. After the speech of that night it would be open to the right hon. Gentleman to come down, as he did the other night, and say that he had not expressed in 1868 any opinions inconsistent with the disestablishment of the Church of England, and that at that time he thought it ought to be disestablished. Taking, then, into consideration all these momentous results, was it right that the House should now decide them? He submitted that it was not. So much for the argument he had undertaken to maintain, but he must moreover take leave to say that he never would be party to a policy, the first step of which must be to leave in Ireland a Government not joined with any religion at all, and the inevitable consequences of which must be a similar Government in England. He would never consent to leave the Protestants of Ireland without an established and an endowed Church—nay, without any Church at all. He could see no excuse, much less any necessity, for such wholesale and dangerous confiscation. He did not deny that the condition of the Irish Church required great modification; but he did most heartily deny that any such portion of the united Church of England and Ireland as that which consisted of 1,000,000 of Protestants in Ireland should cease to exist. He declared that he would be no consenting party to a policy which, carried to the extent to which the right hon. Gentleman carried it, must result in a religion betrayed and a country ruined.

MR. LAWSON said, he wished to say a few words on the legal argument they had just heard. The hon. and learned Gentleman (the Solicitor General) had told the House that the Resolutions were illegal and unconstitutional, and so they would be if they were not followed up by legislation. It was, however, the intention of his right hon. Friend (Mr. Gladstone) to carry them out in the only legal mode—namely, by a Bill, and if the House should adopt the Resolutions of his right hon. Friend it would be the duty of the Government to carry out the wishes of the House. The hon. and learned Gentleman said that one of the Resolutions was illegal. But the words of the third Resolution were in fact the very words used in the Church Temporalities Act. That Act proposed to abolish certain Archbishoprics and Bishoprics. One was then vacant, and the others were not to be filled, and the Bill set forth that Her Majesty had been pleased to place at the disposal of Parliament her interest in these sees. An objection was taken by those who were then in Opposition, because Her Majesty had not at that time sent any such Message. The question was decided by the Speaker, who said that such a Message was necessary; but that it might be made to the House at any time before the Bill became law. The course taken by his right hon. Friend (Mr. Gladstone) was thus the very course which was deliberately pursued in 1833 upon the Church Temporalities Act. The hon. and learned Gentleman next said that the Bishops and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners would be restrained from acting upon the Resolutions of the House. It was certain that the Bishops and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners would not pay the same regard to a mere Resolution of the House of Commons as to an Act of Parliament, but the object of the Resolution was that a Bill might be founded upon it to prevent the filling up of the benefices. The hon. and learned Gentleman was quite mistaken in supposing that, if these Resolutions were passed, the Protestant Churchmen of Ireland would be in a state of excommunication, that there would be no one to baptize or to bury them. The Solicitor General when he said this could not have looked into the Ecclesiastical Law, or he would have found that the most careful provision was made in this respect. If a Bishopric were not filled up, the Archbishop of the province might be called upon to make due provision for the performance of the episcopal functions; if a patron did not fill up a benefice, the Bishop made the necessary provision for the discharge of the duties. Therefore, even without an Act of Parliament, the tremendous consequences predicted by the hon. and learned Gentleman would not occur. He now proposed to say something on the general question, and the only difficulty was that there were no arguments to grapple with. No one had defended the Irish Church on its merits, and therefore it was not unreasonable to suppose that it had no merits upon which it could be defended. It was said that it was not within the moral competence of the present House of Commons to legislate on this subject. The noble Lord had therefore raised a dilatory plea, and had brought forward an Amendment, not in defence of the Irish Church, but to postpone its condemnation for another year. The noble Lord had said in effect—

The Solicitor General

“To-morrow? oh! that’s sudden:
Spare him, spare him!”

He did not know on what this doctrine rested—that the present House of Commons was not competent to pronounce an opinion as to whether the Irish Church was to cease to exist as an Established Church. It was a convenient doctrine for the Ministry, but was it a constitutional one? The present House of Commons was as competent as any House of Commons could be to decide the question. The House had agreed to abolish flogging in the army, despite the opposition of the Government. They hoped before long to deal with the Irish and Scotch Reform Bills in such a manner that their authors would scarcely know them, as they had done with respect to the English Bill. He wanted to know why the question of the Irish Church was to be isolated from all other questions? If the Government had hitherto avoided a condemnation of their policy it was because they had no policy to be condemned. Upon this question the Ministry seemed to have no policy but that of delay. They appeared not to have made up their own minds so far as to tell the House what they themselves intended to do. Was the policy of ascendancy to be upheld by the Government or were they prepared to act on the policy which had been inaugurated in 1829? That was a question which the House of Commons were entitled to have answered. The Executive seemed very anxious to avoid responsibility in this and other matters. They had delegated the greater part of their own responsibility to Royal Commissions, and the rest they placed at the disposal of this House. The noble Lord the Secretary for Ireland in the discussion on the Motion of the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Maguire) announced to the House that a part of the Ministerial responsibility was to grant a charter to the Catholic University. [The Earl of Mayo: To a Catholic University.] If the noble Lord wished him to substitute one article for another he would readily acquiesce, and give the Government any benefit they might derive from the change. Well, a charter to a Catholic University having been announced as a part of the Ministerial policy, in a few nights afterwards the noble Lord, replying to a question from an hon. Member, said the Government was quite in the hands of the House as regarded the Catholic University. That was the character of the policy of the Government. It was very difficult to discover what were the arguments in support of the Irish Church Establishment. Protestant gentlemen of high rank and station had held meetings in Ireland in its favour. What did they demonstrate? That the Protestant population of Ireland possessed a sufficient amount of wealth to be able to maintain their own Church if deprived of the advantage—if an advantage it were—of State support. But the only argument adduced by these gentlemen was that of “No surrender,” which was now abandoned by the noble Lord the Member for King’s Lynn the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. It was said that his right hon. Friend the Member for South Lancashire was not in a position to bring this question forward because he had not dealt with it while he was in office; but the propriety of dealing with questions of this kind depended very much on the state of public opinion, and in respect of the Irish Church public opinion had ripened with extraordinary rapidity. Whom might they thank for that rapid ripening of public opinion? The right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government. That right hon. Gentleman had given the House during last Session a very remarkable illustration of how rapidly, under the process of education, an opinion of one character may change and become an opinion of quite a different character. Public opinion demanded an immediate consideration of and decision upon this Irish Church question. It had been supposed that, owing to the famine and to emigration, the proportion between the numbers of the different creeds in Ireland had been greatly altered, and it was asserted that the Established Church had made a great number of converts. In 1860 when the Bill for the decennial Census was before the House, his right hon. Friend the Member for Oxford proposed that Returns of the number of members in each of the religious communions should be included in the Census of Ireland. That proposition was acceded to by the right hon. Gentleman who so ably represented the minority of Dublin, doubtless from an anxiety to arrive at the truth, and believing that the facts would turn out to be as he supposed. What was the result? By the Census Returns of 1861 it appeared that the whole of the members of the Established Church in Ireland numbered only 693,000 out of a population of 5,500,000. The House had heard a great deal of Protestant Ulster;

What did the same Census show? That, though the Protestants and the Roman Catholics were nearly equal in Ulster, the Roman Catholics were actually in a small majority. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General had asked, whether the disestablishment of the Irish Church would be a message of peace to Ulster? Did the hon. and learned Gentleman know that the members of the Established Church were only 20 per cent of the population of that province? In Leinster they were 10 per cent, in Munster 5 per cent, and in Connaught 4 per cent. Looking at this question either as one of justice or one of statesmanship, ought the Church Establishment to be maintained in any one of these four provinces—even in Ulster, where the members of the Established Church amounted to what was said to be the large proportion of 20 per cent? After the Census of 1861 was published public attention was turned to this question, and recently almost all the Roman Catholics of position in Ireland had signed a declaration denying that they were by any means indifferent to the relevance involved in the existence of the Established Church, and demanding religious equality. He regarded the question of the Establishment less as a question of money than in its bearing on the social and political relations of life in Ireland; and he maintained that those relations could not be placed on a sound basis so long as the principle of ascendancy was maintained, and exclusive privileges given to a small proportion of the population. It could not but be a grievance to Roman Catholics, in any parish where they were numbered by thousands, to see a Protestant clergyman installed as rector, and entitled to treat his priest as an intruder, although the Protestant congregation might be numbered only by tens or even less. The existence of the Establishment moreover introduced an element of rancour into almost every question that was discussed in Ireland. In case of the election of a surgeon to a dispensary or clerk to a union, the question always asked respecting a candidate was whether he were a Protestant or a Roman Catholic, his creed and not his fitness being regarded as the important point. The disestablishment of the Church would not only take away this taint, but would, he believed, be an incalculable advantage to the vitality of the Protestant religion. Indeed, he would not for a moment favour such a measure unless he not conscientiously believe that it would have that effect. Froude tells us, in the 10th volume of his History, of a shrewd Devonshire man, named Tremayne, who was sent over by Cecil, to report on the state of Ireland. His report in substance was, "Give the Irish good laws, do not meddle with their religion, and leave their lands to themselves, and they will be good subjects." Unhappily this advice was not followed. The Establishment was associated in the minds of the people with persecution, conquest, and confiscation, and nothing could be more calculated than such a feeling to impede the spread of Protestantism. The House had been warned to beware of alienating the affections of the Protestants of Ulster; but surely this consideration was not entitled to any weight unless it could be shown that the maintenance of the Establishment was consistent with justice and expediency. If he might venture to address his Protestant fellow-countrymen he would exhort them not to embark in a struggle which could have but one result. Let them not excite the anger and animosity of rival creeds, but let them have confidence in the religion of which they were adherents, and fling aside the artificial supports which, instead of sustaining their Church, had really hindered its healthy and vigorous action. Let them be satisfied with a fair field and no favour; and for his own part he felt convinced that, when these supports were withdrawn, the Church would be maintained without difficulty by its own members, and would be in a more efficient state than it was at present. The duty of Parliament was clear, and the maxim which it was bound to adopt with reference to all religious denominations in Ireland was—

"Tros Tyriusque mihi nullo discrimine agetur."

Until we acted on that principle we could never expect loyalty and contentment to prevail among the Irish people.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

Debate adjourned till To-morrow.

MUTINY BILL.—CONSIDERATION.

(Mr. Dodson, Sir John Pakington, The Judge Advocate General.)

Bill, as amended, considered.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON appealed to the noble Lord (Lord Otho Fitzgerald) not to insist on the Amendment which he had succeeded in carrying on Thursday night.

Mr. Lawson

LORD ELCHO said, he wished to call attention to an Amendment which had been made in Committee by striking out of the Preamble the words "and the preservation of the balance of power in Europe." That Amendment was suggested by the hon. Member for Chatham (Mr. Otway), who was carried away by his enthusiasm at carrying the abolition of corporal punishment, and it was agreed to without a division. There was, at the time, a large gathering on the Opposition Benches, but the right hon. Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone) was absent—busied, he presumed—in preparing the thunder for to-night's debate. Now, the words they struck out were of long standing. In the Preamble to the Act of 1689 the words were—

"Whereas it is judged necessary that during this time of danger several of the forces now on foot should be continued and others raised for the safety of the Kingdom, for the proper defence of the Protestant religion, and," he was sorry to add, "for the reducing of Ireland."

In 1690, the following words were added—"and for carrying on the war against France." In 1701, these words were introduced—

"For the safety of this Kingdom, for the common defence of the Protestant religion, and for the preservation of the liberties of Europe."

These words were repeated in the second year of the reign of Queen Ann; but in the Act of 1 Geo. I., (1714), the words used were—

"For the guard of His Majesty's Royal person, for the safety of this Kingdom, and the suppressing of the present rebellion."

The passage to which he now wished particularly to call attention first occurred in the Act of 1727, the Preamble to which declared—

"That this army is raised for the safety of this Kingdom, the defence of the possessions of the Crown of Great Britain, and the preservation of the balance of power in Europe."

These words, therefore, could claim a prescription from 1727 to the present year, and to a certain extent were illustrative of the history of the country. Under these circumstances there certainly ought to be good grounds adduced for striking them out. The only reason brought forward last year by the hon. Member for Chatham was, that the words were not true, and that the army was not maintained for the preservation of the balance of power in Europe. Now he held the contrary opinion. He gave no conventional interpretation to the phrase "balance of power," but supposed that it meant the question of European police and national defence. Why did our army go to the Crimea, if not to maintain the balance of power? More recently we were very nearly going to war in favour of Denmark, to preserve the balance of power. Questions might arise with regard to Egypt and Belgium, that might make it the duty and interest of this country to interfere. He did not believe that the day would come again when England would play so prominent a part as she had formerly done in foreign politics; but, at the same time, he was not prepared to admit that 30,000,000 of Englishmen were to have no voice in Europe, and that our armies were to have no influence whatever in the affairs of the Continent. This might be a mere matter of sentiment; but he felt certain that Lord Palmerston, had he been alive, would have resisted the Motion which was made on Friday night. As he felt strongly on this subject, and wished to give the House an opportunity of re-considering the determination they then came to, he begged to move the re-insertion in the Preamble of the words to which he had referred.

COLONEL NORTH seconded the Motion, remarking that the Opposition had the other night, in the absence of their Leader, run riot. It was with the greatest difficulty that the late Judge Advocate General had obtained a hearing; and as for the present one, he had no chance.

Amendment proposed, in the Preamble, in line 7, after the word "Crown," to insert the words "and the preservation of the balance of power in Europe."—(Lord Elcho.)

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON remarked that the words had been in the Mutiny Act for so long a time, and meant so very little, that he was surprised to find that the hon. Member for Chatham thought it worth his while to strike them out. At the same time, he was still more astonished that his noble Friend should think it worth his while to re-insert them.

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and negatived.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON moved the insertion of words empowering the military authorities in Ireland to billet soldiers in private houses.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON remarked, that, as the right hon. Gentleman

d, on a former occasion, admitted that the practice of billeting soldiers in private houses ought not to be resorted to, except in the most pressing emergency, he trusted the Motion would not be objected to, as it was impossible for the military authorities in Ireland on a very short notice to make the arrangements which would be necessary in the event of a change in the existing state of things.

LORD OTHO FITZGERALD said, after the remarks of his noble Friend, he would not press the matter to a division. But he hoped the right hon. Baronet would take the question into consideration, otherwise he would certainly move the Amendment next year.

Amendment agreed to.

Bill to be read the third time To-morrow.

MARINE MUTINY BILL.—COMMITTEE.

Mr. Dodson, Mr. Corry, Lord Henry Lennox.)

Order for Committee read.

In reply to Mr. AYRTON, LORD HENRY LENNOX said, he assented to the introduction of Amendments similar to that made in the Mutiny Bill, and if the hon. Member for Chatham (Mr. Otway) were not in his place to move the omission of the words in reference to corporal punishment, he (Lord Henry Lennox) would move the Amendment for him.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

MR. OTWAY moved the following amendments, which were agreed to:—

Clause 27, line 36, leave out from “any” to “any marine to corporal punishment,” in lines 39 and 40, inclusive, and insert “no court martial shall for any offence whatever committed in time of peace, within the Queen’s dominions, have power to sentence any marine to corporal punishment.” Lines 44 and 45, leave out “disgraceful conduct or any breach of the Articles of War.”

House resumed.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered To-morrow.

MARRIAGES (FRAMPTON MANSSEL) BILL.

On Motion of Sir JAMES FERGUSSON, Bill to render valid Marriages heretofore solemnised in the Chapel of Ease of Frampton Mansel, in the parish of Sapperton, in the county of Gloucester, ordered to be brought in by Sir JAMES FERGUSSON and Mr. Secretary GATHORNE HARDY.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 79.]

The Marquess of Hartington

PRISONS (COMPENSATION TO OFFICERS) BILL.

On Motion of Sir JAMES FERGUSSON, Bill to provide Compensation to Officers of certain discontinued Prisons, ordered to be brought in by Sir JAMES FERGUSSON and Mr. Secretary GATHORNE HARDY.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 80.]

House adjourned at half after Twelve o’clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, March 31, 1868.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—
Marine Mutiny * ; Mutiny * ; Inclosure * (61).
Second Reading — (£6,000,000) Consolidated Fund * ; London Coal and Wine Duties Continuance * (59).
Committee—Indian Railway Companies * (63).
Third Reading—Railways (Extension of Time)*
(36).

EDUCATION—ANSWER TO ADDRESS.

The QUEEN’S Answer to the Address of the 23rd Instant, reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—REPORT OF SELECT COMMITTEE.

RESOLUTION.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY, in calling attention to the Report of the Select Committee on “the Business of the House,” said, their Lordships would recollect that last year a noble Earl (the Earl of Shaftesbury) brought under their consideration the necessity of appointing a Select Committee to investigate two or three points of some importance with reference to carrying on the Business of the House in an improved form. The first point to which the Committee directed its attention was whether the House ought to meet at an earlier hour than it now did; but, on consideration, it was found that it would be very inconvenient and unfair to the Lord Chancellor, who probably had been sitting all the morning for six hours hearing appeals, to call upon him at once to take his place on the Woolsack and enter upon the Public Business of the House without any rest or any interval whatever. The Committee had, therefore, decided not to recommend any change in the present arrangement in that respect. The question of the use of proxies, which had lately attracted some notice, next engaged the Committee’s attention. The privilege enjoyed by Peers, of being represented in the House by proxies when unable to attend personally, was a very ancient and historical one, it had become prescriptive, and belonged to the Estate of the Peerage in the same way as the privilege of sending their proxies to the other House belonged to the Estate of the Commons—for the Members of the other House were in reality the proxies of the Estate of the Commons. In the primæval days when our Constitution originated, the Estates of the Realm were three, or, as some said, two. First, there was the Church, which was represented by the Archbishops and Bishops, and next the lay Peers. Those two Estates, not being very numerous, could easily meet under the same roof. But of course that was not the case with the Commons, who were too multitudinous to assemble in one place, and they accordingly sent to Parliament their representatives, or, in other words, their proxies. No doubt, then, the Committee had stated correctly that it was a privilege inherent in the Peers to send their proxies to that House in the same way as the Commons sent the proxies of their Estate to the House of Commons. The Committee, however, considered whether any change should be made in regard to that practice. It was clear that the privilege of the Peers to use proxies could only be put an end to by Act of Parliament; but there were abundant precedents to show that the House itself could, by its own Orders, regulate the mode of exercising the privilege. For instance, in the reign of Charles II. on an occasion when proxies were used, the Duke of Buckingham, who was not very scrupulous, brought more than twenty proxies in his pocket, and an Order was then made that no Peer should hold more than two proxies. It would be seen, moreover, by the Report of the Select Committee, that no Peer could hold more than two proxies; that they could not be used in Committee, nor in judicial proceedings; and that they must be entered before three o'clock of the day on which they were to be used. These things showed that the House could by its own Orders, regulate the use of proxies. The inconvenience attending the use of proxies was much discussed in the Select Committee; and although there was some difference of opinion as to how the privilege should be dealt with, it was thought that their Lordships' House would be more popular, and would enjoy more confidence with the country in respect to its decisions, if that privilege were waived, inasmuch as those who were not present at the debates were not supposed to have a full knowledge of the points on which they would have to vote. On the other hand, there were many Members of their Lordships' House who, though prevented from being present in the House by illness or through employment under the Crown, were yet perfectly cognizant of what was going on there, and as capable of giving an opinion on subjects brought before Parliament, as if they were present and heard the debates. Such a case it would be easy to find at the present moment in the late Prime Minister, whom nobody could say was not as capable of giving his opinion on a political question as if he were then sitting in that House. The same remark might apply to some of our Ambassadors at Foreign Courts. The Committee, however, though divided in opinion, decided that, on the whole, it would be preferable to put an end to the use of proxies, and that an Order of the House should be adopted to that effect. They further recommended that, to prevent that Order from being lightly suspended, twice the usual length of notice should be given of any Motion for its suspension. The Committee also recommended that Notices of Questions should be placed on the Minutes and not given privately, as was now often done; but, at the same time, they did not propose to prevent Questions as to sudden or pressing affairs being put to Ministers without notice. With respect to the appointment of Committees on Private Bills, the Select Committee recommended that the Committee of Selection should exercise its discretion as to calling upon Peers to serve, although they might be absent from the House.

Moved, "To agree to the Report of the Select Committee on Business of the House."—(The Lord Privy Seal.)

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, that his noble Friend's argument went in one way and his vote in another, for he (the Lord Privy Seal) argued in favour of proxies, while he concluded by asking their Lordships to vote their abandonment. There would not, he thought, be much difference of opinion among their Lordships on this subject. His noble Friend said the Committee had come to a resolution to abandon proxies, because the use of them was not popular out-of-doors. But his impression was that the feeling of the Committee had so not much reference to the question of their being popular or not as that proxies were a source of weakness rather than strength, and that they were a form of proceeding that could never be used in any circumstances of real difficulty or emergency. It would be impossible for their Lordships to pass any important measure simply and solely by the votes of the absentees—as impossible as for the lay Lords to interfere with the judicial proceedings of the House. That was not a time when they should lean upon fictitious support, and the Committee had therefore, in his opinion, wisely determined to abolish the use of proxies. The whole character and use of proxies had undergone a great change. Formerly proxies could not be used except under Royal licence, which was granted to Peers who were absent engaged in the discharge of high and important State duties. Now they did not depend on the Royal consent; but were exercised as the privilege of individual Peers, who used them as they thought best for their own convenience. In the same way the difficulties of communication between the different parts of the kingdom were another ground on which proxies might have been justified in other days. It appeared to him, however, that all the reasons that formerly existed in favour of the use of proxies had disappeared. He should perhaps have preferred to see proxies more definitely abandoned; but since, if the present Motion was carried, their Lordships could never revert to the use of them, he for one should be quite content to accept the Motion. There was another matter which had occupied the attention of the Committee, as it had also excited a good deal of attention out-of-doors—namely, the numbers of Peers present who were supposed to be necessary for the transaction of Business. It had been said that five or six Peers often sat to pass or reject measures of the utmost importance. He had attended that House as often as almost anyone, and he thought he might safely say that the number of Peers present at the thinnest time of attendance was on any important question rarely below twenty. If so a quorum probably ought not to be less than twenty, and he hardly saw that any great practical importance would be derived from establishing a quorum unless they fixed the number at, or nearly at, forty, the same as the House of Commons. The attendance upon their Lordships' House varied much; but he did not believe that it was an exaggerated statement if he said that the average attendance before Easter was between sixty and seventy, and that after Easter it was considerably more. A certain number of Peers no doubt failed altogether to attend, some from age and others from illness. Others could not plead equally valid causes of absence. Perhaps their absence did not matter so much as far as general legislation was concerned; but the House had a right to complain of a want of proper attendance so far as Private Bill legislation was concerned. His noble Friend the Chairman of Committees was often placed in an invidious position in being obliged to go about canvassing their Lordships for Peers to sit on Private Bill Committees. The Peers also who regularly attended had a right to complain on this score, because they were called upon to take more than their fair share of Committee work. The noble Earl (Earl Granville) proposed in the Committee that the House should adopt a system similar to that in the House of Commons, where a circular letter was sent round to every Member who was expected to take part in Private Business, asking him at what period of the Session his attendance would be most convenient to himself. It appeared from evidence that this had answered very well in the House of Commons, and the noble Earl proposed the adoption of a similar course. It was agreed to; but at a subsequent meeting the paragraph was either struck out or expressed in a different and ambiguous sense. And on this point he must observe that the Minutes of the Committee were reported in a most unsatisfactory and confused manner, and it was difficult for even those who were present to discriminate the precise course of proceeding. With respect to their Lordships' hour of meeting, the Committee had at first decided in favour of meeting at the hour of a quarter past four, and the Lord Chancellor, then on the Woolsack, stated that this hour would not be inconvenient to him. Subsequently that decision was reversed by a majority of 1. He did not complain of this; the Committee were very nearly equally divided, and though the re-consideration of the question was brought on at an inconvenient time when the attendance of some Peers was impossible, there was no surprise; but he greatly regretted that the first decision had not been adhered to, as he believed the change would have been advantageous. He, for one, could not consent to accept the Resolution with regard to the hour of meeting as final, and he had the authority of Lord Shaftesbury, who first brought the subject forward, and had made it peculiarly his own, for saying that he attached so much importance to the change of hour that after Easter, he would give the House an opportunity of re-considering what he deemed to be the unfortunate decision of the Committee.

The Earl of Carnarvon

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said, he thought the best course would have been to propose the adoption of the recommendation of the Committee seriatim.

LORD REDESDALE said, that although he did not see the necessity of some of the changes proposed, he was willing to accept the conclusions of the Committee. Some of their recommendations—for instance, the retention of the present hour of meeting—did not require formal adoption. He did not think it was expedient to make any change in the nomination of Committees for Private Business, for he believed the present system worked satisfactorily. The Committee had suggested that Peers not in attendance in the House should be nominated on such Committees, and perhaps on some occasions it might be desirable to exercise greater pressure than hitherto in this direction. As to the time of assembling, the Committee in the first instance decided by a majority of 1 in favour of meeting at half-past four; one of the Members, however, who held a contrary opinion, was accidentally absent, and on the question being re-considered, there was a majority of 1 against any alteration. For his own part, he could see no advantage in meeting earlier, and it would, moreover, be inconvenient to the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, as also to Peers engaged on Committees. With respect to proxies, he thought the prejudice against them unreasonable, and that the system was a more sensible one than that which would necessarily be substituted—namely, pairing, as was done in the House of Commons. At a late period of the year an announcement was often made that two Members of the other House had paired for the remainder of the Session; yet, in many instances, those Gentlemen might have voted on the same side. It was surely better for an absent Peer to intrust a proxy to a person in whom he reposed confidence, so that his vote might not be lost on any important occasion. Since, however, the majority of the Committee were opposed to the use of proxies, he should not oppose the Resolution.

LORD LYVEDEN said, although he would admit that something might be said in favour of proxies, public opinion was so decidedly adverse to them that their Lordships would do well to remove the misapprehensions to which they gave rise by abandoning the use of them. Many persons supposed that proxies might be tendered on any occasion, whether Peers were present or not, and that the Ministry of the day held a great number, which they could use at any time. The public would be disabused of these notions were proxies discontinued; and as they were seldom resorted to, the change was an advisable one. The recommendation of the Committee, that Questions should not be put without Notice, seemed to him a very good one; for a Question was sometimes put shortly after five o'clock, when Peers who would have been interested in the subject had not arrived, and only the Ministers were previously acquainted with its object. Moreover, if Notice were given, and if—as often happened—the Question gave rise to discussion, noble Lords would have the opportunity of directing their attention to the matter beforehand. As to the nomination by the Committee of Selection of absent Peers, he thought it would be well to adopt a distinct Resolution on the subject, as this would give it more weight. He hoped that, on a future occasion, the noble Earl the Lord Privy Seal would propose Resolutions carrying into effect those recommendations of the Committee which he wished to be adopted.

EARL STANHOPE said, he gave credit to the noble Lord the Chairman of Committees for consistency, for he had both in the Committee and on this occasion objected to the discontinuance of proxies; but while he (Earl Stanhope) admitted his consistency, he was certainly not convinced by his arguments. His noble Friend had maintained the system of proxies chiefly on the ground that the system of pairing was equally open to exception. But there was this important difference—that the addition of a certain number of pairs to both the majority and the minority made no difference in the result, whereas the use of proxies might lead to a decision the reverse of that which would otherwise have been given. Indeed, this happened on the last occasion when proxies were used—namely, on the Motion of the noble Earl (the Earl of Shafesbury) himself on the affairs of Denmark and Germany. The majority of the Peers present were satisfied with the decision of the Government of the day; but proxies being called for—most unwisely, in his judgment—by the Prime Minister of that day, the majority of the Peers absented themselves from the division against the Government. It was enough of itself to discredit the system of proxies that when a noble Earl (Earl Russell) was put on his personal defence, and when that defence was deemed satisfactory to the majority of those who heard it, an appeal should be made by another noble Earl (the Earl of Derby) to those Peers who had not heard and could not hear it. Passing from the subject of proxies, he (Earl Stanhope) did not think that any Resolution should now be passed confirming the recommendation of the Committee, and approving the present hour of meeting. They were told by his noble Friend near him (the Earl of Carnarvon) that Lord Shaftesbury, who was now absent from town, intended to submit a Resolution to the effect that the House should meet at a quarter past four instead of five. Assuming, for the sake of argument, that Lord Shaftesbury would carry his proposition, would not their Lordships justify themselves if they were to come to a vote on the subject now? He thought it would be well that they should not at that moment adopt any Resolution by which their future discretion might be fettered. He wished to add a word of purely verbal criticism. As he had already stated, he fully approved the proposed Standing Order with respect to proxies. The noble Earl had, however, taken the very words of the Committee, and embodied them in the Standing Order—

"That the Practice of calling for Proxies on a division should be discontinued, and, to prevent the Order being lightly suspended, that Twice the usual length of Notice shall be given of any Motion for its Suspension."

Now, when a Committee made a Report they properly gave reasons for their conclusions; but when the House passed an Order it was not its practice to do so. He would, therefore, take the liberty at the proper time to move the omission of the words "to prevent this Order being lightly suspended."

EARL DE GREY agreed with the noble Lord the Chairman of Committees, that there was no necessity for their Lordships to give a formal sanction to most of the commendations of the Committee, except that relating to the discontinuance of proxies. But with regard to attendance on Private Business, it appeared to him absolutely necessary to have a definite Resolution of the House. It was very desirable that the House should pass a Resolution calling on those Peers who were in the habit of absenting themselves from Private Bill Committees to attend to their duties. Speaking for himself, and, as far as he could judge, for many other Members of the Committee, a strong feeling was entertained by many that it was extremely desirable that some measure should be taken to assimilate the practice of their Lordships' House to that of the other House of Parliament on this subject. He trusted the noble Earl opposite would take the matter into consideration, and propose a definite Resolution.

Earl Stanhope

THE MARQUESS OF BATH said, that he was in favour of doing away with the practice of using proxies, for the simple reason that there would be great practical difficulties in employing them in those cases in which alone there would be any need of them. With regard to the 7th Paragraph—he spoke with great deference to the noble Lord the Chairman of Committees—but he thought the Committee of Selection had the power to place on Private Bill Committees any Peer, whether in London or not, and all that would be required would be a strong opinion on the part of the House to enable them to exercise that power with effect. There was a case in which a noble Lord had been committed to the custody of the Usher of the Black Rod for not having attended a Committee to which he had been appointed. There could be no question, therefore, as to the power which the Committee of Selection possessed. With regard to the alteration of the hour of meeting, it was true that it was carried in the Select Committee by a narrow majority in the first instance; but noble Lords who complained that the decision had been reversed would recollect that another important Committee was sitting at the time, upon which he and Lord Stradbroke were serving, and that if they had been able to go from one Committee Room to another they would have voted against any change. The noble Earl (the Earl of Carnarvon) had said that Lord Shaftesbury was about coming home, and that he intended to propose that the hour of meeting should be changed. But were the House of Lords to be dependent on Lord Shaftesbury's presence or absence before expressing an opinion on a matter of public business? Lord Shaftesbury was a very great man, but he was scarcely so great a man as all that.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, he saw no necessity for retaining the system of the use of proxies. As for compelling the attendance of Peers on Committees, that might be done; but it would not be so easy to secure the proper discharge of the duties of the Committees. One man might lead a horse to the water, but twenty could not force him to drink. He wished to call attention to the inconvenient mode in which these Reports were drawn up. With regard to different paragraphs it was extremely difficult to make out what was done. He hoped, therefore, directions would be given that the draught Report should appear with the proceedings.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE said, with regard to putting Questions without Notice, he had sat long in the House, and he could say that great public convenience had sometimes arisen from Peers being permitted to put Questions to Ministers of which they had given either private notice or no notice, and he hoped their Lordships would not altogether put an end to that practice. With regard to the attendance of Peers on Private Bill Committees, he thought it would be unwise to come to any Resolution that it might be found difficult to enforce. It should, moreover, be remembered that it was the House that appointed the Committees, and any noble Lord who failed to attend must render his account, not to the five Lords who formed the Committee of Selection, but to the House. He was not aware that there was any necessity for adopting any system of compulsory attendance, for he understood there was no difficulty in securing a sufficient number of Peers for the transaction of business. He thought, however, they might adopt the recommendation of the Committee on this subject.

THE DUKE OF CLEVELAND agreed with the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Clanricarde) that it might be found highly inconvenient if it should be absolutely prohibited that Questions should be put without Notice; but then they ought to adopt the practice of the House of Commons and prevent discussion being raised upon them. There might be not only great inconvenience but also great impropriety if the system of putting Questions without Notice were used for the purpose of raising discussions which nobody could have anticipated.

EARL RUSSELL agreed with the noble Duke that there was a great difference between a noble Lord putting without Notice a Question to which he merely wished for an answer, and a Question which led to a debate. There was an inconvenience in the latter coming on without Notice; but it seemed to him better not to adopt any Resolution on the subject. He thought they should confine themselves on that occasion to adopting the Resolution with regard to proxies.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY said, their Lordships had not too many opportunities of showing that interest in public affairs which it was their privilege to show, and it was undesirable to diminish the importance of this House by diminishing the number of those opportunities; and there was something gained by allowing Members of that House to do things irregularly which would be attended with great inconvenience if done in the House of Commons. Their Lordships were a smaller body than the House of Commons, and there was much less pressure on their time, and therefore he thought they might be allowed a large latitude in the transaction of their business. He thought that every facility should be given for raising questions in this House, and that they should trust to the good sense of noble Lords not to abuse the privilege.

LORD REDESDALE thought that a Resolution might be too stringent in its application; but the Report laid before the House might be agreed to as a guide and direction—for it went no further. He repeated his opinion that the system of proxies was infinitely more sensible than the system of pairing; and it was a mistake to suppose that the result of a division could not be affected by the latter practice. He had known cases in which a Member having returned before the time of his pair had expired, was obliged to leave the House on a division, even when he believed that his pair, if present, would have gone into the same Lobby.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, the general wish of their Lordships seemed to be that the Report of the Committee should be put in a more substantive form, and he would therefore undertake, on a future day, to move a series of Resolutions embodying it. At the same time, he should ask their Lordships to adopt at once the Standing Order with reference to proxies.

Motion (by Leave of the House) withdrawn.

PROXIES—RESOLUTION.

Resolved, That the following Order be added to the Roll of Standing Orders :

“ Standing Order XXXIIa. Ordered, That the practice of calling for Proxies on a Division shall be discontinued, and that Two Days’ Notice be given of any Motion for the Suspension of this Standing Order.”

House adjourned at half past Six o’clock, to Thursday next, half past Ten o’clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, March 31, 1868.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—Considered as amended—Marine Mutiny.

Third Reading—Mutiny; Marine Mutiny; Perth and Brechin Provisional Orders Confirmation * [74], and passed.

DISMISSAL OF AN INSPECTOR OF THE SURREY CONSTABULARY.

QUESTION.

MR. ONSLOW said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the case of Inspector Miller, of the Surrey County Constabulary, lately stationed at Reigate, who has been dismissed the Force, after a long and meritorious service, for subscribing to a newspaper termed the Police Service Advertiser. And whether, in his opinion, the alleged ground of dismissal is justifiable; if not justifiable, whether he will recommend the re-instatement of Inspector Miller?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, in reply, that he had no authority whatever over the County Constabulary, which was placed under the Magistrates of the County. He appeared, from inquiries made in consequence of the Question of the hon. Gentleman, that a man named Miller was dismissed by the Chief Constable of the Surrey Constabulary, who had absolute power to dismiss him, under, of course, the lawful authority of the Magistrates. The justices, however, he understood, were about to investigate the case.

MUTINY BILL.—THIRD READING:

Mr. Dodson, Sir John Pakington, The Judge Advocate General.)

Order for Third Reading read.

MR. BOUVERIE said, he had to call the attention of the House to a proceeding which he believed to be of a somewhat irregular and unprecedented character. It was the ancient rule in that House that on Tuesdays Notices of Motion should have precedence of the Orders of the Day. It was, of course, competent for the House at any time, after due notice, to suspend the Standing Orders, and make any change in that rule: but to the great astonishment of himself and other Members, there appeared upon the Notice Paper of that day a Notice that certain Orders of the Day were to have precedence over Notices of Motion—namely, the Mutiny Bill and the Marine Mutiny Bill. Although, on looking at the Votes for a record of last night’s proceedings, he found that it was ordered that these Bills should be forwarded a stage at half-past four o’clock that day; yet he did not think that any public notice had been taken of the matter last night. He had been present himself when these Bills had been furthered a stage, and he had heard nothing of such an unusual Order, nor as far as he was aware, had any intimation been given of what was being done. He wished, therefore, to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War what had induced him to adopt this most irregular and unprecedented course with regard to these Bills. He was not aware that there was any public ground for this irregularity. There was no reason why that House should consult the convenience of others, and suspend their Standing Orders in order that these Bills might be advanced a stage that night in “another place.” If the noble Lords in “another place” had so much to do, and had such a large amount of business to get through that they were obliged to have an earlier holiday for repose after their exertions, they should suspend their own Standing Orders, and let the irregularity in the proceedings take place in their House. At any rate, the Standing Orders of the House of Commons should not be suspended without notice. The course which had been adopted with regard to these Bills was in direct violation of the rights of independent Members, who were already sufficiently hard pressed by the rules of the House, and who experienced considerable difficulty in bringing on the Motions in which they were interested. If this precedent were to be followed, and proceedings like those he complained of were to become the practice, the House might bid adieu to Motions brought forward by independent Members. He begged to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War for an Answer to the Question he had just put to him; or perhaps he had better ask Mr. Speaker under what circumstances the arrangement had been agreed to?

MR. SPEAKER: The right hon. Gentleman has called this proceeding irregular and unprecedented; but I have to inform him that there are very many precedents for the course that has been adopted, and therefore it cannot be irregular. There are some occasions when public convenience is promoted by the House permitting Bills of this sort to be read on their third stage at an early hour of the evening, and in accordance with many precedents that course has been taken in the present instance, under an Order made by the House last night. The right hon. Gentleman says that the Standing Orders of the House have been suspended in order to permit this Bill to be read a third time: but I am sure that, with his knowledge of the forms of the House, he must be aware that there are no Standing Orders on the subject to suspend. It is for the House—if it thinks that it will conduce to public convenience and promote Public Business—to make an Order of this kind; and I would ask the right hon. Gentleman and the House if they ever knew any inconvenience arise from the adoption of the course that has been taken in the present instance with regard to these Bills. This is no question of interference with the rights of private Members. Had it not been for the observations of the right hon. Gentleman, the two Bills would probably have been disposed of by this time. My Answer to the Question of the right hon. Gentleman is, that the course taken with regard to these Bills is quite in conformity with precedent, and only for the promotion of the despatch of Public Business.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

MARINE MUTINY BILL.

(Mr. Dodson, Mr. Corry, Lord Henry Lennox.)

CONSIDERATION. THIRD READING.

Order for Consideration, as amended, read.

MR. BOUVERIE said, of course he had no desire to question the accuracy of so high an authority as Mr. Speaker upon the point to which he had just referred or to enter into any controversy with him; but he should like to know from the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War his reason for taking these Bills out of the ordinary course.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he had no difficulty in replying to the Question of the hon. Member. In consequence of these Bills having been brought forward at a later period than usual, it became necessary to send them up to the other House of Parliament as soon as possible. It having been intimated to him last night that there would be nothing irregular in reading the Bills a third time at an early hour, he had adopted that course with the sanction of the House.

MR. OTWAY said, he wished to say one word with reference to what fell from the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War. He had had occasion to notice what seemed to be a considerable irregularity. Three Amendments had been moved in Committee, and in the records of their proceedings only one of these Amendments was taken notice of. Having made inquiries upon the subject, he was informed that it was not usual to put upon the record of their proceedings any Amendment upon which divisions had not been taken. The very next day, however, after he had received that information, he discovered that an Amendment upon which a division had not been taken was recorded, while two other Amendments which had been moved under precisely similar circumstances had been altogether omitted. This was an irregularity of no unimportant character. For instance, the noble Lord the Member for Kildare (Lord Odo Fitzgerald) moved an Amendment in Committee upon the Mutiny Bill; but of that Amendment no notice was taken, and yet last night that very Amendment was rescinded, and the words which originally stood in the Mutiny Bill were re-inserted.

MR. SPEAKER: My answer to the Question of the hon. Member is, that those Amendments only upon which divisions take place are entered on the Votes. If every verbal Amendment, and everything which occurs, were ordered to be entered on the Votes, it would be almost impossible to print them.

LORD HENRY LENNOX desired to move, with the permission of the House, the third reading of the Marine Mutiny Bill, so that it might at once be sent to the House of Lords.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

INDIA—IRRIGATION.—POSTPONEMENT OF MOTION.

MR. KINNAIRD said, that, in deference to the wishes of the House, he would postpone his Motion respecting Irrigation in India to the 28th of April. But he deeply regretted being called upon for the second time to defer the consideration of a question which affected a population not a few millions only, but of 150,000,000 of our fellow-subjects, of whom, too, mainly through the neglect of irrigation, in one district alone, and in the course of only a few months, according to official Returns, nearly 1,000,000 of souls had recently perished of famine.

ESTABLISHED CHURCH (IRELAND).

MOTION FOR A COMMITTEE.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [30th March],

That this House will immediately resolve itself into a Committee to consider the said Acts," Mr. Gladstone :)

and which Amendment was,

to leave out from the word "House" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "while admitting that considerable modifications of the temporalities of the United Church in Ireland may, after the pending inquiry, appear to be expedient, is of opinion that any proposition tending to the disestablishment or disendowment of the Church ought to be reserved for the decision of the new Parliament,"—(Lord Stanley,)

instead thereof.

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

Debate resumed.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: There is no Member of this House who is more inclined to rate highly the gravity of the question now occupying our attention than I am. I quite admit that it is one of those questions which long ago it was thought would not engage the attention of the House at any distant period; and, though we take exception to the particular period at which it is brought before the House, it is a question which we are prepared to meet on any occasion, and under any circumstances. It has been brought before the House in a speech of great power and eloquence, and by one who, from his position as a leader in this House, and from his position in the country as a man of the greatest ability, has recommended the subject with additional force to the consideration, not only of the House, but of the country. But I cannot help observing that this question, which is of such momentous gravity, has been treated by hon. Gentlemen opposite, and by those who support the right hon. Gentleman, not merely as a question affecting the Church of Ireland, but with a degree of bitterness and acrimony against the Ministry who sit on these Benches which makes it at once an attack upon the Church of Ireland and upon the Ministry; and not only have we met with this reception in front, but even on our flank we have been assailed with incredible hostility. I will for a moment speak upon the subject of the Ministry that is attacked, and, if I am permitted, of myself, who have been personally assailed. I feel that it is one of the highest honours that I ever achieved to have sat in the same Cabinet with my noble Friend (Viscount Cranborne). No one valued more the resources of the genius, eloquence, and power which he brought to the Ministry of which he formed a part; and I acted with him with cordiality and sincerity in all the transactions of the Government. The noble Lord, in the position he has assumed in this House—that of speaking as the censor of the Ministry, and of attacking them one by one for the course they thought proper to pursue last year—has forgotten, I think, how far he himself proceeded in the path they followed. He has apparently forgotten that the course he finally took was not taken on account of the lowering of the franchise to the point to which it was lowered, but on account of the want, as he thought, of sufficient checks to moderate and to balance that enfranchisement; and he forgets, moreover, that we, entertaining the same view as he himself held, were defeated on it, not merely by those who sit opposite, but by the overwhelming feeling of Gentlemen who sat behind the Government. I do not mean to say that the Reform Bill of last year is in everything such as I could have wished for if I could have entirely controlled it; but I should like to know where is the man who, sitting, I will not say in the Cabinet, but in any Assembly whatever, has not been compelled in some respects to compromise his own opinions and give way to the feeling of those with whom he sits in order that they may all act together with uniformity and unity. That I consider is all I have done. I have sacrificed no principle. ["Oh, oh!"] I say I sacrificed no principle. I consider that the question of Reform brought before the House was a question, not of principle, but of degree. We had been parties to lowering the franchise, we had assented to the second reading of the Bill introduced in 1860 by the other side of the House, which effected that lowering to a great extent, and we had assented to the lowering of the franchise in the Bill of 1866; and I say that it became evident—not on account of disturbance out-of-doors, but on account of the Parliamentary attitude that the question had assumed—that it became absolutely necessary to deal with and, if possible, settle it. I say it was a question of degree and not of principle. I should not have said a word about myself if my noble Friend had not brought my name forward somewhat unnecessarily. In fact, my noble Friend took especial pains, as it appeared to me, to compliment my sincerity at the expense of my pliability. But I trust that, as concerns principle, I shall be found as ready to maintain those principles in which we both agree as he himself has been. Let me for one moment, in passing, advert to the course my noble Friend has thought proper to take this year. My noble Friend has been the firm consistent advocate of church rates; but this year he has taken a different view, and this suddenly—unexpected no doubt by those sitting near him, and certainly by those who have hitherto acted with him. Far be it from me to say that this was from any want of principle. I believe that he acted from a patriotic feeling, and from that principle for which I hope he will give credit to others. I am sorry to have detained the House so long on this matter, and will now come to the question before the House. We are called on at a special and peculiar moment to go into Committee upon a question of the greatest possible importance, and one that cannot be settled or terminated—I will not say in this Parliament, nor probably in the next; nor for many years to come, in my opinion. This is met by an Amendment on the part of my noble Friend, to which great exception has been taken. I will for a moment take notice of a remark that has been made on that Amendment. My noble Friend claimed for himself freedom of acting in future Sessions on this great question, without expressing his full opinion now; but, at the same time, he said that he wished to make it manifest by the earlier part of his Resolution that the present course of the Government was not adopted from mere motives of obstruction, from no conviction that there was nothing to redress, or nothing to reform in the Irish Church, for an admission to the contrary was made by the issuing of the Commission now sitting, which may be taken as an acknowledgment that there are reforms to be effected and Amendments to be made; and though some wish to go far beyond what I should desire, yet many, who think as I do, acknowledge, as I have already done before this time, that there are evils within the Church; that, as has been said by many of her Bishops, many of her clergy, and many of her attached friends, with a view to strengthening and giving more effect to the administration of that Church great reforms, great alterations, and, if I may, without offence to Gentlemen opposite, use the word, great “modifications” are needed. It would have been idle and absurd, after having assented to a Commission upon the Irish Church, if the Government had not been prepared to act upon the facts which may be proved before that Commission, and to ameliorate where it was found necessary. I do not mean to say that the present Parliament is not competent to deal with the subject, because it is obvious that so long as the House is in existence it must have all the powers and functions of a legislative Assembly. It is not a question of competence, but of time, occasion, and opportunity. The facts are these:—At a comparatively late period of the Session, with very little progress made in Supply; with Boundary Bills, involving the interests of eighty-one boroughs and of one or two counties; and with two Reform Bills—one for Scotland and one for Ireland—in which Amendments of great importance will be moved, and which must take a long time—it is with these things before us, and with the necessity of calling for an early dissolution of the House and an appeal to the country—I say, with these things before us are we not right in saying that the House is incumbered with business, measures of great importance are pressing upon us, and therefore this is not the time to come forward with an abstract Resolution? The first Resolution of the right hon. Gentleman is distinctly and solely an abstract Resolution, which cannot pledge the new Parliament that will have to assemble in a few months, and which he himself admits cannot be carried into effect by legislation in the course of the present Session. I say, then, that this question is one which has been sudly started upon the country; it has taken the people by surprise. If it had not been started so suddenly, if it had not come but recently on the minds of those who produced it, why—when the opportunity was afforded by the Motion of the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Maguire) to go into Committee on the state of Ireland of submitting this question of the Irish Church to the consideration of the House—why did not the right hon. Gentleman produce his Resolutions then, and ask the House to consider them in connection with the state of Ireland? If this had been done we should have had time to consider them, and they could certainly have been discussed at an earlier period of the Session than they have. Is it unreasonable that we should ask for time to consider so important a matter? Is it unreasonable to ask for time in order that the country should consider the question upon which it must eventually decide? Even within the short week we have had the rustle of petitions increasingly heard from both sides of the House by day. As time goes on I venture to say that more and more petitions will be brought here, and as the question becomes more thoroughly understood in the country they will yet increase. Already, I notice that many of the Nonconformist body have petitioned against the Resolutions of the right hon. Gentleman, that the feeling against them is not confined to Churchmen. And, after all, the right hon. Gentleman himself stated last night he did not anticipate that this great measure which he had in hand could be carried into effect under much less time than thirty years, and yet now, forsooth, it is a question of hours; it is not to be hurried for a few months in order that it may be placed in all its integrity before the country. I will show before I sit down that the proposition is one which evades the chief difficulties of the question, and only deals with those portions of it upon which unity of action can be obtained; whereas, if the right hon. Gentleman had developed his whole plan it would be certain to split his supporters into many sections. The Resolutions aimed a blow at the property of the Irish Church, which I, as a Churchman, maintain has, during the last 300 years at the very least, and indeed, I believe for a much longer time, passed down in regular succession into the hands of which it is now held. If this be not so, where are the Acts of Parliament transferring the right to that property at any time before or during those 300 years? In what way has that transfer been made? I will not, however, enter now into that question, because if I did so I might possibly call up opposition on the other side. But I contend that when we are dealing with a mass of property of so much importance and of so long prescription it is not a matter for haste, and you have no right to force it upon the country until it has the whole case before it, and until we have an opportunity of consulting the constituencies upon it. Supposing we had met these Resolutions by a direct negative—which, as far as I am personally concerned, I should be, and am, perfectly prepared to do—and I think you will find that not only I personally, but all who sit on this side of the House will be ready to take the same course—but supposing, I say, that we had met these Resolutions with a direct negative, what would be said by hon. Gentlemen opposite? I know what would be said. It would be said that we object even to enter into an inquiry upon this question—that we object to go into Committee, and that we are not prepared to admit that there is any reformation needed in the Irish Church.—Whereas, by the Amendment we propose, we say that if it were shown before the Commission that reformation was needed we are prepared to act upon such Report, and to show that when we assented to the Commission being issued we were prepared to receive its judgment with respect. The right hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Moncreiff), in his speech last night, did me the honour of calling attention to something I said in 1865. I have only to say now that I have nothing to alter as to the opinions which I then expressed. I expressed those opinions in all sincerity and candour in favour of the Establishment of the Irish Church and the retention of its endowments. I do not mean to express a difference of opinion, and I speak now precisely as I spoke then. But I am told I am to renounce all the old arguments in favour of that Church. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire said yesterday that those arguments were of such a character that no one would think of using them now. Sir, I trust I shall be able to show that there are authorities which might even have influence with the right hon. Gentleman—authorities who have used these arguments, and who, like myself, are not ashamed to use them still, because they are just and apposite to the question we have in hand. I have on a former occasion called attention to a speech of the right hon. Gentleman in 1865. I should not enter into this matter now; but the right hon. Gentleman himself has challenged discussion as to the propriety of his bringing this question forward, and as to the consistency he has shown in doing so. The right hon. Gentleman said that for a period of twenty-five years his opinions have been forming on this subject, and that they have gradually arrived at the position which led him to assume the position which he now occupies. The right hon. Gentleman said that in the year 1846 it was impossible for him to pledge himself on principle to maintain the Irish Church. Now, I wish to ask him to whom he made that statement known? [Mr. GLADSTONE: To my Committee.] The right hon. Gentleman says it was proclaimed to his Committee; he must have had a singularly judicious Committee, for until the right hon. Gentleman rose last night the declaration was a secret that had never been revealed to the public. ["Oh, oh!"] Before I go further I think it but right to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to statements which have appeared in the public Press, so that if they be incorrect the right hon. Gentleman will be enabled to contradict them, or if not, how he can reconcile his statements last night with his former professions. I say nothing of the right hon. Gentleman's opinions now; but even in papers most earnest in his support there is manifest surprise at the announcement of a change of opinion in 1846 or 1847. The right hon. Gentleman now says, in his speech of last night, that in 1865 he gave a warning to his constituents of the course he was to take on the question of the Irish Church. The speech alluded to was no doubt a warning that the right hon. Gentleman saw something very unsatisfactory in the Irish Church; but it was certainly not a warning of the particular course which he has now taken. The right hon. Gentleman now states that this is not a question of surplus or of amendment; but a question whether the Irish Church Establishment should be disestablished and disendowed. In 1865 the right hon. Gentleman said—

Mr. Gathorne Hardy

"It would be their duty to consider—whether surplus or no surplus—what obligations of the Act of Union remain to be fulfilled, and how they ought to be performed."—[3 Hansard, clxxviii. 484.]

And now I find, in a letter published in the newspapers, it is stated by a gentleman —who does not certainly sign his name ["Oh, oh"]—although he has not signed his name to this letter he undertakes to produce the document to which he refers if any doubt be thrown upon his statement. It is, I presume, very well known that many letters are published in newspapers anonymously—nay, it is the commonest thing, I believe, for gentlemen to have their letters published without their names being attached to them, at the same time to furnish their names privately to the editors, with the intention of coming personally forward to substantiate their statements in case they should be questioned. The right hon. Gentleman had said last night that in 1865 he looked for action in the coming Parliament; and therefore it was that he had made that speech. But did he look for action in the coming Parliament? Was there a hint of such a thing in the speech itself, however distinctly it made known his opinion on the Church in Ireland? Was not the speech of 1865 a statement that the difficulty was so great, the problem was so difficult of solution, that he could not make up his mind when the subject could be brought before Parliament with any chance of its settlement? But let us see what the right hon. Gentleman is said to have written at that very time, for if the statement is untrue it is most unjust; if true, however, it bears with remarkable force upon the question as to whether the right hon. Gentleman really gave warning in 1865, coupled with the expression of his opinion that this question of the Irish Church was a pressing subject immediately coming before the House. The writer of the letter I have referred to says that just before the Oxford University election of 1865, "one dignitary, a consistent supporter" of the right hon. Gentleman, made his vote conditional on his explanation of the doubtful point. The writer adds—

"A mutual friend was the medium of communication, and the reply contained the following assurance, which was then deemed to be as satisfactory as it was intended to be. The document itself is at your disposal if its authenticity be called in question. It may suffice, however, to quote the following passage."

Then comes the quotation from the right hon. Gentleman's assurance, as follows:—

"The question of the Irish Establishment is remote, and apparently out of all bearing upon the practical politics of the day."

Did the right hon. Gentleman write that to one of his Committee or to one of his supporters? If he did it seems to me wholly consistent with his other statement of that night, that he made his speech in 1865 because he believed that the question was to come before the Parliament about to be elected. But he goes on—

"I think I have marked strongly my sense of responsibility attaching to the opening of such a question. One thing I may add, because I think it a clear landmark. In any measure dealing with the Irish Church, I think (though I scarcely expect to be called on to share in such a measure) the Act of Union must be recognized, and must be of the most important consequences, especially with reference to the position of the hierarchy."

hon. MEMBER: Where does it come from? The letter came from The Morning Herald, in which paper it appeared. The hon. Gentleman has the letter now in his hands: I have brought the matter before him—I thought it my duty to bring it before him—and he will know whether his statement is accurate or not. The hon. Gentleman having stated that in 1865 he made a particular speech, because, in his opinion, the question of the Irish Church was to come before the next Parliament, I have drawn his attention to a published statement that in 1865, in writing to one of his electors, he wrote that the same subject was so remote that he never expected to be engaged in such a measure. If the right hon. Gentleman did write the words attributed to him, and sits in his place and says as much, I will, of course, apologise for having brought it forward, and for having used it as I have done. But when I saw that it was published—and not in one paper alone—I did not think it my duty to abstain from bringing it before the House in connection with the statement which the right hon. Gentleman has made. I say, then, whether the letter was written by the right hon. Gentleman or not, it is clear that his opinions between 1847 and 1865 had not been openly professed, and that he was holding what is called by divines "economy of reserve," and abstained from professing those opinions which in this great emergency he has so suddenly brought to prominence. My right hon. Friend who sits opposite (Mr. Cardwell), in 1863, stated that he also was in favour of maintaining the endowments of the Church. He said—

"I believe this House will not surrender the principle of the Established Church. I believe it will not alienate the property of the Church from ecclesiastical uses to which it has been devoted."—[3 Hansard, clxxi. 1586.]

Now, when one sees these things, and

Mr. Gathorno Hardy

when these are the last utterances that we have had upon a great subject, surely we have a right to say that this comes suddenly upon us, that it comes upon the House and the country by surprise; and those who did not know that the right hon. Gentleman had changed his opinions twenty-five years ago, may feel that their confidence in former days was not well bestowed. I will now pass from personal questions. [Ironical cheers from the Opposition]. Yes, if it be a personal question to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he has expressed such and such opinions without saying anything of him inconsistent with respect? If the right hon. Gentleman says he has not written the letter in question, I should at once apologise to him and withdraw all I have said upon that point. Gentlemen opposite appear now to be averse to personal questions; but I listened to the cheering when the most envenomed shafts were shot at Members sitting on these Benches, and I noticed that it proceeded from the very mouths that object to personality now. I would ask, whether this question of the Irish Church is to be disposed of hastily and without discussion? Is this Church, which has stood for so long a time, and has battled for centuries in defence of the truth, to be at once given up without consideration, and are all the arguments of the many great men who defended her in former days to be ignored or declared to be of no avail? Am I to be afraid to say that the Union of Great Britain and Ireland was a compact—a treaty of a solemn and a binding character? Am I to be forbidden to say that the 5th Article of that Union was so important that it was made the fundamental basis and the very essence of that Union? Let those who doubt this look at the Act of Union itself, and see how differently other conditions are treated which were not regarded as fundamental or essential. This Article respecting the Church was made, if I may say so, the very bait for the Irish Protestants to yield to that Union. It was put forward on all occasions as a main inducement to them to establish their Church upon what was represented as a firmer footing, by uniting it, as was supposed, indissolubly, to the Church of England. And have we any right now, because this connection may, in the opinion of some, be a burden or source of weakness to us, to throw it aside and say, "We will renounce the Union of the Churches, and leave the Irish Church to take care of itself?" Let us see what has been said in former debates by eminent politicians: what, for instance, was said by the Lord Chief Justice of England (Lord Ellenborough) as to the effect of the Union upon the United Church of England and Ireland. On the 13th of May, 1805, Lord Ellenborough thus expounded this Article of the Treaty in his place in Parliament—

"By the 5th Article of the Union it is declared that the continuance and preservation of the said United Church, as the Established Church of England and Ireland, shall be deemed and taken to be an essential and fundamental part of the Union. By fundamental is meant, with reference to the subject-matter, such an integral part of the compact of union formed between the two kingdoms as is absolutely necessary to the support and sustaining of the whole fabric and superstructure of the Union, raised and built thereupon; and such as, being removed, would produce the ruin and overthrow of the political union founded upon this Article as its immediate basis."—[1 Hansard, iv. 814.]

The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire escaped from this point by saying—"Oh! but Mr. Pitt meant to do this in connection with other things," that intention being expressed not in the Act of Union, but in State Papers which are now accessible to us. But there was no engagement either in the Act of Union or in any statement on the part of Mr. Pitt that anything would be done more than was done by that statute. Nothing can be produced that ever was stated by Mr. Pitt to show that anything forming part of the compact was, in the slightest degree, neglected or left undone by him. My right hon. Friend opposite says that there were other inducements. I am sorry to say that there were, and that the Irish Parliament of that day may be said to have been corrupt in the strongest sense of the term. But the Parliament of England, which accepted that compact and joined in that treaty, was it also as corrupt a Parliament? [Mr. BRIGHT: Hear, hear!] The hon. Member for Birmingham says it was; and therefore I presume that, in his opinion, the Acts of that Parliament are not to be attended to, or, at least, are not to be attended to in the same way as he would doubtless conceive they ought to be if they were the Acts of some more perfect legislative Assembly. [Mr. BRIGHT: I did not say so.] I am perfectly aware of that. But just now, when I was asking whether the Parliament of England, which also joined in the Act of Union, was as corrupt as the Irish Parliament, the hon.

Gentleman interrupted and said "It was." And that either has some meaning or it has not. If it has a meaning, does it mean that the Acts of that Parliament are in any sense invalidated? If so, we shall be entering upon a very difficult question. And if we are to question the intentions of Parliament and its freedom from corruption, and so to judge of the acts which it performed, I am afraid that some of our creditors will not be in a very favourable position for obtaining payment of their debts. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire has stated that whatever else might be the ultimate effect of his Resolutions, they could not be injurious to the Protestant faith; and he went into statistics as to population and the proportions of different creeds. With regard to those, I will only say that any one who heard the statistics given as to the different creeds and different professions in Ireland must have felt that the sources from which they were derived were not such that they could be treated as a particular and demonstrative statement with regard to the population. The only statistics, I may say, that were thoroughly gone into were those in 1834 and in 1861. The right hon. Gentleman said that when the penal laws were most strictly enforced the Protestants had increased; but that when the penal laws ceased to be enforced and liberty was freely accorded, the Protestants began to diminish in proportion to the Roman Catholics; the right hon. Gentleman taking those things as cause and effect. Now, if there were a period during which there was a more general relaxation of the penal laws it was that between 1834 and 1861, and yet it will be found that the proportions of the populations had then increased in favour of the Protestants. I know that the right hon. Gentleman says that such increase is to be accounted for by the emigration of the labouring classes, whom he assumes to be all of the Roman Catholic faith. But the right hon. Gentleman has made no allowance whatever for the large emigration of Protestants from Ireland. I believe there is not an Irish Member who will fail to tell you that among the emigrants there were a very large number of Protestants, who carried themselves and their religion to another country. But the right hon. Gentleman says that the disestablishment of the Protestant Church in Ireland will not be injurious to the Protestant faith. I should be ashamed of the religion which I profess, thought it would be unable to meet any other form of religion with or without the aid of endowments; but am I on that account to say that I think it is incumbered by having endowments? If so, that seems to me an argument which goes far beyond the case of the Irish Church. I do not know why in one country it is to be considered advantageous to be without endowments and in another country to possess them. And if religion in this country can exist, although cumbered, as the right hon. Gentleman would have us think, with large endowments, why do you object to Protestant friends in Ireland retaining that which they believe to be of service to them, and that to which they believe they have a right? In respect to the voluntary principle, there is a great part of Ireland in which the voluntary principle is hardly applicable—parts where the Protestants are but thinly scattered, and where it would be almost impossible, without partial organization, that they could obtain themselves the means of grace; and therefore it is necessary that in those parts of the country there should be some means of providing them with the means of grace to which they are now entitled by law. The right hon. Gentleman, in holding out these Resolutions as an olive branch to Ireland, forgets how much he is alienating—how much he is distressing those who are members of the Church, and those who, though not actually members of the Church, feel towards it a friendly interest. We are here, as it were, looking on at a picture which is passing before us in the distance; but it touches the hearts and the homes of many. It is not such not only a sentimental grievance, but a practical wrong. While they feel deeply upon the matter, is it for us, in our apathetic indifference, to give up the dearest interests of all those with whom we are united by the ties of religion, of honour, of treaty, and of compact—to throw such considerations to be thrown overboard without regard to their feelings, with the view of reconciling others who may, after we remain hostile to us, whilst we alienate our old friends who have ever been faithful to us? Now, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman said he did not think that any one would venture to use the argument that the subversion of the Irish Church would lead also to the subversion of property. This, however, an argument that has been used by some of our greatest authorities, and, not the least, by that great man, Sir

Mr. Gathorne Hardy

Robert Peel, whose memory probably the right hon. Gentleman opposite respects. It was an argument that Sir Robert Peel did not disdain to use, and urge with great force on more than one occasion. He did so at some length; but I will merely read a short extract from a speech of his on the Appropriation Clause, to show the terms in which he spoke of the Church property. He said—

“If long possession and the prescription of three centuries were not powerful enough to protect the property of the Church from spoliation, there is little safety for any description of private property; and much less for that property which is in the hands of lay corporations.”

And it was no idle fear, for there are symptoms that property in the hands of lay corporations is in danger, and language has been used in this House on the Irish land question which seemed to verge very near an attack on the Irish property of the City companies. Language has been used with reference to their possession of land in Ireland which must certainly give them the hint that the time may soon come when they will have to set their houses in order. And with reference to another great corporation possessing land in Ireland—the Law Life Assurance Society—language has been used which shows there is a design in some persons to carry the attack beyond the property of the Irish Church, and not stop short of the landed interest; for I do not hesitate to state that the schemes proposed for dealing with the land in Ireland are in themselves on a revolutionary scale. These schemes do attack the rights of property, and those who argue that you may justly take corporate property from the Church depend upon it will not be very squeamish hereafter in dealing with other property. Well, Sir, in speaking of this question I will not hesitate to adopt what may be considered a legal statement upon the question of corporate property made by the Lord Chancellor. He says—

“It was always admitted that so long as the corporate body which possessed the title to ecclesiastical property remains, so long as the property is not greater in amount than can be usefully applied by that corporate body, there is no right of principle on which Parliament can interfere to alienate property of that kind.”

I concur in that principle. It is a principle acted on with respect to all charity property by the Court of Chancery. I believe it is a just rule, and one which we cannot violate without assailing the interests of property. The right hon. Gentleman says we are going to deal tenderly with our victim, for we are going to preserve vested interests, and we even propose going beyond that ; but at that moment the cheer which had greeted the maintaining of vested rights died away—and at the more than vested rights, the interests of curates and those who had entered on some miserable benefice with the hope of advancing to better things—I found that cheering checked ; and it is manifest that it will not be so easy for the right hon. Gentleman to carry into act his tender regard for those who have no vested interests in the property of the Irish Church. The rights to which he alluded were the vested rights of the clergy ; but how are you going to deal with the rights of the laity ? This is a question of the laity. You may deal with the clergy, so far as they are personally concerned, by paying them off, pensioning them, or by arranging with them in any other manner you please ; but when you come to the vested interests of the laity, which are held in trust for them by the Bishops and clergy, and not for themselves, how are you to compensate them for the vested interests you are about to rob them of ? The right hon. Gentleman says it is absurd to talk of what was promised in former years in order to gain concessions, when engagements were made that if a particular thing were done, it would produce peace and harmony, and that at length we should see our efforts in respect of Ireland crowned with success. Certainly those who prophesied at the periods to which I allude that those effects would not follow have had their fears amply justified by the result. I think it a great misfortune for Ireland that the hopes which then actuated those who were pleading the cause of the Catholics, and the promises which they made, have not been fulfilled. Those who are now advocating the disestablishment of the Protestant Church in Ireland do not hold the opinions of Plunket, Blake, and Peel, or of the Roman Catholic prelates, or of the Canonists of Maynooth, who said that the title of the Established Church in Ireland would be recognized by Rome itself, which only requires a prescription of 100 years, while the Protestant Church in Ireland has lasted for 300 years. I am bound to say that on this occasion we are not in danger of being led away by promises, for no promises are held out that what we are asked to do will in any way tend to the pacification of Ireland, or that it is to be more than a step to new domands. It is true that in speeches in this House something of that kind may be said ; but those for whose benefit the property of the Church is to be taken away are holding out no promises. They are not saying that they have not in reserve a demand for concessions which they regard as of much greater importance and magnitude. Those “ calm men of Limerick,” to whom the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe) alluded a few nights ago, say that they do not believe anything will do justice to the feelings of the people of Ireland except a repeal of the Union, committing Irish interests to an Irish Parliament in Dublin. My hon. Friend the Member for Honiton (Mr. B. Cochrane), in his speech last night, quoted a remarkable passage, which I am afraid was not heard by as many as ought to have heard it, because it shows that the persons who are agitating for tenant-right in Ireland put aside the Church altogether as a grievance. At a meeting of the Meath Tenant-right Society, of which the Bishop and the Roman Catholic Vicar-General are members, this statement was put forward, the Vicar-General presiding on the occasion—

“ The one, the great, the sole question for Ireland is the land question. Other agitations, such as that against the Established Church, got up for party purposes, would infuse an element of bigotry into the already disturbed relations of landlord and tenant, would effect the ruin of thousands of tenants, and precipitate that social catastrophe which we are anxious to avert.”

And yet we are told that by holding out this olive branch to the Irish people we are doing all that is required ; whilst Lord Russell has thrown the land question over as unworthy of his consideration, and bids us bestow on the Roman Catholic people of Ireland what they themselves regard as a concession of infinite insignificance. [“ No, no ! ”] Well, Sir, I now come to an important question, one which is not solved by the Resolutions of the right hon. Gentleman, and of which in his speech he offered us no solution, and without an answer to which, I say, we cannot fairly and honestly vote on these Resolutions. It is essentially necessary that we should know the whole of the scheme that is to be proposed. Are you, or are you not, going to secularize the revenues of the Established Church in Ireland ? If you are going to secularize them, to what do you propose to apply them ? We have been told over and over again that if there is any one in these days who objects on principle to such secularizing he is rather to be pitied. The right hon. Gentleman said he had a sort of sympathy with such a feeling, he pitied such a weakness, but it was one that he could not countenance. Sir, it was a feeling of a distinguished colleague of the right hon. Gentleman, expressed in most solid and effective terms. Sir James Graham ended a great speech on the subject in language very strong and very decided; and he declared that he had that feeling of weakness which the right hon. Gentleman pities. Sir James Graham, in the speech to which I refer—[An hon. MEMBER: The date?]—used this language. The date is 1834; but I am not aware that in any subsequent speech he qualified it, or I should not now quote it. He said—

“The Church property was set apart by the duty of our forefathers, whether in England or Ireland, to maintain and propagate the Christian religion, and I tell you it is sacred and must be applied to that purpose: Those who minister at the altar shall live by the altar; this decree is as high as Heaven; you cannot take it away. It is as strong as the Almighty; you cannot overthrow it. It is lasting as the Eternal; it can never cease to bind you. It is binding on you as Christian legislators and as Christian men, and, for one, there is no consideration on earth which shall induce me to compromise or violate it.”

I can quite understand that some hon. gentlemen will condemn the weakness of feeling of Sir James Graham; but I am content to feel with him, and to express the opinion which he expressed, and to avow that there is in this secularization of church property something inconsistent with the sacred uses to which it has been dedicated. I might also quote Lord Brougham who has also expressed a strong opinion upon the subject—namely, that not a farthing of the money of the Church should be diverted to other purposes until sufficient had been taken for the purposes of the Church, and then it should only be taken for Church education; and, above all, on no consideration on earth would he give one farthing of it to assist the Roman Catholics. The right hon. Gentleman has, to a certain extent, revealed his plan, and he tells us that his mode would be to deal very tenderly with the question, and that he thinks no one will be at all aggrieved by the glebes, parsonage houses, and the churches being left in the possession of the Protestant clergy of Ireland. So, at least, I understood him to say. Now, I want to know whether you are going to provide glebes and parsonages for any other clergy? Do you mean, for instance, to build parsonages for the Presbyterians, the Roman Catholics, or any other denomination in Ireland? I ask this, because I find it is put forward in a pamphlet by an Irish Roman Catholic Member of Parliament (who may be now in the House) that, so far from the right hon. Gentleman's plan giving satisfaction, it would give the greatest dissatisfaction. According to this Gentleman, so far from it being a prudent thing to leave the glebe houses in the hands of the Protestant clergy, without providing them for the Roman Catholics also, nothing could be more irritating and vexatious. He says—

“Now, if there is one fact more than another which in the eyes of the Irish people at large exemplifies the evil of ecclesiastical inequality, it is the difference between the glebe house and land of the Anglican minister and the humble and often wretched habitation of their priest. This is a palpable, tangible fact. It is one which, even if the Anglican Church were disendowed to-morrow, would, until rectified, still evidence a contrast calculated to provoke discontent and irritation.”

The right hon. Gentleman, in his speech in 1865, said he thought it was essential in any well-considered measure—and nothing but a well-considered measure should be brought before Parliament—that they should arrive at the conclusion whether the Church property should be applied one way or the other. Now, I ask whether these Resolutions give us any hint on this subject? Have we anything to guide us in the slightest degree as to what is to become of this money? Many hon. Members agree that it is badly applied at present. Be it so; but there are worse purposes to which it may be applied, and probably many others will consider that, until they know to what uses it is to be applied, there is no scheme before them upon which they can be fairly and honestly called to vote. The right hon. Gentleman says also that to show that he is in earnest, he proposes immediate legislation upon the subject. Now, let us see what kind of legislation it is to be. It is not to be legislation to settle the question, but legislation to stay the hands of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners and of patrons of public livings, so that there may be a suspension of everything in Ireland till the next Parliament has met. I believe that is a correct statement of what fell from the right hon. Gentleman. Now, I want to know whether, when we are told that we are not to conclude this question, we are really to decide it practically, by suspending the whole process of the Church in Ireland, and all that is going on there, for several months before next Session, and then to say that we have not in the least prejudiced the question? Why, if there can be any prejudgment it is by adopting a course which will render necessary the repeal of an Act of Parliament in order to set things in motion. And how is the time to be found during this Session to discuss a Bill which, unlike a Resolution, must pass through a first and second reading, be considered in Committee of the Whole House, and be then read a third time? This is the way in which great questions are generally treated, and in which they always ought to be treated. The right hon. Gentleman says that nothing can be so bad as an abstract Resolution; and I will defy anyone to show that the first of the right hon. Gentleman's Resolutions is anything but an abstract Resolution. I want, therefore, to know, if the other House of Parliament is also to be tested on the Resolutions, in order to ascertain what prospects there are of obtaining their assent to such a Bill; or is this House to usurp the whole power of expressing the opinions of and guiding both branches of the Legislature? In that case it would be an unconstitutional proceeding, and if you are to pass Resolutions of this kind and Addresses to the Crown, they ought to be joint Resolutions and joint Addresses of both Houses. The main question after all is, "What are you going to do with the funds of the Irish Church?" And until we have an answer to it you have no right to get together a number of persons to vote on one side of the question without any idea of the principles that are to guide them hereafter. The hon. Member for Westminster (Mr. Stuart Mill) has his scheme, and would apply the funds to unsectarian education. But, I would ask, is that the way to conciliate the Roman Catholics of Ireland? If there is one thing which they have been setting their faces against more than another it is unsectarian education. The right hon. Gentleman told us yesterday that it was not to be endured that the tithes of Connaught should be taken and applied for the benefit of Churchmen in Ulster; but I want to know whether it is to be endured that the tithes of Connaught are to be applied to the building of lighthouses near Dublin or anywhere else, and whether when improvements are made the funds are to be applied for Irish purposes generally, or expended in the locality whence they are derived? If the funds are to be taken in order to supply the wants of the people of Ireland generally, such a plan will be quite as inconsistent with the right hon. Gentleman's powers of endurance as the application of the tithes of Connaught for the benefit of the Churchmen of Ulster. This is not a separate property, and does not belong to the people of Connaught in particular. It belongs neither to the landlord nor to the tenant, but to the laity of Ireland; and if it is for the improvement of their religious instruction, I say it may fairly be taken and applied in any part of Ireland where it may be wanted. I pass by Earl Russell's scheme of distribution, which no one is ready to adopt, and which the noble Lord himself condemned with such great effect very recently before he adopted it. We might, therefore, rely on his condemnation as sufficient for our purpose. The hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright), as I understand it, would leave something to the Church, though he would take away a good deal and secularize it; but he has not told us what particular mode of procedure he would recommend. We do not know, therefore, in what way the money is to be dealt with. That there is to be an unsettlement of everything is clear, and it is also clear that there is to be a settlement of nothing. You say that this is a sentimental grievance, and I, for one, do not assert that the circumstance of a grievance being sentimental is not enough to cause persons to resent it; but I maintain that, when you have a sentimental grievance on the one side, and are going to make a more than sentimental grievance on the other, it is only fair and just that the persons on whom you are going to make the experiment should know what is to be the destination of the funds of which you are about to despoil them. But I am told, of all things, that it is not legitimate to say in this debate that the question of the Irish Church affects the stability of the English and Scotch Churches. I can quite understand that there are those who are, like the mother in her extremity, who threw away her children to save herself from the devouring wolf; but, at the same time, I do not remember that incident to have been regarded as a very happy instance of maternal feeling. The course taken by that selfish mother does not commend itself to those who feel themselves bound to Ireland by sympathy and the ties of blood and religion. I am not so disposed to row her overboard; and I am still less disposed to do so when a course is taken which affects—and materially affects—the principles upon which the Church Establishment rests in the sister country; for, whatever may be said, the main arguments which have been used by the right hon. Gentleman and hon. Members who sit below the Gangway, and with perfect consistency by the latter, in support of these Resolutions, are in favour of religious equality. Now, religious equality I do not understand, either in principle or practice, to apply to only one part of the Empire. I say, therefore, it is not unreasonable in us to object, if you are going to touch each part of our Church, that on that principle you are, in fact, touching the whole, and upsetting the grounds upon which alone the Establishments of the country—Church and State—can be defended. If it is necessary for religious equality that there shall be no endowments or privileges accorded to the ministers of the Established Church, then I understand the argument. It is the voluntary system—simple and fair, and one fairly to be defended and argued; but you cannot justly put forward religious equality when you are only going to apply the principle to a small part of the Empire. What will be gained by this great sacrifice of principles in our parts if we are to accede to it? You have promised us nothing, and you have brought nothing before us to justify such a sacrifice; but if you can show that at this dear rate you can bring perfect harmony and concord in every part of our dominions, Heaven knows how many sacrifices—how many sacrifices of a deeper nature everybody would be ready to make to obtain so desirable an object. If justice required that we should give up those things on which our hearts are set—that the interests of the whole country required—and there was before us a certainty of obtaining that which we all desire, then there would be reasons for renouncing opinion, and I, for one, if I could not assent, would at least withdraw out of my way and let others try this measure for the benefit of the country.

Mr. Gathorne Hardy

But when I do not see that the desired end would be attained, I then continue advocating on this side of the House the principles which I advocated from the opposite side; and if changes in those principles are to be made it shall not be by my hand that the stab shall be given, and not from these Benches that the change shall be made. I will leave to others to effect purposes which I may no longer be able to resist. Well, Sir, what is the great emergency that has arisen calling on us to make these enormous sacrifices, which, likewise, if we had made, we should have been taunted for making them on an occasion which did not require it to be done? Is it the miserable Fenianism that has prevailed in this country, or the base Fenianism in Ireland, spoken of the other night, calling on us to make this sacrifice of our time, of our duty, of all that is dear to us, in order to get rid of what would not be affected by it for a moment? Is it the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act? We have had the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act for many years. Has it interfered practically with the liberties of Ireland in the way it has been used? Has it interfered with the ordinary progress of business? Has it interfered with religious freedom? Has it interfered with ordinary freedom of intercourse? Has it not rather been used in emergencies, in order to give greater security to the real freedom of Ireland, by checking that which is lawless and upholding real loyalty and liberty? If you are to take this ground you will only be adding another to the right hon. Gentleman's list of dates which were last night cited to prove the imbecility and weakness of the English Parliament—its injustice, its unfairness, its readiness to do wrong so long as the wrong could be done with impunity; and he told us that up to the present time we had abstained from doing justice to Ireland, but now these things must be swept away, and he threw it in the teeth of Parliament that it had never done an act of justice to Ireland without having been compelled to do so. That, I think, is one of the disgraces of Parliament, which ought not to be recorded as a merit, or held up as an example to be followed on the present occasion. Well, I think I have shown that the present is not a fitting time at which such a change, if it were necessary, should be made; and I state boldly that nothing which has been put forward by the right hon. Gentleman is sufficient to convince the House that the people of this country repose any confidence in the views of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire on this question. Surely, then, the people ought to be consulted before such a change is made. I further say that the first Resolution, if you should pass it, is not binding on the Parliament to which it will pass on from the Journals of this House. I say that if you throw aside a compact, a statute made as a treaty, and say, "that is not to bind Parliament," how can you say that this Resolution, passed by a dying Parliament, is to bind its successor? You are putting this branch of the Legislature in an undue position. There is a complaint that the House of Lords has nothing to do. The reason is because you will not test its power to work. But it is an Assembly equal to this; and when you are calling upon us to proceed upon this dangerous and revolutionary path—for so it was called by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Morpeth (Sir George Grey)—you ought, at all events, to call into council that branch of the Legislature without which you cannot legislate. Again, I say, suppose you carry the Resolution, you do not show us the object in view or that you obtain the peace of Ireland. On the contrary, you would increase many of her evils. You complain of absenteeism; well, by the adoption of your scheme, I believe that you would increase it, and cause it to extend among the landlords as well as the clergy. [Laughter.] In answer to that laugh, I may observe that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire admitted that in all great emergencies the clergy in Ireland had been found at the bedside of the sick and in the cottages of the poor. I believe that the charities of Ireland owe more to the clergy than to any other class of the community. We have been asked what course we intend to take upon this question. In the first place, if, in spite of the objection that we have taken, I believe justly, to the Resolutions of the right hon. Gentleman, you succeed in overthrowing the Amendment, our course is clear. We shall oppose the Resolutions themselves. If you ask what we would do—not in this Parliament, because it would have no opportunity of doing anything in the matter—but in the next Parliament, in the event of the Resolutions being carried, my reply is that I will give the right hon. Gentleman no other pledge than this—that we will act in accordance with the former part of the Amendment, and if, on the Report of the Commission, we are satisfied that it would be for the benefit of the Irish Church that certain modifications in it should be made, we will make them with a fearless hand. But if you ask us to go further, I will say, at least for myself, as I have upon former occasions, that I will not be a party to a measure for disestab-lishing the Irish Church. I am not prepared to sever Ireland from England in religious matters, and present the spectacle of a Government in Ireland of a purely secular character, and a Government in England partially religious. [A laugh.] My form of expression is not, I am aware, as perfect as I could wish; but what I meant to say was, that I will not consent to the anomaly that Church and State should be dissevered in Ireland and remain connected in England. The right hon. Gentleman said that the disestablishment of the Irish Church would, as respected the Irish people, "Pluck from the memory a rooted sorrow; Raze out the written troubles of the brain;" but he quite omitted to quote the preceding line, "Can'st thou not minister to a mind diseased?" It is the mind of Ireland that is diseased—a disease caused by a long traditionary hatred of the Saxon, and kept alive by constant agitation and misrepresentation. It is thus you have, as I believe, diseased the kindly and generous mind of Ireland, which, but for that pernicious agitation, I believe would have been in harmony with us at the present moment. The drug, however, which the right hon. Gentleman proposes to administer would not be a "sweet oblivious antidote," to appease the distempered mind of the disloyal, who would rather ask for some "purgative to scour these English hence." The measure proposed by the right hon. Gentleman would not tend in any degree to the desired end—to conciliate those who first of all told them that the land question was to be settled on a basis and in a way to which the present Parliament would never assent, and that in the end there is to be a repeal of that Union the inviolable and fundamental basis of which was the United Church of England and Ireland. I have looked through the speeches that have been made in this House for a statement of the specific wrongs—wrongs which call for specific remedies; I have looked in vain to find to whom you are to give these funds which you are going to take away from those now in possession of them. I have looked in vain for any statement in former debates or in this which will lead me to a conclusion upon this vital question. I say your Resolutions are founded on principles repugnant to, and far away from, the theory and the practice of the Constitution of the country, and will be provocative of strife, of enmity and of dissension, instead of paving the way for peace and harmony between England and Ireland. If they conciliate one party, they will irritate another; and, although I will never believe that the Protestants of Ireland will become disloyal, yet there can be no doubt that will excite among them discontent and disaffection, there will be the injustice which is done them which must in the end react upon England. I feel bound, where no wrong has been done in the use of property by those to whom it belongs, to protest against the spoliation of it. I feel doubly bound, both as a just man and as an Englishman, to be true to the compact which is in force between the two countries. As a Churchman I cannot be indifferent to the condition of my brethren in the Faith in Ireland. I cannot be indifferent to the clergy who so zealously and so effectually have performed their duties in that country. To that fact I call to witness those Gentlemen who are the most opposed to the old endowments. I cannot be a party to sever that union between Church and State under which it is the glory and the privilege of the State to uphold the light of the Reformation in Ireland.

Mr. Gathorne Hardy

MR. GOSCHEN thanked the right hon. Gentleman for the speech he had just delivered, and the party opposite for the manner in which it had been cheered, because they could now understand the construction put by the Conservative party on the Amendment. He recognized the true Conservative accents in the speech of the Home Secretary, so different from that of the noble Lord who moved the Amendment. Which interpretation were they to place upon that Amendment—that of the noble Lord or the right hon. Member for Oxford University? They knew very well what “considerable modifications” meant. They meant—not any reformation in the Irish Church, that would do justice to Ireland, in the sense the Liberal party understood it. They were to be modifications within the Church itself. If that was so, why was the fact not stated on the face of the Amendment, so that every one could understand it?—that, while the Government thought they might make a certain redistribution of revenues, they would not touch the question of disestablishment or disendowment? The right hon. Gentleman was so eloquent at the end of his speech, he uttered sentiments so noble, that he was loth to recur to the recriminations of his right hon. Friend, in which he indulged at the commencement. It was, indeed, a curious phase in political vicissitudes that it should have fallen to the lot of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford to speak of the sudden conversion of his right hon. Friend (Mr. Gladstone). And how did he prove the rapidity of that conversion? He brought forward letters which had been published in newspapers. He referred to anonymous communications. [“No, no!”] Then let them have names. He (Mr. Goschen) called communications anonymous which had no name appended to them. To the public at least the letter was anonymous. But if the right hon. Gentleman wanted to know what were his right hon. Friend’s sentiments in 1865, why had he not turned to the debate? Why did he not refer to the remarks of the right hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Whiteside)? He would then clearly have seen what were the views of his right hon. Friend in regard to the Irish Church. In the letter attributed to his right hon. Friend it was stated that the question of the Irish Church was remote from the policy of the day. Did the right hon. Gentleman consider that three years ago the question of household suffrage was remote from the question of the day? He thought that accusations of inconsistency came rather awkwardly from the right hon. Gentleman. But he would not dwell upon this. There was one remark which fell from the right hon. Gentleman that would be received with pleasure on that side of the House. He said, if the question of justice to Ireland could be made out, if that were really at stake, he would have to consider whether he should not be obliged to surrender cherished convictions, and, in spite of the Church to which he belonged, to do justice to Ireland. This was the plea of those who sat on that side of the House. Justice required this to be done. It was no use to speak of dangers to other communities. Justice must be done in this matter to Ireland by the Imperial Parliament. The right hon. Gentleman spoke of the price that was to be paid. It was not a question of price, but of justice. If it was just to Ireland that the Irish Church should be disestablished, then it was impossible he should speak of price. The right hon. Gentleman had entirely abandoned the line of argument adopted last night. He repeated the usual arguments in favour of an Established Church—vested interests, the Act of Union, danger to the Church in England, and the ani-

Mr. Gathorne Hardy

mony of the Orangemen in Ireland. It was said the Treaty of Union deprived us of the right to deal with the question of the Established Church of Ireland. How could this be? The Act of Union last year was called a compact between two nations; but what if both agreed to a revision of their compact? It was the majority of the people in England who wished to revise the Act of Union as regarded the Established Church of Ireland; and who opposed it? One branch of the people alone — the Protestants in Ireland. Did the right hon. Gentleman mean to maintain the Act of Union? The 4th Article had been dealt with again and again, and why should not the 5th be also dealt with? Then, as to vested rights, the right hon. Gentleman attempted to prove that not only the clergy but the laity had vested interests in the revenues of the Irish Church. What were those vested rights? They were no more vested rights than were those rights with which right hon. Gentleman opposite had dealt over and over again. Did they remember the action of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners? Did they forget the action of the Government itself in regard to the public schools? This property was the property of the State, and Parliament retained the full right to deal with it. The title of the Irish Church to most of its revenues was a Parliamentary title only, and Parliament had a right to deal with it. The right hon. Gentleman spoke of secularizing the property of the Church; but they had already secularized a portion of its revenues by putting 25 per cent of the tithe into the pockets of the landlords. The right hon. Gentleman shifted his ground to suit his convenience. His whole argument was untenable. The Church of Ireland was a Parliamentary Church, like the Church of England, and Parliament had a right to deal with it. There was another argument to which he had listened with great surprise. It was this—that the Church of England might possibly suffer through the action we might take in regard to that of Ireland. He must admit with regret that such an argument was not only pusillanimous on the part of English Churchmen, but was also immoral. Nothing could be more unjust than for England to say to Ireland, "In order to preserve our Church we will refuse you yours." What was the object of the letter which had been written by the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury? It was simply an invitation to the clergy of England to preach to their flocks against encouraging justice being done to Ireland. ["Oh, Oh!"] Was not the impression such a letter was likely to make upon the minds of the clergy that their interests were bound up in those of the Irish Church. Was not its object to appeal to religion to the prejudice of justice? These were the only results that could flow from an attempt to tie up the questions of the English and the Irish Churches together. For his own part he did not believe that the English Church was in danger; but, even assuming that it were, what would the Irish people say of a Union which enabled the argument to be used that, for fear we in England might suffer, we should refuse to do justice to Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman alluded to the effect that any Motion of this kind might have upon the Protestants of Ireland, and he pointed out very accurately and graphically that, when the House began to touch any part of a nation on its religious side, they were sure to raise feelings with which it was difficult to deal. The fact was, that the grievances which touched the religious sentiments of a people were always most serious, and it was for that reason that they were now endeavouring to deal with the question of the Irish Church Establishment. The right hon. Gentleman, while declaring that the grievance of the Irish people in this matter was only a sentimental one, acknowledged its gravity. But he wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether any of those sentimental grievances existed in England or in Scotland as well as in Ireland? Was not the grievance of the Irish people in this respect greater than that of England was with regard to the church rates with which that House had just dealt? Why, in Scotland even so small a matter as the Annuity Tax had raised a storm that it was difficult to quell, and yet hon. Members were surprised that Ireland should feel strongly upon this question. The right hon. Gentleman said that, supposing that House should consent to the disestablishment of the Irish Church, they had no guarantee that Ireland would be pacified by the sacrifice. But the question was not whether Ireland would or would not be pacified by the sacrifice, but whether it was the duty of England to make it. In his opinion, however, the disestablishment of the Irish Church would be no small step towards the pacification of that country. Would not the fact of England ing an act of justice have a good effect upon the minds of the Irish people? And that country no representatives in that House who could appreciate such an act of conciliation? The right hon. Gentleman objected to the time when this Motion was brought forward, and had pleaded delay; but why was it that this question had not been dealt with before? It was because of the opposition of the Conservative party, who were too strong to allow the Liberals to carry any measure which they might have introduced with a view of settling this question. But that the Conservative party occupied the Benches on the other side of the House, the right hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench sat there more or less to do the work of the Liberal party. When they were in Opposition it was impossible to carry great measures of this kind, because such questions could seldom be settled when there was but a slight difference in the numerical strength of parties. If the Conservative party were at that moment to come forward with a policy for Ireland worthy of the name, they would meet with the hearty co-operation of the Liberal party. The right hon. Gentleman asked why this question was forced on at the present moment. It was because Her Majesty's Government had made it necessary to deal with this subject by coming forward with a policy for Ireland which was, in point of fact, no policy at all, and had thrown out a challenge to the Liberal party. Had not the Liberal party accepted the challenge, depend upon it that the Conservative Members would not have permitted it to pass unnoticed. He was glad to hear that night from the right hon. Gentleman that he had abandoned the theory that this question could not be dealt with by a moribund Parliament which, if he was mistaken, was started by the Prime Minister.

MR. DISRAELI: You are mistaken.

MR. GOSCHEN: Not moribund?

MR. DISRAELI: Not moribund.

MR. GOSCHEN said, he was glad that the Parliament had been declared competent to entertain this question, and hoped that the Conservative press would take notice of that declaration, and would leave it saying that the Parliament was not competent to deal with the question. In his opinion, the House was quite competent to deal with the subject, and it was most important that they should do so without further delay. The right hon.

Mr. Goschen

Gentleman asked whether they were to pledge their successors; but the real question was, did they wish to pledge themselves upon this question? Was it not important that public opinion should ripen upon this subject? If Her Majesty's Government would only lend the Liberal party some assistance the question might be easily settled; it was the will and not time that was wanting. The right hon. Gentleman spoke of the action that the other House might take; but it would merely have an opportunity of expressing an opinion upon the question. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire explained that, before the Irish Church could be dealt with, a Bill must be introduced into Parliament, and must pass successively through all the usual stages, and that the introduction of such a Bill must be preceded by an Address to the Crown upon the subject. The question would be amply discussed, and there would be every opportunity offered for either of the two great parties, and for individual Members, to pledge themselves either for or against the principle of such a Bill. He was not aware what opinion the right hon. Gentleman held with respect to the continuity of such promises; but he was convinced that any action taken by the present Parliament would not fail to have an influence, and a very strong influence, upon the new Parliament. He did not see why they should be so tender of the feelings of the next Parliament, nor why they should be so frightened of hampering them by any action they might take in this matter. It was difficult for the House to comprehend the policy of Her Majesty's Government, although they had certainly heard the negative portion of it announced that night. It was evident from the statement of the right hon. Gentleman that nothing was intended to be done. Were not the words of the noble Lord's Amendment, proposing to defer all action until after the conclusion of the pending inquiry, sufficient of themselves to condemn the Government policy? What necessity was there to inquire further to arrive at a conclusion one way or another, whether the Irish Church ought to be abolished, although it might be necessary, before the details of any plan for dealing with the Irish Church could be determined upon? The reproach that the Opposition had not shown their hands enough came curiously from the Government. Why did not they show their hands? Why were the Opposition to bring forward their measure now?

The noble Lord the Chief Secretary for Ireland made use of some extraordinary phrases ; he talked about the degradation of the English Church in Ireland, and said the policy of the Government was not to degrade, but to produce equality by elevation. Nothing had escaped from Ministers to throw the slightest light on that oracular statement. It was important the country should know what it meant. Did it mean anything ? Did it mean the endowment of the Roman Catholic clergy ? The official representative of the Irish Government said the policy of the Government was to level upwards. Could anything be more natural or necessary than that the Opposition should bring forward a counter policy and say that the Church of England in Ireland ought to cease to exist as an Establishment ? He (Mr. Goschen) objected altogether to what was said by the noble Lord as to the degradation of the Church. The Establishment would not necessarily be degraded if disendowed and disestablished. He rejected the theory that this was degradation ; it was far more elevating that a Church should stand on its own basis where it was in a minority. Disestablishment would strengthen rather than weaken the Church of England in Ireland. We had no right to treat this question according to our private views of what we wished to be. We had only to ask what was just and right, and no time could be too early to do that. That sufficient Votes in Supply had not been taken was no reason for delay. The pacification of Ireland and the additional strength Government would derive from it would amply compensate for any inconvenience resulting from a little delay. The argument of time entirely broke down ; and the right hon. Member for the Oxford University (Mr. G. Hardy) did not attach much importance to it ; indeed, he wished to fight this matter on its merits ; and it was upon its merits that the Liberal party would be prepared to deal with it.

MR. PEEL DAWSON said, that as this was not the first occasion on which he had addressed the House on the subject, and as his general opinions upon it were well known, he would not speak at any length, or be the means of preventing other hon. Members who might not have had the same opportunities as himself from expressing their sentiments upon this all-important question of national interest. His intentions were, as heretofore, to support those ecclesiastical institutions in Ireland which had so long existed as connecting links between the two countries, and which could not be dissolved without the possibility, nay, to his mind, the certainty, of universal disaster. If we allowed all prescriptive rights to property, which had been sanctioned by a duration of more than 300 years, to be swept away at the instance of political caprice, and to suit the exigencies of a party struggling for office, what security could there be for property of all other descriptions ? Was it fair and just to the descendants of men who undertook as it were to colonize Ireland for the purpose of assisting to promote British interests ? If it had not been for the supposed security of the Protestant religion under the full guarantee of the whole power of England, the emigration of English and Scotch settlers in the seventeenth century would not have taken place, and we should not have possessed in the population of Ireland that loyal element which desired to remain British in allegiance to the Crown, in legislative union, and in the profession of the same religious creed. The Protestants in Ireland, and in the northern provinces especially, would feel deeply the proposed infringement of what they had a right to assume was their recognized position. Let the House remember they had always been the best friends of this country in all periods of danger and difficulty. The English Church had been built up at British instigation, and its friends objected to the sudden reversal of the policy of centuries, which alone had maintained in Ireland the germ of a friendly connection with this country. In dealing with a purely Irish question upon party grounds the Parliament of the United Kingdom was assuming a vast responsibility, and that at a time particularly inopportune, because its days were numbered, and any solution it could arrive at could not in any way be considered permanent. Why, therefore, should the peace of Ireland be prematurely endangered ? Why should man be set against man, when disaffection was rampant and stalking through the country ? Was it to be done merely because it suited parties to raise the hustings' cry of religious equality, which in this case meant nothing more than pulling down one form of religion in order to establish another ? No doubt such an intention would be disavowed in that House ; but the matter was easily understood in Ireland, and the object was scarcely denied or contradicted in certain circles of society. The Irish re naturally a religious people, and they could not long permit the absence of a State recognition of religion. They might without it for a few years; but he felt certain that the disestablishment of the Protestant Church there would inevitably be followed by a vigorous and unscrupulous struggle to raise up another ecclesiastical establishment on its ruins. As a resident in the country, and one strongly interested in the internal order and prosperity of the country, he at once admitted that he would refuse, in a further reformed and new Parliament, to consider and accept certain modifications with regard to the position of the three chief Churches existing in Ireland. He would desire to see a satisfactory arrangement made by the State for adequately endowing the Roman Catholic Church, and liberally increasing the Grant to the Presbyterian Churches, so that the members of each religion in Ireland might be placed in a more suitable and, at the same time, in a more thoroughly independent position. This, however, should be done without any infringement upon the endowments of the Episcopal Church in Ireland. In his opinion, and that of the people among whom he lived, her revenues belonged to herself, being derived, as they were in a great measure, from individual benefactions, after being confirmed and ratified by repeated Acts of Parliament. A halfpenny in the pound of additional income-tax, if properly distributed, would place every officer of religion belonging to the Roman Catholic and Presbyterian Churches in Ireland in a suitable and proper pecuniary position. If England was in earnest in the promises of good-will she had been lavishly making for the pacification of Ireland, he would suggest that this aid should be spontaneously offered, feeling sure that it would be gratefully and advantageously accepted. All parties seemed agreed that Ireland's great grievance was proprietary absenteeism, and would not that be greatly increased and aggravated by any weakening of the Protestant Church? We had been trying to induce the landowner to reside upon his estate; would he be more inclined to do so if we destroyed his Church and deprived him of the comfort and consolation derived from the presence of his clergyman? Common sense and reason forbade, and he maintained that it would be impossible, in many rural and sparsely-populated districts to keep up even the semblance of a Protestant place of worship if voluntary contributions were solely to be depended upon. The social condition of the Protestant clergyman must be deteriorated, and in the present condition of Ireland that must be considered not a social evil only, but would be a national calamity. A compilation of figures had been made one of the groundworks of the argument in favour of the Resolutions; but how fallacious must it be when the whole population of Ireland had been for years retrograding. The loss to the Roman Catholic Church had been reckoned at one-third, whilst the loss to the Protestant Church, from emigration and other causes, had been less than one-fifth. He maintained that the position of the Church was now stronger, because more efficient, than at any anterior period. The clergy were almost universally resident, and pluralities had been almost entirely abolished; and until this question had been recently disinterred from the oblivion in which, happily, it had rested, there was no disposition amongst the people of Ireland to re-open the question of religious endowment. But there was yet an additional fact which ought not to be forgotten in England. He was one of the last persons who would desire to widen the breach of religious asperity, or make invidious or sectarian comparisons; but when a subject which involved the future peace of Ireland was discussed, was it possible to overlook the fact of the vast amount of industry and energy which characterized Protestant Ulster as contradistinguished from the misery and disaffection which abounded in the Southern and Western districts. Which class of the population cost the Imperial Exchequer most? In the Protestant North there were few soldiers and fewer police—not amounting to one-third of the available force stationed in the South and West. Was it possible to deny that this superior prosperity, order, and morality were attributable to the influence of the two Protestant Churches? He could assert that from the day they undermined the loyalty of the Protestant population in Ireland by alienating their affections—as they would do by passing the Resolutions before the House—they might date a change in the Government of the country which he feared would prove not only overwhelming, but also insurmountable.

Mr. Peel Dawson

MR. M'CULLAGH TORRENS said: Sir, fault has been found with the speech of the noble Lord who moved this Amendment for want of candour. But candour is of two kinds—that which is articulate and that which is mute; and there is a silence which is more significant than any speech. The noble Lord uttered some admissions for which we ought to be obliged to him. He confessed that no man could stand up with grave face and say that this question of the Irish Church would not be the first debated in the new Parliament ; that he did not think anyone would deny the scandal of the present condition of things ; and that the question was not whether anything should be done, but what ought to be done? I am not surprised that these admissions should be rather too much for the noble Lord the Member for Stamford (Viscount Cranborne) ; but on this side of the House we received them as promissory notes at twelve months, payment of which is certain to be demanded when they are due. Meanwhile, the noble Lord asks for time, that his party may arrange their affairs ; and his critics call this covering his intentions with a thick veil of reticence. But enough of the veil has been raised to show us what is behind. The noble Lord gives up sectarian ascendancy. He is even half inclined to abandon the principle of Establishment, which he calls little more than an empty title. But I agree with the noble Lord (Viscount Cranborne) that the principle of an Establishment is anything but "an empty sound." Misused as it has been in Ireland for three centuries, it has been the ever intermittent tocsin of civil feuds ; and it is just because it is not an empty title that we wish to see it brought to an end. But I am bound to go somewhat further on this point, and to say plainly that if the Resolutions of the right hon. Gentleman committed us to disestablishment without disendowment, I, for one, could not vote for them. He has himself disclaimed any such intention in terms free of all ambiguity. The scheme for endowing all sects, while establishing none, in the hope of thereby directly or indirectly obtaining a controlling influence over the minds of men, is based upon notions of Government fit for a commissioner of police, but wholly unworthy of a statesman. That which gives dignity and grandeur to the principle of endowment is Establishment. It is policy in partnership with religion. The partnership may be ill-advised, or it may not ; when unsuitable as in Ireland, it works ill and ends in failure. Elsewhere the union of Church and State has a different aspect. But why does it not work satisfactorily in Ireland? Because the Establishment does not represent the preponderant wealth, intelligence, or worth of the community ; because from the beginning it has been, in the words of the Prime Minister, "an alien Church." Bishop Mant has this remarkable expression in his well-known history of that Church, of which he was himself a prelate, that the first step taken in the Reformation in Ireland, was the sending over Brown to be Archbishop of Dublin. Three-and-twenty Archbishops have succeeded him in the metropolitan see ; and of these, sixteen have been Englishmen, but seven Irishmen. In the same period twenty-two prelates have filled the primacy, of whom I find that there have been Englishmen sixteen, Irishmen but six ; and yet you call this a national Church. What manner of men these have chiefly been, and to what class they belonged, I shall have a word to say by-and-by. What I contend for is, that the representative character of an Establishment, that which can only dignify and justify the connection of Church and State, never belonged to the ecclesiastical institution which you imposed on Ireland ; and it is demonstrable that, in point of fact, that institution was used systematically, generation after generation, as a draw farm whereon to fatten needy members of governing families in this country, and in Ireland, or their immediate dependents. Take the primacy in the last four reigns. It was held for thirty years by Lord Rokeby, who made the fortune of his family out of its revenues. It was next given to a younger son of Lord Bute. At his death it was conferred on Lord John George Beresford ; and upon his decease in 1862, another member of the noble family of Waterford was raised to the primatial see. In 1768 a man was promoted to the rich diocese of Derry, of whom it is impossible to speak even now with the reticence of contempt — I mean Lord Bristol. Facts might be mentioned regarding him, paralleled only in the annals of the reprobate clergy of France before the Revolution. Lord Bristol was succeeded by a relative of Lord Ranfurly ; and he was in time followed in the see, which was then regarded as, in point of emoluments, the counterpart of un-reduced Durham, by Dr. Ponsonby, the brother of an Irish Nobleman, and the brother-in-law of the late Earl Grey. I will only instance one other diocese, that of Tuam, the population of which has always been in an overwhelming portion Catholic, and which for more than a century has, in unbroken succession, been used by the Governments of the day, whatever their party principles may have en to confer fortune and the honours of e spiritual Peerage on members of noble families. The present Bishop is the brother Lord Bandon; the late Bishop was Lord Lunnet; his predecessor was the brother the Earl of Clancarty; his predecessor as one of the richly endowed house of resford; and his predecessor was an anstor of the noble Lord the present Secrery for Ireland, son of a former Bishop of aterford, and himself an Irish Peer. And hat is the present condition of the Irish iscopal Bench? Out of twelve prelates, no, at the present hour, bear ecclesiasal rule in that country, both the Arch-shops and four of their suffragans are her Peers or the immediate relatives of oblemens. Can this then be called the urch of the nation? Or can it be con-nded with any show of reason or truth at, in the sense in which the Church in ngland is representative of the talent, arning, worth, and piety of the commuty in general, the Anglican Establishment the sister country is a national Church.

 or myself, I should be sorry if even inadrtently any word should fall from me dis-raging of the character of the working ergy of that Church, whom, as a body, I lieve to be exemplary, useful, and acmplished men. I am sure that nothing n be further from my intention than to ter a disrespectful word of the Liturgy the tenets of a Communion, in which e numbered all who have been and who e most dear to me in life, and of which, ough an humble, I have always been a ncere member. But I speak not at second nd but of personal knowledge, when I y that Anglican Protestantism in Irend—all that is most vital and influential r good in that system of religious teach-g depends, as it has long depended, not on the legal Establishment maintained its support by law, but upon the volun-ry sympathy and support of those who ue its consolations; and my firm perasion, not of yesterday, but of a date as r back as I am able to recollect the foration of a deliberate opinion, is, that after u have decreed that compulsory pay-ents in support of that Church shall cease d determine, its ministers will still be orted wherever there is work for them do, by the energy and earnestness of the ty to whom they minister. I confess I ve always thought it incomprehensible at the section of society in Ireland, which sses by far the greatest share of ealth in money and wealth in land, should profess to fear its inability to do for its clergy what the Presbyterians and Catholics do for theirs. I am confident that when the Establishment shall have been brought to an end, and its present revenues shall have been devoted to general use, the Anglican Faith will continue to find many and worthy pastors in Ireland; but they will be distributed congregationally instead of parochially, and adequately remunerated according to their labours. I heard the Home Secretary dwell, I own with much surprise, upon the stipulations made and the inducements held out at the Union as reasons why Parliament should not even entertain any question affecting the Establishment of the Irish Church. It may be true that to the friends of ascendancy assurances were given, that in a united Parliament the stability of the Establishment would never be disturbed; and I will not pause to dispute that the 5th Article of the Union seems to confirm that implication. But I must say the conduct of the Government at the time of the Union and the means by which that great Act of Policy was brought about, are the last topics on which judicious friends of the Church would do well to rely. The history of that Act is one shameful chronicle of wise intentions baffled, and splendid promises unfulfilled. The intention of Mr.

 Pitt was, undoubtedly, by conciliating the just claims of all classes and creeds of the people of Ireland to consolidate the Empire. The project of Union was in itself unpopular; and confessedly it could never have been carried had the great body of the Catholic clergy and laity persistently opposed it. In the memoirs of Lord Cornwallis and of Mr. Pitt, there is damnatory proof in abundance that the Union could never have been obtained but for the inducement held out to the Roman Catholics, not only that their civil rights should be conceded, but that a provision should be made for their clergy. A remarkable letter of Lord Castlereagh's has been preserved, in which he expostulates gravely and temperately, but with eloquent force and point, upon the way in which he had himself been made use of to gain over the Catholics to the Union. He reminds the Premier how often the measure had been rejected in 1799; he had been summoned to attend the Cabinet where the claims of the Catholics were fully discussed, and how, being referred for official instructions to the Duke of Portland as to the intentions of the Government, he had been authorized to communicate those intentions to Lord Cornwallis, by whom they had been regarded as instructions for his guidance as Viceroy. And there is a letter describing the beneficial effects thus produced after the Union was carried, and while yet its illusions remained undisputed. On the 2nd of February, 1801, Lord Cornwallis wrote to his Chief Secretary—

Mr. M'Cullagh Torrens

“ Nobody would have believed, three years ago, that the Union, Catholic Emancipation, and the restoration of perfect tranquillity, could have taken place in so short a time.”

But the Union having been carried, faith was broken; the Catholics found themselves egregiously duped; the Premier and the Viceroy, to save their personal honour, resigned; and Catholic Ireland fell back into despair; agrarian crime and political sedition resumed their alternate sway. For nine-and-twenty years the civil disabilities of the Catholics remained unremoved. Nine-and-thirty years have passed since then, and the religious disabilities still continue. The pledges given at the Union are still but half-fulfilled; and you are still unable to govern Ireland without suspension of the Habeas Corpus; prosecutions of the Press; and a garrison of five-and-twenty thousand men. I am one of those who wish to see the Union maintained, and all question of its stability set at rest. But I fearlessly assert that you have no moral claim to the acquiescence of Ireland in the continuance of the Union until you have redeemed the forfeited word by which it was carried, and without which you have the documentary evidence contained in the confession of the Minister by whom it was brought about that it could not have been carried. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire had been taunted with having come forward—no doubt at a great sacrifice of personal feeling—to do what he considered an act of duty—to rescue a much stricken land from its deplorable condition. Much had been said of the hasty conversion of the right hon. Gentleman, but he thought they had got beyond that. If any persons should desire to seek exemption from Hansard taunts, surely it was right hon. Gentlemen opposite. When last year the Members of the present Government were twitted with sudden conversion to household suffrage, what was their reply? They said they had always desired a permanent settlement of Reform if any change were to be made; and they said that they yielded from a sense of duty in the pressing exigency of the case. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone), may fairly defend himself on similar grounds. He has always been a friend of religious liberty, though hitherto a defender of the Church Establishment; but convinced at last that sectarian justice cannot be secured without its surrender he has the courage to avow his change of opinion on the subject; and, looking at the condition of Ireland and the external position of the Empire he may honestly and conscientiously plead his sense of duty as inspiring him to take his present course. Well, I am no more a sudden convert to religious equality in Ireland, than I was last year to household suffrage. The policy we are now about to initiate by a Vote of this House is one for which I have longed and striven from the day when I first entered public life. I have had some opportunities of estimating from within as well as from without the difficulties as they are called of governing Ireland. I had the honour of being associated many years ago with Sir George Lewis and other men of public worth and character, in the memorable inquiry, directed by Lord Melbourne, into the condition of the labouring classes of that country. I had also the privilege to act in a confidential capacity in the administration of the Government of Ireland by Lord Bessborough, during the deplorable period of the famine; and I can testify from personal observation and intimate knowledge of the wants and the feelings of all classes of the community that Ireland is a country as easily governed as any other upon earth, provided you will govern it justly. What was said by Sir John Davis, three centuries ago, is still true, though hitherto you have not believed it, that there is no people in Christendom that appreciates so quickly the spirit of justice in their rulers, or who value more highly the equality of laws. We had seen this evidenced during the fearful days of the famine; in the midst of all whose troubles the country was perfectly quiet and still. With the exception of one solitary outrage, there was no violence, there was no outrage committed upon property, although there was not in the island the means of restraining any which might have arisen. He believed there was no anti-Protestant feeling among the peasantry of Ireland; but, on the contrary, a sincere Catholic feeling, which he, as a Protestant, hoped would continue to exist, for of all the evils which could befall a country, he thought differentiation was the worst. He believed our safety depended greatly on the respect which the Irish people held their priesthood, and on the genuine and just influence which that priesthood exercised over the people, and he prayed that the opportunity of destroying that confidence between the priesthood and the people might never arise in the course which some persons, both in and out of that House, advocated, of endowing that priesthood. He did not wish to see the bribe offered or taken; the Established Church in Ireland ought to be disendowed, and its property applied to the benefit of all, irrespective of creed. The noble Lord the Foreign Secretary had required what was to be done with the money which would be obtained. He believed that the true application of the property of the Church would be in this wise. There were two Irish questions which were perpetually before Parliament — the land question and the Church question. Whenever the Church question was under consideration they were told that the land question was the really vital difficulty, and whenever their attention was called to the land question it was the Church which was said to be of vital importance. He believed this alternation to be a miserable trick of logic. The two questions should be dealt with simultaneously; and the property which would be obtained from the disendowment of the Church he would apply to solve the land difficulty. The great evil of Ireland had been at all times the want of a middle class; and he did not concur in the hope expressed by his hon. Friend the Member for Westminster (Mr. Stuart Mill), that a class of small peasant proprietors might be created, because the time had gone by for that species of holding. The world was tending rather too rapidly the other way, and it was impossible to go against the stream. But he did not despair of seeing the property which was now misapplied to sectarian uses ultimately applied to the creation of a permanent fund of improvement, by means of which property could be bought up at its full value, and re-let on long leases and in large farms. He could not think that anyone could be injured thereby, and as to the Church of Ireland and its Protestantism being undermined, because that which was invented by the Tudors was not perpetuated in the reign of our Gracious Queen, and because certain Bishoprics were not given to members of noble families, and deaneries to favourites of those in power, he no more believed that than he believed that the House was capable of doing a wilful wrong to any one class of the people of this country. He believed that the Anglican Church in Ireland was in the main indebted for its vitality to the voluntary principle. He remembered hearing it said upon one occasion by a witty friend that Protestantism in Ireland stooped for gold and Popery won the race. He hoped to see at an early period the Established Church in Ireland disendowed, and its revenues applied in the manner he had suggested.

SIR HERVEY BRUCE: Sir, as one of the representatives of the Protestant North, alluded to by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, the House will perhaps bear with me while I make a few observations on this most important subject which is under discussion; but before I do so I must allude to the observations just made by the hon. Member for Finsbury (Mr. M'Cullagh Torrens) — observations I believe without the smallest foundation, and accusations the most unwarrantable I ever remember to have heard in this House. He has accused a right rev. Prelate who has been in his grave for nearly seventy years (a circumstance which makes proof of his inaccuracy difficult) — he has accused Lord Bristol, when Bishop of Derry, of inviting his clergy to dine with him to propound to them his disbelief in the existence of a God. I feel confident no such occurrence ever took place; and if the hon. Gentleman is as inaccurate in his assertions as to what took place in the far past, as he is in those which we cannot contradict, much value will not attach to his unsupported statement. He has told us Dr. Ponsonby was the last Bishop of Derry, ignoring altogether the existence of the late Dr. Higgins, who came to Derry as an Englishman, a stranger to us, elevated, not for aristocratic connections, but for his own merits, and who was taken from us, regretted by all who were brought in contact with him, after fifteen years' occupation of that See. The hon. Member for Finsbury wished to show that none but members of noble families were made Bishops, therefore to acknowledge the episcopate of Dr. Higgins did not suit his argument. So when he can misstate as to the present, much value will not attach to his aspersion on the memory of the dead nearly seventy years back. I will now leave the hon. Gentleman, and come to the matter under discussion ; and in doing so will first explain my reasons for placing an Amendment on the Paper. It was with no wish to embarrass the Government, more particularly after the straightforward and manly statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary. But the Amendment of the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary has been called obscure—and indeed I do not myself altogether like its wording ; therefore I was determined to put down words which could not be misunderstood. I have no intention at the present time to enter upon the history of the Church, her undoubted rights, her ancient privileges, and her title to her property before the Church of Rome ever held sway in Ireland ; and my reasons are two-fold. First, it has been so often and so ably done before, that anything I could say, following those so much better qualified to speak on the subject than I am, would fall flatly on the ears of the House. Secondly, as the Motion now is only for going into Committee, a more fitting time will arrive to discuss the subject from its foundation. Nor will I use the argument ad hominem, because in the varying circumstances of time opinions must change upon some matters. Therefore, an argument founded upon the circumstance of your opponent having once thought differently from his present convictions does not of necessity make your position right. But there are times for and modes of changing, if weight is to be attached to your change of opinion, and I cannot think that the time and mode chosen for the expression of his new conviction by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Gladstone) will add weight or dignity to his present expression of them—a weight which otherwise must always be given to the views of a gentleman of such unrivalled eloquence, intellectual genius, and unvarying industry as the right hon. Gentleman ; and I say new convictions, because they are new as far as the outside world has hitherto known, though the right hon. Gentleman tells us his more intimate friends and former constituents were well aware of his changed opinions twenty years ago. For my part, I prefer being guided by the opinions of the right hon. Gentleman as expressed in his earlier and happier days, maintained with eloquence and power during twenty-five years of his more vigorous manhood, to the new opinions, the result apparently of those more unhallowed inspirations which induced him to quote last night a passage from the most beautiful instance of faith recorded in the life of our Saviour, for no purpose of argument which I could see except to compare his Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen even to the dogs which eat the crumbs. I am told there are some on these Benches who will leave us on this occasion. I cannot understand their reasons ; but I could well understand why some hon. Gentleman on the other side might consider their Leader in his newly-inspired zeal was leading them too fast, and their telling him they could not follow. And I cannot help saying I listened with the deepest regret to the speech of the noble Lord the Member for Stamford (Viscount Cranborne)—a speech of a bitterness I hope never to hear again. I cannot help thinking he accused unfairly the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn, when he said his votes in favour of Reform last year were at variance with the words of the Resolution of the noble Lord the Member for Chester (Earl Grosvenor), which he seconded in 1866. I will take the liberty of reading the words of the Resolution—

Mr. M'Cullagh Torrens

“ That this House, while ready to consider, with a view to its settlement, the question of Parliamentary Reform, is of opinion that it is inexpedient to discuss a Bill for the reduction of the Franchise in England and Wales until the House has before it the entire scheme contemplated by the Government for the Amendment of the Representation of the People.” — [3 Hansard, clxxxii. 1156.]

and ask the House, whether they did not rather pledge the noble Lord to support Reform than otherwise? The speech of the noble Lord the Member for Stamford was loudly cheered by hon. Gentlemen on the other side. I can understand and appreciate cheers won from an opponent by the expression of a generous sentiment ; but I can neither understand nor appreciate cheers won by taunts and abuse of those among whom you sit — imputing motives to those with whom, during your political career, you have been associated in close and intimate terms ; because there were portions of their policy with which you differed—a course of conduct which embraced in its censure not only the Chief, whom the noble Lord may personally dislike, but the whole of the great party who followed that Chief to victory — a victory which I believe will be for the good of the nation. I should now like to say a word to the Roman Catholic Members of the House. I cannot understand how men of undoubted honour and integrity in all the social affairs of life can reconcile it to their conscience, having regard to their oath, and the pledges made on their behalf in 1829, to vote for the abolition of the Established Church of Ireland; and I would be the last man to say a word willingly disrespectful to them, or tending to hurt their feelings, for in my political career I owe them many obligations, and I have among them many personal friends; but it seems strange to me how they can vote for the destruction of the Established Church of Ireland. If there is anything in the teaching of their Church which justifies such a course, it behoves us, as Protestants, to be more watchful over our interests. Well, then, we are told that a State Church is not necessary. Is the State to ignore its duty to provide the means of worship for its people? Is the State to say, I care not whether you have means of worship or not? Bad for a country when its Government proclaims itself indifferent as to providing the means of worship for its people. To maintain that the State ought to offer the means; but the State cannot enforce the using of the means; and what the State offers must of necessity be the religion of the State. The alliance now formed between the voluntaries of England and the Roman Catholics cannot last. They have no object in common but the overthrow of the Protestant Establishment. I should have fancied that the Church of England, with the greater liberty of opinion given to its members than the Church of Rome grants, would have better accorded with the views of the advocates of voluntarism. But the Church in Ireland must fall, say both; hence the temporary alliance, an alliance unreasoning and unreasonable, save for the exigencies of the moment; but voluntarism, speaking for itself, must of necessity be more hostile to the Church of Rome, with its unbounded demands for spiritual power, than to the Church of England. We are again told that in England the Established Church lives in the hearts of the people, and in Ireland that it does not. Let us analyze that statement. I ask you voluntaries of England, Does the Church of England live in your hearts? Does it live, and leave its impress on the heart of the hon. Member for Sheffield? No. I believe he and you taste it more bitterly than any Roman Catholic tastes the Established Church of Ireland. I venture to say that the Church of Ireland is more dear to its members than is the Church of England. Both, perhaps, are distasteful to those who differ; but are we for that reason to overthrow an ancient Establishment, the growth of centuries, and respected, as I know, by many of my Roman Catholic countrymen. Protestants of England, I ask you to pause. Depend upon it, if our Church falls, the argument of living in the hearts of the people will not save yours. You may endure for a little; but as surely as you destroy the Established Church of Ireland, so surely will the Church of England fall with it—the great bulwark of our free and glorious Constitution. Well, now, for a moment, let us suppose that the House goes into Committee, and passes the Resolutions of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, let us look at the position of affairs. The House will remember the Resolution passed by Lord John Russell in 1835—

Sir Hervey Bruce

“That the House do resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole House to consider the temporalities of the Church of Ireland.”

The Ayes were 322; Noes, 289: so that the Motion was carried by a majority of 33; and yet, from that time to this, no action has been taken. Let us look for a moment at the results of the Member for South Lancashire carrying his Resolutions. They go farther than Lord John Russell's, and they are intended to place the right hon. Gentleman in power. What has the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London just told us? Why, it is this—that when his party is in power they can do nothing Liberal, because we prevent them. Yet, these so-called Liberals approved our Reform Bill, but when we are in power, with their assistance we can do anything. But let us suppose for a moment (a result, I believe, impossible), these Resolutions carried, the Member for South Lancashire in office on the strength of them, what is the position of affairs? All action in the Church of Ireland suspended by the passing of a simple abstract Resolution in this House, with no Act of Parliament, and, perhaps, another thirty-five years (the Liberals having gained all they want, and returned to power), may go over our heads before an Act of Parliament is passed, either to sanction or disapprove of these abstract Resolutions, which would in the meanwhile stop all action in the Church, and leave matters in hopeless confusion. This Church is called an “alien Church.” Its history, when the time comes for again reciting it will be proved to be otherwise, and it was promised to us—what in other times would have been called secured to us—by the Act of Union, and yet your English and Scotch Members propose to take it from us; for I venture to assert that the Division List will show that Irish Members by themselves would respect its prescriptive title. The right hon. Member for South Lancashire has told us there are anomalies in the Church. When are there not anomalies in everything? We have often been told that anomalies are the glory of our institutions. Well, the right hon. Gentleman has produced two. If there were more, his research would have discovered them. I say at once, reform them if they are there. Let no such abuses exist; but for such things do not overthrow an ancient Church, the growth of centuries—a Church established before the See of Rome pretended to have sway in Ireland; and if we talk of anomalies, is it no anomaly that the worthy Baron the Member for the City of London, with his wealth of European extent, should simply have one vote in the return of its Members, on equality with the man who occupies a house and pays his rate. I do not say such a state of thing is unjust. All I say is, is it an anomaly? Now for a moment, before I sit down, let us look at the reasons given for the necessity of at once overthrowing the Establishment first to satisfy the demands of the Church of Rome. Has not that Church told us by its ministers that the Establishment, though a grievance, is by no means a first-class one—that there are others of far greater importance lying behind. So you wound in their tenderest feelings the most loyal portion of your Irish fellow-countrymen; because this question will offend all Protestants; and I have not sooner alluded to my Presbyterian brethren, because the present question does not at once affect them; but if the Establishment goes, the small and far too small pittance which has been given to them will go to, the rights of property will follow, and then the Repeal of the Union. Your second reason for urging the necessity of immediate action is the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act; but you thoroughly misunderstand the feeling of Ireland. You try to meddle with us; you mistake the ravings of demagogues who trade upon the credulity of an excitable, but kindly and easily governed people, for the feelings of a nation. Treat us kindly; do not be always offering legislation impossible, and raising expectation where you cannot perform. Do not suppose the conduct of strangers from another land let loose upon Ireland to be sanctioned by the masses of her people. Ireland is loyal, but Ireland is excited; and because she is so, how do you propose to legislate? You offer a sop to one portion of her population, certainly not that portion most attached to your rule—a sop which they tell you plainly they regard but as a very small instalment—confiscation of property, and Repeal of the Union, being the further demands. Are you prepared for such concessions? If not, why wound in their most cherished convictions, and injure in their most inalienable rights, that powerful portion of your fellow-subjects, who, in your hours of difficulty and danger, have been your firmest friends? Pause well before you enter upon the path proposed to you. Think of it. Consider whether the affections (you may be sure of their loyalty) will be of more value to you than the praise of demagogues, who, having raised themselves by appealing to the passions of a people, care not for the people when their own objects are attained, and have no abiding influence. I will only make one quotation, but I wish to read to the House the words of a very eminent Roman Catholic Judge, lately passed from amongst us—Mr. Justice Shee. What does he say of the Established Church?—

“The Church by law established is the Church of a community everywhere considerable in respect of property, rank, and intelligence; it is strong in the prescription of three centuries, and in the support which it receives from the supposed identity of its interests with those of the Church of England. Nothing short of a convulsion, tearing up both Establishments by the roots could accomplish its overthrow.”

I will now say a word to the right hon. Member for South Lancashire. Two years ago, he said to us with menacing gesture, “Be wise! And be wise in time.” I now say to him, Beware, lest the brittle ladder upon which you hope to rise to power break beneath your weight, and overwhelm you in its fall; or if, on the other hand, it shall acquire the momentary strength to raise you to that giddy eminence you—having sapped the foundations of an ancient Empire—should, instead of finding yourself the ruler of a mighty nation, worthy the ambition of a statesman, discover too late you were only the Minister of divided kingdoms, only worthy of a man who loves power more than his country.

MR. CARTER said, that he should not have offered himself to the attention of the House, even for the few moments that he should occupy it, but for the fact that his ection had taken place since the day on which the Resolutions of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire had been placed upon the Paper. The result of that election, therefore—bringing to the light the opinions of his constituents fresh from the hustings—might be taken as some indication of the course of opinion in the country on the subject of the Irish Church. That consideration alone was his excuse for trespassing on the attention of the House. His opponent was one of Her Majesty's Counsel, a learned gentleman with whom in eloquence he could not pretend to compete, and who had laid before the constituency the reasons which naturally occurred to him against the Resolutions of the right hon. Gentleman. His constituents, however, were plain men; and they could not understand why an injustice, which it appeared no one was prepared to defend, should be allowed to remain for a single day beyond the time when it could be removed. They could not understand how delay in such a case could be anything but a new injustice; and it appeared to them that there ought to be no delay in remedying the existing state of things. During the election, the subject of Ireland and the position of the Irish Church had occupied a main part of the attention of his constituents, who could not be made to understand that it was just, or wise, or fair that the Church of the few should be dominant over the many. They thought that the sooner such a state of things was at an end to the better; and instead of turning the eloquent gentleman, who would have opposed the right hon. Gentleman's Resolutions, they had returned a much more humble individual, because they thought he would more truly represent them. He (Mr. Carter) hoped the House would consider that some weight was to be attached to so recent an expression of opinion. His own opinions entirely coincided with those of his constituents on the subject before the House; and it would be the greatest satisfaction to himself—no less than his duty—to give his first vote in the House of Commons in support of the Resolutions of the right hon. Gentleman, and against the Motion of the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary.

MR. SERJEANT ARMSTRONG said, he had heard with astonishment the allegation that there was any substantial novelty in the proposition before the House. He admitted that a Resolution so conceived and so exactly expressing the direct object in view as the present one had not hitherto been brought before that House; but, from the course of events and the drift and tenour of the public mind on that question, any man might easily have foreseen for years past that the time was fast approaching when that Resolution would be introduced; and he himself three years ago on the hustings at Sligo had ventured to predict that the right hon. Member for South Lancashire would be the person to introduce it. The frank and honest speech of the Home Secretary that night had removed the mask under which the Foreign Secretary had sought to debate that question, and to shroud the opinions of the Cabinet. The right hon. Gentleman could not have spoken in the eloquent manner he did without belief in the soundness of the position he was advocating. The cheers with which that speech had been received, not only behind the Treasury Bench, but upon it, was a distinct announcement to the House and the country that the issue now raised was simply this—should Protestant ascendancy in Ireland be maintained at all costs and all hazards, or should that country in future be governed on the only principle on which he believed in his conscience it could be governed consistently with the safety and the integrity of the Empire—namely, perfect equality, religious as well as civil? As a Member of that House and a lawyer, he certainly would not advocate any measure involving a violation of Her Majesty's Coronation Oath, or interfering really and substantially with the Articles of Union; but what, he asked, was the object of those hon. Gentlemen who had moved that the Coronation Oath and part of the Act of Union should be read before the opening of that debate? Why, evidently to frighten the House from its propriety. He supposed it must have been some consolation to hon. Gentlemen opposite to have the Oath read, as they had greeted it with cheers. But what had the Solicitor General, the responsible Law Adviser of the Crown, told the House on that very point? Why, that he had considered the Coronation Oath, and that, in his opinion, the Royal sanction to an Act of Parliament disestablishing the Irish Church would involve no violation of that Oath, and that he could not as a lawyer pretend that it would. There was not a lawyer in that House—nay, he would go further, and say that there was no gentleman of education versed in the terms of plain language who believed that the Coronation Oath pledged the Royal conscience to do more than govern the country in accordance with the statutes then or thereafter to be passed. When certain Archbishoprics and Bishoprics were suppressed by the Church Temporalities Act, was it suggested that the then Monarch violated his Coronation Oath in giving his assent to that Act? But then it was said that the right hon. Gentleman's Resolutions were an interference with the Act of Union. He had always understood that the present Parliament represented both the parties to the Act of Union, and that the same authority which made that or any other Act could repeal it. He maintained that there was nothing in the Union to prevent the repeal either of the Union or of any Article in it. They now had the authority of the Solicitor General of England in support of this proposition, and he hoped they would hear no more twaddle either about the Coronation Oath or the Act of Union. The property of the Irish Church was committed to a certain corporation upon a certain trust. The distinguishing mark of private property was that it could be alienated; but the Church could not alienate an inch of property. A most unfounded statement had been made that the Roman Catholic population looked upon the Irish Church with complacency. Knowing the people of that country intimately, he believed that they saw in that Church an existing symbol of the oppression to which they had been subjected. They derived no comfort from its ministrations. They did not believe in its doctrines, and they knew that some of the clergy who were esteemed the bulwarks of that Church were employed to vilify the Church of the Irish people. It was said that the Irish Church was supported by the landlords, but that would open a wide question. Whatever political economists might say, the Irish people understood perfectly well that they paid the Church and the landlord too. He remembered having a conversation with a plain man, one of a party who were at work in a field getting potatoes, and who asked him, "Is it any harm, Sir, for a clergyman to speak to the priest?" If there was a rural parish in Ireland in which the Roman Catholic priest and the Protestant clergyman exchanged words it was the exception. Though the Protestant clergyman had a congregation of, perhaps, only two or three people, and the mass of the population were Roman Catholics, he was an aristocrat, and looked upon the priest as an intruder. In the cities, owing to there being more of social intercourse and from other circumstances, the case was different; but, as a rule, there was a total estrangement between Protestants and Roman Catholics, and this was owing to the maintenance of a Church which the latter regarded as a symbol of oppression. When he said to the peasant to whom he had before referred, "The landlord [pays the tithes," the man replied, "But who pays the landlord?" The feeling pervaded the peasantry—and he believed that the feeling was undoubtedly correct—that they themselves paid for the Irish Church. The question really was, was this Church an insult or a grievance to them? Such a state of things would not be tolerated in England; nor would anyone think of introducing a priori such a system into Ireland. Then came the question, ought the Church to be continued, and the question was not so much an Irish as an Imperial one. There ought to be no occasion for the standing army which was now in Ireland; nor would there be only for the efforts made to uphold ascendancy. The Government and Parliament ought to at once decide whether Ireland was to be governed on the principle of ascendancy or that of religious equality. Nothing could be more unconstitutional than to say that this House of Commons was moribund, and incapable of expressing an opinion. It was true that it could not bind its successor; but it could send a message of peace to Ireland, and the announcement that justice was to be done would have a most beneficial effect. The statement of the noble Lord the Chief Secretary for Ireland, that the Church Establishment could not be put an end to without a fierce and protracted struggle, had brought out the Liberal party, who had a Leader who would conduct them to victory. All the talk about what the Orangemen of Ulster would do was mere bluster. They had threatened a great deal before the passing of the Catholic Emancipation Act; but when it passed they returned to their fields and their looms, and had remained there until very recently, when more auspicious times seemed to afford them an opportunity of again disturbing the country. There was no danger that the Protestants of Ireland would be alienated by a measure such as that proposed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire. He (Mr. Serjeant Armstrong) did not believe that the disestablishment of the Protestant Church would abate the loyalty of the long-pampered population of the orth of Ireland. It was assumed that there was an unanimous feeling among Protestants in Ireland upon the matter; but this was by no means so. He did not wish to speak with any disrespect of the clergy of the Church, of which he was a member; but he must say that the clergy were like other people who were paid in an inverse proportion to their work. He made a remark because what they were about was spoken of as though they were going to sacrifice an army of saints, when in truth there were among the clergy good, bad, and indifferent. His experience of them was that, while they did their duty in the Church, they troubled themselves very little about what their parishioners or the children of their parishioners were doing at home. He knew a parish close to the town of Armagh, where a visit from the rector to a humble Protestant was never known; and it was a constant complaint in Dublin and other places that the Protestant clergyman never visited his flock unless to ask for a subscription towards a charity. If one wanted to hear eloquent sermons in Dublin the churches in which to hear them were those which were supported by pew-rents. It was not the fact that the clergy of the Established Church in Ireland held that place in the affections of the laity which some hon. Gentlemen would lead the House to suppose. Too much must not be expected even from the establishment of the Church, for there were other things behind it. He was not the man who was frightened by the term "revolution," and, indeed, it was a mere term. The settlement of the land question on a rational basis would, however, rapidly follow; the difficulty on that point consisted in the refusal of the landlords to grant leases: that refusal was designed to wield political authority over their tenants, and the object of that authority was the maintenance of Protestant ascendancy. The Church and land questions were thus closely connected, and the settlement of the former would pave the way for the social regeneration, of Ireland. He supported the Resolution because he believed the right hon. Gentleman by whom it was proposed was fully prepared to carry out a policy which would allay agitation, banish discontent, and diffuse loyalty and tranquillity over the length and breadth of the country.

Mr. Carter

COLONEL STUART KNOX said, after a brave, manly, straightforward, and he might say glorious speech—not of the hon. and learned member for Sligo (Mr. Serjeant Armstrong), but of his right hon. Friend the Secretary for the Home Department—he should not have thought it necessary to take a part in this discussion; but that, being the Irishman that had ventured to interfere between the House and the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, by moving that the 5th Article of the Act of Union be read by the Clerk at the Table, he felt it his duty to say a few words in justification of the course he had pursued. He looked upon the Act of Union as the safeguard of his country, and, although he could not justify the means by which it was obtained, he contended that the ends had been of advantage to Ireland. He saw in the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman the destruction of the fundamental Articles of that Union, and virtually of the Union itself. For what, he asked, would come next? Why, hon. Gentlemen opposite would begin to clamour for a Parliament on College Green. For his own part he would rather have met the Resolutions of the right hon. Gentleman by a distinct negative; but, like a shipwrecked sailor, he was willing to seize upon any plank that offered safety. He believed that that plank had been honestly thrown out by Her Majesty's Government, and the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Home Department proved to him that such really was the case. If the Resolutions of the right hon. Gentleman should be adopted, what would be the result? How, he asked, would the Coronation Oath be affected? They had heard from the hon. and learned Gentleman who spoke last that it was all a pretence. Was that true? Would Her most gracious Majesty look on it as such? Was it possible that she would be asked, by a mere Resolution of the House, to violate it? He did not venture to say so. The Resolutions of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) called in effect, upon Her Majesty to violate her Oath. He looked upon the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman as the most cowardly one that had ever been made in that House. Why had not the right hon. Gentleman undertaken to bring in a Bill upon the question? And what about the oath which he had taken as a Privy Councillor? Did that justify him in the course he was pursuing? But leaving this as a matter for the right hon. Gentleman's own conscience, he would ask, whether the effect of the Resolutions before the House would not be to alienate the loyal and honest people of the North of Ireland? He would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he really believed that this proposed robbery and spoliation of the Irish Church would satisfy the people of Ireland? It was ridiculous to suppose so. The right hon. Gentleman said that the opinions which he held twenty-five years ago upon this subject were somewhat similar to those he now expressed. It appeared, therefore, that although he was then Member for the University of Oxford, he was always ready to aid in putting down the Established Church in Ireland. Did not the right hon. Gentleman obtain votes at the last election for the University of Oxford, when he was a candidate, from dignitaries of the Irish Church under the belief that he would give his support to the maintenance of the Irish Church? Until the right hon. Gentleman answered that question by a negative, he (Colonel S. Knox) would assert it as a fact. A good deal had been said about Protestant ascendancy in Ireland—they wanted no ascendancy—they had none. The only penal law in operation now was one against the Protestants. They had the Processions Act in existence which was a penal law only against the Protestants of Ireland. All they asked was that the law should be made to apply to all parties in the country, and then they would willingly support it. The right hon. Gentleman's proposal to buy off the rights of those interested in the Church savoured very much of what the right hon. Gentleman had himself said about "trick and contrivance." He contended that the property of the Irish Church was the property of the members and not of the ministers of that Church. The hon. member for Sligo (Mr. Sergeant Armstrong) spoke of the clergy of the North as living merely for their own interest and benefit. That was untrue. He (Colonel S. Knox) knew that the clergy of the North—both Protestants and Presbyterians—devoted their time and attention to the interests of their parishioners. The taunt was an unworthy one, and should not be cast upon so estimable a body of men. A Radical Friend of his (Colonel S. Knox's), a Member of that House, had recently told him that they (the Radicals) had succeeded in getting nearly everything but the Crown. This he feared was almost true; and therefore it was that he stood up to protect the Crown and the remnant of the Constitution.

Mr. Serjeant Armstrong

MR. O'REILLY remarked that the 5th Article of the Act of Union, which had been so frequently referred to, provided for the maintenance, doctrine, discipline, and government of the Church of Ireland, but contained not a word respecting its endowment or its ascendancy in the country. One of the arguments advanced in favour of the Established Church in Ireland was that it was a missionary Church, and there was another argument that lay behind, which was that it was an English garrison. As to its being a missionary Church, he could not better describe its position than by quoting the words of a beneficed clergyman of the Establishment—Dr. Gregg, incumbent of St. Nicholas Within. That gentleman said—

"I am a beneficed clergyman, but without cure of souls. I cannot help that. Every man's vocation is what God has given him. My vocation is to hold my tongue."

And then Dr. Gregg proceeded to say that he himself had taught the whole Roman Catholic population of Dublin, though he was a sinecurist of St. Nicholas Within; for, though he preached every Sunday in an empty church, yet, when he stood in the midst of Roman Catholics and told them they were going the broad way to destruction, he was thereby teaching them and doing his duty. Well, the Established Church in Ireland had been a missionary Church for 300 years, and what had been its fruits? He did not wish to rake up the memory of evil days, though they had been told to-night by the Home Secretary that it was only forgers of tales that had invented such legends to delude the Irish people. Now, he would tell the right hon. Gentleman that the bitterest edicts against the Catholics of Ireland had been signed by prelates of the Established Church—from Loftus to Hoadley—the first of whom ordered the torture of Archbishop O'Hurley, and the latter signed the last edict against the celebration of the Mass. It was necessary to recal some of this bitter history in order that it might be understood in what manner this missionary Church was regarded by the Catholic population. It was but little exaggeration to say of that Church that its text to the Irish people was, "I came not to bring peace, but the sword." Now, what were the results? The Protestant religion was first introduced by law into Ireland in 1537. It was re-established in the beginning of the reign of Elizabeth. Nearly 100 years after, or in 1641, Sir William Petty — no contemptible authority — stated that the population of Ireland was 56,000, of whom the Protestants were 10,000 and the Catholics more than 46,000. Then came the only really successful missionary of Protestantism in Ireland, who really did increase the proportion of Protestants — Oliver Cromwell. He came with a Bible in one hand and a sword in the other, and sought to exterminate those whom he could not convert, and it was remarkable how successful he was. Within eighteen years Sir William Petty had given the population of Ireland as nearly 1,500,000, that population was reduced to exactly 500,000; of whom 83,000 were Protestants of English or Scotch birth, and 150,000 were Catholics. Protestants of an earlier date. These numbers are taken from the Census of 1851, lately discovered among the Lansdowne Papers. Therefore, after the exertions of Cromwell, the proportion of Protestants to Catholics was exactly equal. The missionary Church, supported by law, continued its efforts until 1834, when the proportion of Protestants in Ireland had sunk to 20 from 50 per cent. Then came other successful missionaries of the same sort — the famine of 1846, and the pestilence of 1847 — which raised the proportion of Protestants to 22 from 20 per cent. But let them examine how matters stood in the metropolis, there was no part of the country where the law-Established Church was so strong, so well endowed, or had so much wealth, intelligence, or education. In 1664, the population of Dublin consisted of 5,500 Protestants and 2,400 Catholics; or in other words, the Protestants were as two to one. In 1861, the Protestants of Dublin were 56,000, the Catholics 196,000; or in other words, the Protestants from two to one had become to the Catholics as one to three. Such had been the result of the missionary efforts of the law-protected Church. How could it be otherwise? Even truth could not prevail, if loaded with such a weight of injustice, if linked with such a history of wrong. Then there was the argument which lay behind, that the Anglican Establishment was an English prison. In the last Quarterly Review these words were used—

"The Protestant garrison in Ireland, with which we cannot break without gravely imperiling the integrity of the Empire, will not hear of a proposal."

Chief Justice Whiteside, when a member of that House, had made use of the same argument, for he said that as soon as they destroyed the Irish Church they would destroy the Monarchy, and uproot British power in Ireland. Now, he would meet that argument completely and boldly. He (Mr. O'Reilly) would admit it was in a great measure true that the Anglicans in Ireland were zealous supporters of English institutions. But, suppose it was India, not Ireland, they had to deal with. Suppose they had for centuries persecuted the religion of the Hindoos—that they had established a privileged class, few in number, among them, and had set up in every district a church and minister that were not the Church and minister of the people—did they think they would want to inquire whether English rule was popular in India or not? Was it not plain that as long as England upheld the ascendancy of a class, she must expect the alienation of a people? Well, what was the garrison worth? Its loyalty was lately stated by one of their principal orators, amid loud cheers, to be conditional. Then it was said it was impossible to conciliate the Roman Catholics. It reminded him of a story of O'Connell's. A man complained to him that he could never fatten his horse, though he tried all the quack medicines he could get. Whereupon O'Connell asked him, "Did you ever try oats?" Let them try equal justice for Ireland. The Irish Roman Catholics were quite content in Canada and elsewhere out of their native country, simply because they had equal rights and equal justice away from Ireland. The assertion that the Roman Catholics do not care for the ascendancy of the Church was answered most emphatically by a protest signed by every Roman Catholic of rank, of birth, or of position, as well as from the great mass of the people, in numerous petitions to the House, and but for the prudence of the leaders, the answer would have been sent back from hundreds of angry meetings. So long as the Irish people loved justice and hated wrong, so long would they resent what Mr. Burke so well describes as "wholesale robbery." Both clergy and laity declared that they would not accept any portion of the property at present enjoyed by the Establishment. As many as 2,000 churches had been built at a cost of £3,500,000; every district had an Anglican church, built out of the funds of the nation; and the Roman Catholics of Ireland might now fairly ask that England should give back the mouldering ruins of their monasteries and churches, and the lonely graveyards, where rested the ashes of their dead. Let not the House proclaim themselves, as they had been invited to do, morally incompetent to do justice, or they would also proclaim themselves morally incompetent to enforce obedience. If the people of Ireland could not look to England for justice, they would look to the West for revolution. ["Oh, oh!"] Let not hon. Gentlemen opposite misunderstand him. He had never advocated revolution, and he now said that under no circumstances would he recommend it; but it was not wise to tell the people of Ireland that they must not look to Parliament for justice. If they did so, the natural consequence was that they would look Westward. The tree of oppression and injustice would bear its bitter fruit in alienation and discontent; but do justice, and we should meet any shock of foreign war or invasion with the strength of a contented and united people.

Mr. O'Reilly

MR. SCHREIBER said: Mr. Speaker, Sir, the hon. and learned Gentleman who spoke last but one from the Benches opposite (Mr. Serjeant Armstrong) with cruel skill protracted the painful operation which is familiarly known as that of "catching your eye;" but even at the price we paid, we should be sorry to have missed the last remarks of the hon. and learned Gentleman. The overthrow of the Irish Church was, he confessed, to be the prelude to a "revolution," but we were not to be frightened at the word. The hon. and learned Gentleman began by pulling down the Orange flag, but before he ended he raised the red flag in its place. Sir, I highly appreciate the candour of an opponent, which admits the whole matter in dispute. Now, Sir, during the short time that I have had the honour of a seat in this House, questions of the gravest interest have been before us, and some of them have been solved in a manner the very opposite of that I could have wished: but none has ever caused me so much anxiety and pain as the question raised by the Resolutions of the right hon. Gentleman. Because, connected as I am by many ties with Ireland, and knowing the Irish people well, I cannot banish from my mind the melancholy conviction that, whatever may be the immediate issue of this debate, the day which saw those Resolutions laid upon the table of this House will be the beginning of many sorrows both to Ireland and this Empire. It was therefore, Sir, with profound satisfaction that I heard the speech of the Home Secretary earlier in the evening. It did much to redeem the debate from the air of unreality which marked the discussion of the previous night. Its earnestness corresponded with the gravity—I might say, the solemnity—of the occasion, and it furnished a saving contrast to the speech of the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn (Lord Stanley). It is true his speech was exhaustive of the question of present time and opportunity, but it gave no assurance that, in the opinion of Her Majesty's Government, the disestablishment of the Irish Church never could be opportune. I have said that the speech of the noble Lord was exhaustive of the question of present opportunity; but there was one consideration which he forgot, and which as Foreign Secretary he might have been expected to remember. Foreign governments, Sir, know nothing of the necessities of the Liberal party, and when they see this sudden proposal in the face of a dangerous conspiracy, which has been rather "scotched" than "killed," they will think that England is yielding to the Clerkenwell syllogism what she refused to reason and to justice. These Resolutions at the present juncture will be, in their eyes, a tribute to the importance and the strength of Fenianism; and if capitulation to Fenianism is an ultimate necessity for England—which I deny—at least her dignity in the eyes of foreign nations might have been saved by its postponement for the present. With this remark I leave the question of opportuneness, and come to that of expediency. These Resolutions are to be a "healing measure" for Ireland. Whoever says that, believing it, knows little of the Irish people. They will largely alienate Protestants from the English Government; they will not conciliate a single Roman Catholic. The antipathy of the native Irishman for England is not primarily a matter of religion. It is the hatred of the conquered for his conquerors, who have confiscated the soil. That is a fact which we did not create; but which we inherit, and which we cannot but too plainly recognize. There is no Irish peasant, Sir, who is not "crazed" upon the question of his title to the land which we have taken from him. [Mr. OSBORNE: What nonsense!] Well! the hon. Gentleman will have an opportunity of expanding that remark in a speech which will no doubt be replete with eloquence and good taste. The fact being as I have stated it, it is now proposed to conciliate the native race by taking from

of the possessors—the Church—her right to one-tenth of the produce of the land. Yes, Sir, but nine-tenths remain behind; and while they remain the native Irishman encouraged by concessions, will never be conciliated. But that is not all. Behind there lie the priesthood and the hierarchy of a Church whose policy it is to prevent the Roman Catholic population from being reconciled to the Government of a Protestant country. They know the deep feeling of the peasant on this question of the soil, and they keep it alive and foster it for use. They are using it now against the Protestant Church, and when the time comes they will use it against the possessors of the land. [Cheers and interruption.] Well, it is not I that say this; I will read you what was said by a Roman Catholic newspaper, The Tablet—

"If the Irish Church Establishment were abolished to-morrow; if its churches, lands, and rates-charges were applied to secular and even to Catholic purposes; or if the Catholic Church were put upon a level of perfect equality, we could only have dealt with one symptom and not have reached the seat of the disease. The wound of Ireland is, that whereas the great majority of the population are Catholics, such a large proportion of the soil belongs to Protestants, and that Protestants form such a large portion of those classes which are raised in social station higher than the others."

That, I apprehend, is an authority—not mine—which Roman Catholic gentlemen will no longer question. Sir, the noble Lord, the Foreign Secretary, in a few words he said last night, showed that he perfectly understood what is the real Irish question. He said it was the land; and he glanced at the habit of Irish tenants—of disposing of farms to their relations. But why does the Irish tenant do that? Because he believes the soil to be his own to dispose of; and if we surrender to him the temporalities of the Church, it will only stimulate his appetite for more. Well, then, shall we strengthen the Union? Sir, to repeal it in idea, by legislating for Ireland as a distinct and separate country. To repeal it in effect, by estranging andasperating the loyal friends of the English interest and connection. And what will you gain in return? The increased contempt of the enemies who trade upon our fears. But will you promote religious peace? The Church of Ireland now mediates between extremes. Her overthrow will leave room for the zeal of none but voluntary agents. In what spirit, do you think, will the battle of opposing creeds be fought when Exeter Hall supplies the funds which disendowment will withdraw? These Resolutions, Sir, will bring not peace, but a sword. It seems, then, that there is little in expediency to recommend them. But, shall we violate no principle by their adoption? Yes, Sir, the principle of the solemn and public dedication of money to the highest uses to which money can be put—a principle in comparison with which the fate of Ministries and the ambition of a Minister, in my sight, are as nothing; and in the long days of trouble and excitement which now lie before us I so intend, Sir, to regard it. Well, then, what are, or were, or ought to be, the forces at the disposal of Her Majesty's Government wherewith to fight this battle? Till last night they might have commanded the unswerving allegiance of every man who regards as sacred the principle of an Establishment. They might have summoned to their aid the zeal of every Protestant who sees in the overthrow of the Irish Church an aggression of the Roman Catholic hierarchy. Because, Sir, the Irish Church is not only Protestant, but she is established; she is not only established, but she is Protestant. Such, Sir, is the affluence of strength which the Prime Minister seems not indisposed to squander. He chills the zeal of every Protestant by a charter to a Roman Catholic University; and he puts up his Secretary for Foreign Affairs to alienate Churchmen who would have fought for an Establishment. The Roman Catholic charter, Sir, is an anachronism and a blunder. Is it to be persisted in? The desertion of a Church Establishment is an apostasy which no Conservative Government can commit and live. But, Sir, "when bale is at highest, bote is nighest;" and if the debate of last evening filled us, at its opening, with dismay, we have had comfort in its course. We have seen that there are men in this House ready to devote their high powers and great influence to the defence of the Protestant Established Church of Ireland; and in my noble Friend the Member for Stamford, and the Home Secretary, we have found Leaders whom any man might be proud to follow in such a cause. They never "palter in a double sense" their language is plain for all to understand; and their earnestness will find a responsive chord in the heart of the great English people. With such leaders, Sir, all is not yet lost. Large masses of educated and Protestant opinion will rally to their side; and, with the aid to be looked for from "another place," we shall be able to maintain a protracted struggle before we suffer this deed of injustice to be done. And, if we fail, at least, Sir, we shall fail with honour: but we shall not fail; for, in the hour of our need, the Protestant people of England will defend the right. Sir, to the proposal for going into Committee on the Resolutions of the right hon. Gentleman I shall oppose a hearty negative. As to the vague and colourless Amendment of the noble Lord—which I hope will be withdrawn—I do not know that I shall care to walk into the Lobby in its support.

Mr. Schreiber

CAPTAIN WHITE, as the representative of an Irish constituency, felt that he could not allow that question to be discussed without taking part in the debate. He confessed to having experienced, in common, he believed, with a majority of that House, and the whole of the Irish people, a feeling of intense disappointment at hearing the intentions of Her Majesty's Government to pursue in this matter a policy of procrastination and delay which must be as dangerous to their own existence as it was distasteful to the Irish people. It was obvious, however, that the time had at length arrived when, at the hands, if not of the Government, at least of the Imperial Parliament, the Irish Church, like other ancient institutions, in a Reformed House, must undergo a searching scrutiny, which could only result in a complete and radical reform. That such reform was necessary, he conceived there could be no reading or thinking man who would deny; for no one who knew anything of Ireland could assert that the ecclesiastical arrangements of that country were in a satisfactory condition, with the exception of a party whose line of action was predetermined, and whose representatives were bound to support the Established Church, and upon whom, of course, all arguments, however forcible and convincing, were thrown away. The disputants in this question had resolved themselves into two great parties—one for a broad scheme of reform, based on the re-distribution of Church revenues, yet advocates for the retention of the Establishment; and the other, those who urged those arguments—first, that the Irish Church was an anomaly of the most unparalleled nature, when they considered the numerical proportions of the different creeds. Those who supported this view argued that no solution could be arrived at but a total disendowment. The second argument was that no Protestant could advocate the present state of things who believed in the truth of his religion. He, for his part, held that this disendowment was necessary to the fusion of races, and the establishment of that perfect equality, religious as well as social, without which no Government, however subtle, or however well meaning, could ever secure the great end of peace and good-will amongst the governed. Holding as an Irish Protestant these opinions, he could not blind himself to the fact that the Irish Establishment had not in the present debate been defended on its own merits. It had been defended on the grounds of State policy and of State necessity; but he denied the necessity, and disputed the wisdom of the policy. He did not see how it should be that the great mass of Her Majesty's loyal subjects should be treated with grudging toleration whilst so many favours were lavished on a small minority. He (Captain White) was unable to appreciate the policy, which for three centuries, had sown discontent through the length and breadth of the land. There were two arguments advanced in favour of the retention of the Establishment, both of which had been maintained in the debate, and both of which were equally weak and fallacious. The first was, that the statesmen of this country ought to be especially careful how they ventured to touch the Irish Establishment; because they ought to look on the Irish Establishment in the light of a part of the connection of that country with Great Britain. It was said we ought to bear in mind that the Protestants were the English garrison in Ireland; and that we ought to remember that in stopping the pay of that garrison we were alienating their affections. He thought such an argument was unworthy of Protestants, and that, in spite of the ravings of certain ecclesiastics which had been alluded to by his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Longford (Mr. O'Reilly), it was a deliberate insult to the good sense and good feeling of Protestantism in Ireland. But, even admitting the argument, might it not be fairly said that the genuine gush of loyal feeling and gratitude from a whole people, which would be the result of generous legislation, would amply compensate for the loss of such venal, corrupt, and conditional loyalty? The other argument was that this was merely a sentimental grievance. That, however, was an argument which was fairly open to denial. He thought it might fairly be urged that the funds still flowed from the pockets of the Roman Catholic tenant-farmers, and that the hardship remained in all its glaring injustice in the case of every Roman Catholic member of the community. But what grievance was so great and so intolerable as one which, while galling the honest pride of men, and lacerating their tenderest feelings and sympathies, outraged their sense of justice, and made them writhe under the torture of an undeserved lash? The Roman Catholics of Ireland had covered that country with most magnificent cathedrals, monuments of their religious zeal, which would endure almost to the end of time, and it was impossible that such people should not bitterly resent the existence of the Established Church. It was said that the Roman Catholic hostility to that Church was founded merely on a sentiment; but was it not a sentiment that had led to the accomplishment of some of the noblest deeds recorded in history? Suppose the religion of the Roman Catholic minority in England were to become the dominant religion, would not the Protestants of England cry out and protest against such an arrangement? And yet in doing so they would be impelled by what had been ridiculed as mere sentiment. He believed that the existence of the Established Church was the primary obstacle to the pacification of Ireland. What was it that arrayed Irishmen against Irishmen, and made the streets of Belfast periodically flow with Irish blood but the ascendancy of the Irish Church Establishment? ["Oh, oh!"] What was the principal obstacle to a feeling of sympathy between landlord and tenant in Ireland, and what was it that arrayed them in opposing ranks at every succeeding election? It was principally the existence of the Irish Church, and its peculiar character of ascendancy. One was determined by all means, unconstitutional as well as constitutional, illegal as well as legal, to maintain that Establishment; the other struggling against what he believed to be a gross injustice. It had been said that the Irish Church was one of our bulwarks; but an institution that was founded in injustice ought not to receive our support because it happened to be of advantage to us. His belief was that the Protestant religion only languished in Ireland in consequence of the State pampering it had received. He knew that it would erect its head wherever it could do so. But he would rather see it encounter almost any risk in standing upon its own merits than he would see it continue clinging for its prosperity to a system which he knew to be based on the greatest injustice to the great majority of the people.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WARREN) said, that there was a time when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire stood forward as the defender of the Irish Church, and declared "Upon us as has fallen the defence of the National Church;" and he used the expression, that he defended it on the grounds of conscience and truth. He (the Attorney General) concurred in the opinion that it was to be defended upon those grounds. Whether these were still the sentiments of the right hon. Gentleman he knew not, for—

"Tempora mutantur et nos mutamur in illis."

The Defender of the Faith now appeared before them, for the destruction, the demolition, and the annihilation of that Church. The right hon. Gentleman came forward with three Resolutions by way of remedy for the ills of Ireland. They suggested to him a charade:—My first is unpractical; my second is unlawful; my third is unconstitutional; and my whole is eminently factious. It was a fact that for between 300 and 400 years the Church of Ireland had been in possession of certain dignities, powers, and privileges which were ratified and confirmed by at least one solemn national obligation. It was incumbent on the spoliators to show the grounds of their spoliation. It was to be assumed prima facie that she was justly entitled to what she had so long enjoyed. On what grounds was she to be dispossessed? The hon. and learned Member for Sligo (Mr. Serjeant Armstrong) had made a bitter attack on the personal character and conduct of the clergy of Ireland. But he would not waste the time of the House by vindicating their personal character, and if he wished to do so, he might refer, not only to the opinions of a Roman Catholic prelate of the highest character—Bishop Moriarty—on that point, but the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone), in 1865, had himself borne testimony both to their high personal character and the manner in which they had discharged their duty. One argument, however, he must disclaim; he altogether repudiated the sentiment that if they disestablished the Irish Church they would shake the loyalty of the Protestants of Ireland. They might spoliage the Church of her property; but the Protestants of Ireland would remain loyal to the Crown and the United Kingdom so long as England remained the centre of religious liberty. Much discussion had taken place, both within and without that House, respecting the amount of the property of the Irish Church and the manner in which it was to be distributed. The amount of Church property in Ireland had been grossly exaggerated, and an entirely erroneous view was entertained upon that point in this country. Earl Russell, in a book published thirty years ago, trebled the amount of the Irish Church property, and when he re-published the book, although the inaccuracy had been made known to him, he omitted the misstatement, but had not the candour to make a correction of the mistake. The noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs admitted that the property of the Church required a re-distribution. The Government concurred in that opinion; and a Commission was now inquiring how this was best to be done. He now came to the arguments on the question before the House. It was contended that the first Resolution of the right hon. Gentleman must be carried, because justice demanded and expediency required that the Irish Church should be disestablished. But where was the injustice of the possession by the Irish Church of that which was her own property? He believed the title of the Church to the property of the Church was as good as the title of any gentleman to his own property. The only hon. Member who alleged this injustice was the hon. Member for Tipperary (Captain White), who last spoke. But his argument he (the Attorney General) could not understand. Every man who owned an acre of land in Ireland had acquired it according to law subject to the tithe rent-charge. A man wishing to purchase an estate ascertains the rental and the rent-charge, and calculates his purchase-money upon the amount of the rental, diminished by the amount of the rent-charge. There was therefore no injustice on this score. Why was it harder for a Roman Catholic than for a Protestant to pay it under those circumstances? Upon this point the right hon. Member for Portarlington (Mr. Lawson) had once said—

Captain White

"I ask, to whom does the existence of Church property do injury? Does it injure them (the Roman Catholics) in their purses or property? No; it is a property distinct from that of the owner of the land, a property to which the Church has as good a title as the title of any landlord; and I have yet to learn that our national condition would be improved by taking the revenues of the Church and transferring them to other and different purposes."

The right hon. Gentleman further said—

"The existence of that Church property injures no man in purse. No man has a right to complain that his neighbour has an estate which he inherited from his ancestors, and which he will not transfer to him; and as little right have any other persons in the community to try to wrest from the Church the property which it enjoys and which it rightly and beneficially uses. . . . You remember the legislator of old, who was asked why he had allotted no punishment in his laws to the crime of parricide, and he answered, because he did not believe such a crime could be committed. Was I, in coming before you, to negative the monstrous supposition that my sacrilegious hand could ever be raised to take away the life of that Church which gave to me my own."

And what right or claim had the Roman Catholics to the revenues of the Established Church? For 300 years they had been out of possession of the property; and even according to their own laws, 100 years was sufficient to create what Sir Robert Peel said was the best title in the world—a title by prescription. Not only had the Roman Catholics been out of possession, but they had acquiesced in the adverse possession. At the time of the passing of the Catholic Relief Act it was distinctly understood that they agreed, in consideration of that Act, to recognize the inalienable right of the Established Church in Ireland to its property. The right hon. Gentleman said that injustice was involved if the existence of the Established Church in Ireland made the possession inconsistent with religious equality. The right hon. Gentleman treated the existence of the Irish Church as a grievance, because it was inconsistent with religious equality. But did the right hon. Gentleman mean to say that religious equality was an essential condition of right and justice? If that were so the proposition could have nothing to do with any mere question of majorities and minorities, and the existence of the Church of Scotland with its endowments was a grievance to the members of the Free Church; while in England the maintenance of the Established Church was a grievance to the Roman Catholics. That was a necessary consequence of the principle laid down by the right hon. Gentleman; and who could say whether—on some future occasion, when the right hon. Gentleman, after having held office, should be again in Opposition and the Liberal party should be like a flock of sheep who did not know their shepherd—he might not declare in the use that the existence of the Established Church in this country was an injustice and a wrong, and might not tell them, if they should be taunted with the charge of inconsistency, that they must be very short-sighted not to have perceived that he had finished the germ of his argument in the speech in which he introduced the present motion. There was no drawing back from it. If the right hon. Gentleman applied the principle of religious equality to the Church of Ireland he was bound to apply it to the Church of Scotland. For his part he disputed the principle of religious equality, while he held to the principle of religious toleration. Would the right hon. Gentleman say that the Pope's Archbishop of Westminster stood in a position, or ought to stand in a position, of equality with the Queen's Archbishop of Canterbury? But it was further said that the maintenance of the Established Church in Ireland was inexpedient. And upon what ground was that statement put forward? Irish discontent! There could be no doubt that discontent existed in Ireland. But there was no evidence to show that the existence of the Established Church was the cause of that discontent; while they had before them ample evidence that the discontent was embodied in a craving for nationality and hatred of British rule. There was also evidence to show that absenteeism was one of the causes of the Irish discontent; and he would ask the House if the annihilation of the Irish Church would tend in any way to its removal. Irish disaffection might be regarded as having found its exponent in Fenianism, and in a desire for the repeal of the Union. On that subject he would refer to the highest authority he could adduce—John Mitchell, who only a few months ago had been offered and had refused the leadership of the Fenian movement. No man probably knew more about Fenianism, and John Mitchell, writing in November last, said—

The Irish Established Church seems to be set up as an untenable post; and the Established Church is the main stronghold of British power in Ireland. The whole British system hangs together, and stands or falls together. Let no man suppose that the question of Irish independence is an isolated question—that Ireland can be constituted an independent kingdom, or republic, and that Great Britain and she can go on peaceably by side, each in her own way. No; Irish independence means the abolition of British monarchy—and so much the better. It has cumbered the earth too long."

The Attorney General for Ireland

He would now call the attention of the House to a speech delivered at Limerick a few days ago by the Roman Catholic Dean O'Brien. After speaking of justice and national life, he proceeded to say—

"Everyone knows that our Bishops will be with us when the time comes, for none love Ireland better; and they have always blessed the cause which justice sustains by the pleadings of truth and prudence."

And he ended by saying—

"Let us also honestly say that the Church established by the law is a premium to anti-national sentiment. We shall make more Irishmen by the repeal of the Union between Church and State than we have lost by five years' emigration; and, better than all, we shall make unity in the land."

While, therefore, it would be impossible by the overthrow of the Established Church in Ireland to diminish Fenianism or the desire for the repeal of the Union, they should take care not to contribute in any way to an increase in the animosity which existed between the Protestants and Roman Catholics. Was it not extremely probable that the members of a voluntary Church would be less likely to live in harmony with their Catholic neighbours than the members of an endowed Church? The overthrow of the Church, far from curing absenteeism, would lead to an increase of the evil; because the Protestant gentry who resided in the Southern and Western parts of Ireland, in the remote districts, would leave the country when they found themselves and their families deprived of the consolations of their religion in life and of its ministrations in death. If they over-ruled the Act of Union by passing such a Resolution as this they would be breaking a national compact solemnly entered into—a compact the more solemn inasmuch as, at the time it was agreed to, a declaration was made by the Roman Catholic laymen and Bishops of Ireland that the property of the Established Church should be safe and should not be disturbed by them. He trusted that the House would not again have to listen to sneers at "the cant of national faith." He therefore appealed to the House, unless the injustice were glaring, unless the expediency was demonstrated, unless they were prepared to cast to the winds the obligations imposed upon them by the Act of Union, not to pass the Resolutions proposed by the right hon. Gentleman, but to vote for the Amendment of the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs.

MR. BRIGHT: The House will not expect me to follow the legal argument of the right hon. and learned Member who has just sat down. I entertain a firm belief that those legal cobwebs which are spread, and which are supposed to, and do in the minds of many Gentlemen, interpose between the conviction of a great evil and the necessity of justice, will be swept away before long by the almost unanimous opinion of the people of the Three Kingdoms. During this debate, which now has only lasted two nights, there has been, if not a remarkable change of opinion, a remarkable change of expression. Last night we had an interesting speech from the noble Lord who generally sits opposite me, the noble Lord the Member for Stamford (Viscount Cranborne). I refer only to the beginning of his speech, in which he spoke of his affection for the principle of the Church Establishment. There was a hesitation in his manner; he had a strong love for his principle, but it appeared to me that he thought the time was come when even that cherished principle would have to be surrendered. From the Treasury Bench we had a speech from the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, and when he sat down it is difficult to say what was the precise impression made upon the House at large. But I think, on the whole, the impression made on the other side of the House—his own side—was by no means a comfortable one. Now to me it is—and I think to the House it is—a misfortune that we have a Government that speaks with a different voice from night to night. We had it last year, and I presume, from the example of the debate which lately took place on the Motion of the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Maguire), and on this Motion, we are about to see a repetition to it. Now, the fact is, that the position of the Government is one of great difficulty and perplexity. In point of fact, the position of the Government is one which I should call, in our Constitutional system, altogether unnatural. They are the Ministers, the Leaders of a minority of the House; and whilst they sat as Leaders of the minority in Opposition they defended the principles of their party, and they regarded apparently with satisfaction all their past career. The moment they are transferred to the Treasury Bench they find themselves in this difficulty, that although their party may still wish to cling to their past opinions, there is something in the very air, there is something throughout the mind of the whole kingdom, which teaches them that their past opinions are impossible in their new position. The noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn made a speech not long ago at Bristol. In that speech he expressed what I am quite sure were his honest opinions with regard to the condition of Ireland. He stated that the condition of Ireland was one painful and dangerous, and to us, in appearance at least, discreditable, and, in fact, he used many other words of the same character. He said we had a strange and perplexing problem to solve; that in Ireland there was a miserable state of things. Then he said, "If we look for a remedy, who is there that can give us an intelligible answer? Ireland is the question of the hour." Well, that was not altogether at variance—in fact I should say not at all at variance—with the speech of the Chief Secretary for Ireland. The Chief Secretary, in that candid and fair manner in which he always addresses the House, told us, I believe, as far as he knew, the facts as regards his country. But immediately afterwards we had a declaration from the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government that there was no crisis at all—that, in point of fact, the condition of Ireland was a normal condition, and that there was no necessity for anything remarkable or unusual in the legislation that was required. Now, to-night we had a speech from the Home Secretary, and I may say that every speaker on that side of the House has admitted that that speech was entirely in opposition, in its tone, its purpose, and its principle, to the speech of the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn. Now, it seems to me the Home Secretary to-night answered the Foreign Secretary of last night, and I suppose, if the debate goes on until Thursday, probably the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, or perhaps the Secretary of State for India, will answer the speech of the Secretary of State for the Home Department. But all this shows us that the House is in a wrong position. We have a minority in office, which cannot assert its own views with safety; nor can it with any more safety directly adopt our views; and thus, when on that side of the House a Minister gets up and makes what is called a Liberal speech on this question to us who are in Opposition, that creates discontent; and then another Minister gets up and makes a speech of an exactly opposite character, in order to concile the discontented adherents of the Government. Now, what is really absurd about it is this, that there is a kind of confusion and chaos in the House. We have a Government which is not a Government, and we have an Opposition that is not an Opposition, because really we do not oppose anything that you propose. Our propositions are not based upon your own principles, which you held when you sat on this (the Opposition) side of the House, but on our principles, and therefore we are not in Opposition at all, but we help you as much as possible to carry out, not your own principles, but ours. Whatever compensation it may be to right hon. gentlemen who sit on the Bench and enjoy the dignities and emoluments of office, I think there are many honourable men, on whom I am looking at this moment, who do not observe the course of these proceedings with entire satisfaction. But now, notwithstanding these difficulties, there remains this great question which we must discuss, and which, if possible, we must settle. I say, notwithstanding some observations to the contrary I have heard, that the people of the Three Kingdoms are looking with anxious suspense at the course which Parliament may take on this question. The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary on one occasion spoke of this question, of this proposition, being something in the nature of a revolution. But, if it be a revolution, after all it is not so great a one as one could suppose from the force and energy of the speech which he has delivered to-night—a speech which, although I differ from his views, was, I must say, a very good speech—in which he brought into the House a good deal of the force and energy of the people of that great county (Yorkshire) from which he comes. But, the fact is, that we are only about to deal with a question which affects, according to the census, something under 700,000 people. I observe hon. Gentlemen talking of the Protestants of Ireland as being one-fourth of the whole population—of being 1,500,000. That is fanciful exaggeration. According to the Census they are not more than 500,000, and let hon. Gentlemen bear this in mind—when the Census enumerators go round, if a man is not a Catholic or a Presbyterian, he is put down, unless he can state he is of some other sect, as an Episcopalian. Judging from what takes place in this country, we may believe that out of those 700,000 persons there must be a considerable number who never go to church, and who, politically or religiously, have no interest in the Church. Therefore, I believe, speaking correctly, it would not be possible to show that there are Episcopals in Ireland in intimate connection with the Established Church to the amount of more than from 500,000 to 600,000. Now, that will not come to more than 100,000 families, and that will not be very much more than the population of Liverpool, or Manchester, or Glasgow; so that, in point of fact, this question, which is held to be a revolution, and which eminent lawyers talk about by the hour from dark recesses into which we never enter—this great question affects only about the population of the city of Glasgow, or of Liverpool, or of Manchester. And it is for a population so small as this, I am told—for I am not versed in computations of this kind—you have no less than twelve Bishops and two Archbishops, and that you have devoted for their services—for their religious services—not less than the annual income arising from a capital sum estimated at, at least, £10,000,000 or £12,000,000 sterling. Now, if their system of teaching is really very good, I must say there ought to be in Ireland a more perfectly moral and religious population among the Protestants than there is in any other country in the world. Now, what are we going to do? What is the House going to do if we adopt the Resolutions of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire? If the House accept the advice of the majority sitting on this side, what are we about to do? We are not going to commit any vital wrong upon that one city population of 500,000 or 600,000. When we have done everything that I have suggested should be done, we shall leave them in as comfortable a position as the majority of the people of Scotland are in at this moment. [“Oh.”] We shall leave them as well off as eight or nine-tenths of the population of Wales are; we shall leave them as well off as half—and not the least religious half—of the people of England are; we shall leave them as well off as the English, Scotch, Welsh, and Irish people who form the population in our colonies, whether in North America or Australia. And what can be more monstrous than for Gentlemen to come here from Ireland—and there may be some from England—and tell us we are bringing about a revolution, that we are committing an enormous oppression, that we are hazarding the loyalty of the people of the North of Ireland, when, after all, the most any of us proposes to do is that the population will be left at least as well off as any of the various populations of the Empire I have just described? I hope hon. Gentlemen opposite will be convinced it is not a bottomless abyss we are going to plunge their friends into. Although it is a very small question for the Church in Ireland and for the Church people, I hold it is an infinitely larger question for the Catholic population of the United Kingdom. Now, the right hon. and learned Gentleman who spoke last relies much upon law. I suppose it will be admitted that there are only two pretences on which the State Church—the Protestant Church—can exist in Ireland. The one is religious—the other is political. Now, has anybody been able to show that, as a religious institution, it has not been a deplorable failure—because clearly, the original intention, the original hope, was that the people of Ireland would be drawn from the Church of Rome and brought into harmony with the Church of England. Well, I undertake to say, from the time of the first establishment of the Protestant Church in Ireland until now—reckoning up all the Catholics on the one side and the Protestants on the other—it could not be shown, and it is not to be believed—it has ever added really in 100 persons not even one person of the actual number of Protestants in that kingdom of Ireland. The thing has been an entire failure—a failure deplorable, and almost ludicrous, as an engine for converting the Catholic population. But it has not only not made Catholics into Protestants, but it has made Catholics in Ireland more intensely Roman than the members of that Church are found to be in any kingdom in Europe or country in America. And what is more than that, I think it can be demonstrated that the existence of the Protestant Church in Ireland—whether missionary or not in pretence—has not only not converted the Catholics themselves, but has made it absolutely impossible that anybody else, or any other Church, should convert them. Because, if you look and see how the Protestant Church has been connected with the State, and with the politics of the country, with the supremacy of the landed proprietors, with the supremacy of the Protestant party, with all the dark records of the past, you will see the effect has been to make of Catholicism in Ireland not only a faith, but absolutely a patriotism. I think I might appeal to every Member of the House who now hears me whether, if he had been placed in Ireland with his father before him among the Catholic population—I ask him whether he would not have felt that if he threw off his allegiance to his Church, and if he entered the portals of this garrison Church, that would have been to him not only a change of faith, but a denial as it were of his birth and of his country? I have felt always in considering this question—and I have considered it much for twenty-five years past—that all the circumstances of that Church in Ireland have been such as to stimulate the heart of every Catholic to a stronger adherence to his own faith, and to a determined and unchangeable rejection of the faith and the Church which were offered to him by the hands of the Conquest. Now, there is one point on this, too, which is important, that the more you have produced in Ireland dissatisfaction with Imperial rule, the more you have thrown the population into the hands of Rome. Now, I hope I shall offend no Catholic Member in this House when I say that I consider it one of the great calamities of the world that there are in many countries millions of Catholic population who are liable to be directed in much of their ordinary conduct, and oftentimes in their political conduct, through the Bishops and clergy from the centre of the city of Rome. I think that is a misfortune—I think it is a misfortune to the freedom of the world. And I think more than that, that it is a misfortune to every Catholic Church in every country; for it tends rather to prevent it from being wholly national, and it prevents also such changes and such reformatations as, I believe, are necessary in the progress of every Church. Well, now we see some result of it in other countries of Europe—notably, at this moment, in Austria. There is a contest going on with the Roman power even in that country, which lately we thought was the very last in the race for freedom. There is no country in Europe probably at this moment in which the Catholic Church and population are more entirely subject to the direct influence of a certain number of persons, of whom most of us know nothing, who pull the strings of the Catholic world in the city of Rome, than the country of Ireland. Well, I attribute much of that which I think a great evil to the existence of the Protestant Church in Ireland. ["Oh!"] Why, you know perfectly well that the great discontent of Ireland is marked out mainly by the Catholic population, and you know that that population is even at this moment, more than it was some years ago I am afraid, subject directly to political influences from Rome; and I am satisfied that it is for the interest of the Catholic population of Ireland in that respect, and it is for the interest of this great nation and of this Imperial Government, that whatsoever be the tie between the Catholic population of Ireland and the Government in Ireland, that at least we ought to take away every obstacle that can lessen in the smallest degree the loyalty of that people to the Imperial Crown. Well, if this Church has failed as a religious institution, how stands it as a political institution? Why, it was appointed not only to convert the Catholics, but to secure the Union. An hon. Gentleman with a courage that I should not like to imitate, said, that if the 5th Article of the Act of Union should be altered, then, in point of fact, the Union is as good as abolished. I see the hon. Gentleman up there, and I think he is not the only one who said it in the course of this discussion. It is a very old and not a very strange device to expect the people to be made loyal through the instrument of the clergy. I know that many centuries ago a monk of some celebrity at the Court of Louis of Bavaria told the monarch, "You defend me with the sword, and I will defend you with the pen." Well, we have been during all this time defending this Church with the sword. The sword has scarcely ever been out of the hand of the governing power in Ireland. And if a fair, simple, and unadorned narrative were given of the transactions of this Parliament with Ireland, with regard to its different enactments—coercive restrictions, suspensions of the Habeas Corpus Act, and so forth—it would form a narrative which would really astonish the world, and would greatly discredit us. Well, Sir, after all this supremacy I am afraid it is not too much to say that many victims have perished on the scaffold in Ireland, and that the fields of Ireland have been more than once drenched with the blood of her people. But, after all this is done, we are not a bit more secure. It is no matter which Government sits on the Bench opposite. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire was there 70 years ago, and on that occasion, by the consent of his Colleagues and the then

Mr. Bright

Mr. Bright

Home Secretary, had to introduce the Bill for the suspending of the Habeas Corpus Act. Now you are on that side of the House, and you have to do the same. Nobody says it is not necessary. I am not prepared to say it has not been necessary at other times. But surely if this be necessary—and if there is this painful duty to perform at various times—it shows that this matter is not very secure in Ireland. In fact, Sir, this is the most painful thing that we have witnessed lately that the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act has become so common that it causes no remark. The measure is introduced into the House. An Irish Member makes some remarks about it, and it is passed, and we suspend the liberties of one of the Three Kingdoms from year to year. And the Prime Minister has the courage—I might also use another word—he has the courage to get up and say there is nothing in the nature of a crisis in Ireland, and that things, in point of fact, are going on there very much as usual, and that the House of Commons is not required to do anything in particular for that country. What you have in Ireland is this. There is anarchy, which is subdued by force, and after centuries of rule—not our rule, but that of our forefathers—we have got no farther than this. We have not reconciled Ireland to us, and we have done none of those things which the world says we ought to have done; and at this moment—in the year 1868—we are discussing the question whether it is possible to make any change with reference to the Established Church in Ireland which will bring about a better state of feeling between the people in that country and the Imperial Government. Well, Sir, I am afraid there has been very little statesmanship, and very much neglect, and I think we ought to take shame to ourselves, and, if possible, to try to get rid of some of our antiquated prejudices on this matter, and look at it as men would look at it from a distance, and whose vision is not impaired by the passionate condition of things which in this country has so often prevailed with regard to this question. Well, now, what is the remedy that is now offered? What do people say of it? Now, I challenge hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House to deny this if they can. Do you not know that out of 500,000 Episcopalians in Ireland there are many—there are some in the Irish nobility, some landed proprietors, some magistrates, even some of the clergy, a great many Irishmen—who believe at this moment that it is of the very first importance that the propositions of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire should be carried. Now, I am not going to overstate my case. I do not say that all of them are of that opinion, or that half of them, or that one-fourth of them are. I state no number; but of this I am certain, that there is an influential, a considerable, and, as I believe, a wise minority, who are in favour of distinct and decided action on the part of Parliament with regard to this question. But if you ask the whole of the Catholic population of Ireland—be they nobles or be they commoners, landed proprietors, magistrates, merchants, shopkeepers, tenant-farmers—perhaps, of the whole number of Catholics of Ireland, being, I do not know how many times—I suppose eight or nine times—the number of the Episcopalians, these are probably, without exception, of opinion that it would be greatly advantageous and just to their country if the propositions submitted on this side of the House should receive the sanction of Parliament. Now, if some Protestants and some Catholics are agreed that they should remove this Church what would it be if Ireland was 1,000 miles away, and we were discussing it as we might discuss the same state of affairs in Canada? If we were to have in Canada and in Australia all this disloyalty among the Roman Catholic population, owing to the existence of a State Church there, why the House would be unanimous that the State Church in these colonies should be abolished, and that perfect equality and freedom in such matters should be given. But there is a fear in the mind of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary that the malady which would exist in Ireland across the Channel should appear in England; that, in point of fact, the disorder of getting rid of the State Church in Ireland, like any contagious disorder, should cross the Channel—the west wind—lodging first in Scotland, and then crossing the Tweed and coming to England. I think the right hon. Gentleman went so far as to say that he was so much in favour of religious equality that if it were insisted on that it should exist in Ireland by the disestablishment and disendowment of the Protestant State Church, that he would recommend the same policy for England. Now with regard to that, I will just give the House an anecdote which has reference to Scotland. Some years ago I had the pleasure of spending some days at the house of the late Lord Aberdeen, after he had ceased to be Prime Minister. He was talking of the disruption of the Church of Scotland, and he said that nothing in the course of his public life, he thought, had given him so much pain as that disruption and the establishment of the Free Church in that country. But he said he had lived long enough to discover that it was one of the greatest blessings that had ever come to Scotland. He said that they had a vast increase in the number of churches, a corresponding increase in the number of manse or ministers' houses, and that schools had increased, also, to an extraordinary extent; and there had been imparted to the Established Church a vitality and energy which it had not known for a long period; and that education, morality, and religion had received a great advancement in Scotland in consequence of that change. Therefore, after all, a change of this kind is not the most dreadful thing in the world—not so bad as a great earthquake—or as many other things that have happened. I am not quite sure that the Scottish people themselves may not some day ask you—if you do not yourselves introduce and pass it without their asking—to allow their State Church to be disestablished. I met only the other day a most intelligent gentleman from the North of Scotland, and he told me that the minister of the church he frequented had £250 a year from the Establishment fund, which he thought very much too little, and he felt certain that, if the Establishment were abolished, and the Church made into a free Church, the salary of the minister would be advanced at least £500 a year. Well, that is a very good argument for the ministers, and we shall see by-and-by, if the conversion of Scotland makes much advance, that you may be asked to disestablish their Church. The hon. Member for Honiton (Mr. B. Cochrane) last night quoted something which, I dare say, he did not recollect accurately—something which I had said respecting the Church of England; but the fact is that the Church of England is not suffering from the assaults of the Liberation Society; it is suffering from a very different complaint. It is an internal complaint. You have had it before one of the Courts of Law within the last few days, and a very curious decision has been given that candles are lawful, but incense is something horrible and cannot be allowed;

d then the newspapers tell you on the very next Sunday there is more incense in that particular church than there ever had been before. I will tell hon. Gentlemen opposite what it is that endangers the State Church now—I mean a State Church like this in England, against which there is no violent political assault. It is the prevalence of zeal. Whenever zeal creeps into a State Church, it takes naturally different forms—one strongly Evangelical, another strongly High Church or Ritualist, and these two species of zeal work hand on in opposition, until finally there comes a catastrophe, and it is found that it is not Mr. Miall and the Liberation Society—although they have prepared men's minds not to dread the consequence when it really does happen—but it is something wholly different, within the Church itself, that causes the disruption of the Church. The Scottish disruption did not take place from any assaults from without—it took place from zeal and difficulties within; and if you could keep the whole of the Church of England perfectly harmonious within its own borders, it would take a very strong prophet who would undertake to point out the time when it would be dissolved. We will confine ourselves, therefore, to Ireland, and I will ask hon. Gentlemen this: I believe hon. Gentlemen opposite do not usually reject the view which we entertain, that the abolition of the State Church in Ireland would tend to lessen the difficulties of governing that country. I think there is scarcely an hon. Gentleman on the other side who has not no doubt of his previous opinions, some slight misgiving on this point, and some disposition to accept our view of the case. Well, why should you be afraid? Even children, we know, can be induced, by repeated practice, to go into a dark room without fear. You have always, somebody on the other night, lions in the path; I will not dignify them with the name of lions—they are hobgoblins. Now, when you have seen and handled them, as you have a great many times since I have been in the habit of speaking opposite to you, these things are found, after all, to be only hobgoblins; you have learned, after that, that they are perfectly harmless; and when you thought we were doing you harm, by upsetting the Constitution, you have found that, after all, we were doing you good, and the Constitution was rather stronger than it was before. Let me point for a moment some of those changes that were found at the time to be of great difficulty, but have been found to be very wise and good afterwards. When I came into this House, nearly twenty-five years ago, our colonial system was wholly different from what it is now. It has been altogether changed—Sir William Molesworth and his friends were mainly the authors in Parliament of those changes. Well, all our colonies, as we all admit, are much more easily governed and much more loyal than they were in those days. Turning then to our financial system—and I really do not want to offend anyone by mentioning this—you know that our financial system, since Sir Robert Peel came into office in 1841, has been completely changed, and yet the Revenue of the country is larger, which I regard as a misfortune—and not only larger, but more secure by far, if Parliament requires it, than it was at any previous period of our history. Take the old protective system, which the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) and some others have not forgotten. Free Trade, I believe, was a frightful monster. But the protective system is gone; and now every candid man amongst you will admit that industry, being more free throughout the country, is better rewarded; and that the land, which you said would go out of cultivation, and become of no value, sells for a higher price in the market than it ever brought before. There are two other points on which I wish to add a word. One was mentioned last night after most of the Members had gone home. The balance of power was once considered—what shall I say?—the very beginning and ending of our foreign policy; indeed, I am not sure that there are not some old statesmen in the other House who believe in it even yet. What was done last night? Why, the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho), who comes up from Scotland brimfull of enthusiasm for impossible projects, proposed to put in words which had been rejected from the Preamble of the Mutiny Bill relating to the preservation of the balance of power. [Lord ELCHO: I only proposed to re-insert them.] What did one of your most distinguished Ministers, the right hon. Baronet the Secretary for War, say in reference to the proposition? He said he thought it singular that the hon. Member for Chatham (Mr. Otway) should have proposed to remove the words, because they really meant nothing; but he was still more surprised that the noble Lord should have asked to have them replaced. Well, thus you see that this balance of power is gone, and yet England, I will undertake to say, under the national and fair administration of Foreign Affairs by the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn, is just as much respected by all foreign Powers as ever it was when we were ready to meddle in every stupid quarrel that arose upon the Continent of Europe. Now, there is only one other thing to which I will advert—the question of the representation. You know, in 1830, there was almost no representation. There were a few towns in which there was almost universal suffrage, and many scores of rotten boroughs—in fact, the whole system had got into such a state of congestion that it could not be tolerated any longer, and we had a small, but which might have been a very large, revolution, in amending that state of things. Last year you, who had seen this hobgoblin for years, who had thought, I have no doubt—many of you—that I was very unwise and injudicious in the mode in which I had proposed to extend the suffrage—last year you found out that it was not so monstrous a thing after all, and you became absolutely enthusiastic in support of the right hon. Gentleman's Reform Bill. Well, you believe now, and the First Minister, if this was an occasion on which he had to speak about it, would tell you not to be afraid of what was done. He would tell you that, based on the suffrage of a larger portion of your countrymen, Parliament would henceforth be more strong and venerated by the people than ever it had been before. If that is true of Parliament, what shall we say of the Throne itself after all these changes? I will venture to say that, whatever convenience there may be in hereditary monarchy, whatever there may be of historic grandeur in the Kingly office, whatever of nobleness in the possessor of the Crown, in all these things is it not true that everything is at least as fully recognized by the nation as it ever was at any previous period of our history? I do not mention these things to reproach anybody here. We all have to learn. There are many in this House who have been in process of learning for a good while. In fact, I am not sure that my right hon. Friend the Member for South Lancashire did not admit to me that on this very question of the Church his opinions have been greatly expanded, and have been ripening for a series of years.

Mr. Bright

That is greatly to the credit, not only of his head, but of his heart. We have seen even amongst you on that side of the House a progress in many things—a progress which I say is most gratifying to me—though that, of course, is a very small matter—and it is also a very wholesome indication that the minds of men are becoming more open to the consideration of great principles in connection with great public questions. And this lets us see that in future we shall have—as, no doubt, we shall have—a Government more in accordance with public opinion and public interests than we have had in past times. Now, in my opinion, the changes that are made in our time are the glory of our time. I believe that our posterity will regard them as the natural and blessed fruits of the growth of intelligence, and of the more comprehensive justice of this age. I mention these things to ask you not to close your ears to the arguments, nor to close your hearts to the impressions of justice which must assail you with regard to this question which is now being debated so much in Great Britain and Ireland. I might appeal to a right hon. Gentleman who perhaps is in the House—the Member, I think, for the county of Limerick—who was at a very remarkable meeting held the other day in Limerick on this very question. I have heard from sources which cannot, I think, be questioned, that it was a very remarkable meeting—one of the most remarkable that has been held in Ireland, I will venture to say, for the last twenty years, or, perhaps, I might say for a longer period; that there was a far more healthy tone of mind, of expression, of conduct, of feeling, of everything we wish to see, than has been known there for a very long period. I believe and know—because I am told by witnesses who cannot be contradicted—that that change arose from the growing belief that there was a sufficient majority in this House—that the general opinion of Parliament was sufficiently strong, to enable this measure of justice and reconciliation to be passed. Now, I ask you, if, after what has taken place, you are able—unhappily able—to prevent the progress of the movement which is now afoot for the disestablishment of the State Church in Ireland; are you not of opinion that it would create great dissatisfaction, that it would add to the existing discontent, that it would make those that are hopeful despair, and that men—rash men if you like strong and earnest men, would speak to those that hitherto have not been rash, and have not been earnest, and would say, "You see at last; is this not a proof convincing and unanswerable, that the Imperial Parliament, sitting in London, is not capable of hearing our complaints and of doing that justice which we, as a people, require at their hands?" Do not imagine that I am speaking with personal hostility to the right hon. Gentleman who is our Chief Minister here? Do not imagine for a moment that I am one of those, if there be any, who are hoping to oust hon. Gentlemen from that (the Treasury) Bench in order that I may take one of the places occupied by them. I would treat this subject as a thing far beyond and far above party differences. The question comes before the House, of course, as all these great questions must, as a great party question; and I am one of the Members of this party. But it does not follow that the Members of a party should be actuated by a party spirit, or by a miserable ambition to take the place of a Minister of the Crown. I say there is something far higher and better than that; and never there was a question presented to Parliament which invited the exercise of the highest feelings of Members of the House, I say this is one of those questions. When, I say, do not be alarmed at what is proposed. Let us take this Irish State Church, let us take it not with a rude—namely against rudeness and harshness in legislative action—but if not with a rude, still with a resolute grasp. If you adopt the policy we recommend you will pluck the weed which pollutes the air. ["Oh, yes."] I will give hon. Gentleman consolation in the conclusion of the sentence—say you will pluck up a weed which pollutes the air; but you will leave a free Protestant Church, which will be hereafter an ornament and a grace to all those who may be brought within the range of its influence. Sir, I said in the beginning of my observations that there were the people of the three kingdoms who were waiting with anxious suspense for the solution of this question. Ireland waits and longs for it. I appeal to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Limerick (Mr. Monsell); I appeal to that meeting which he can describe, and perhaps may describe, to the House; and I say that Ireland waits and longs for a great act of reconciliation. I say, further, that England and Scotland are eager to make atonement for past crimes and past errors; and the last thing I shall address to the House is this—I say it depends upon us—this House of Commons—this Imperial Parliament—whether that reconciliation shall take place, and whether that atonement shall at length be made.

Mr. Bright

MR. ROEBUCK moved the adjournment of the debate to Thursday.

Motion agreed to.

Debate further adjourned till Thursday.

House adjourned at Twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, April 1, 1868.

MINUTES.]—SELECT COMMITTEE—On Grand Jury Presentments (Ireland), Lord John Browne discharged, Colonel French added.

PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—Electric Telegraphs; United Parishes (Scotland).*

First Reading—United Parishes (Scotland)* [81]; Electric Telegraphs [82].

Second Reading—Religious, &c., Buildings (Sites) [18]; Libel [3].

Committee—Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings [1]—R.P.; Industrial Schools (Ireland)* [6].

Report—Industrial Schools (Ireland)* [6].

FEVER AT THE MAURITIUS—THE 86TH REGIMENT.—QUESTIONS.

MR. BARCLAY said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether any steps have been taken by the Mauritius Government, since the renewed outbreak of fever, to promote sanitary reform in the town of Port Louis; and, whether any instructions have been sent, or are about to be sent, by the Home Government, empowering either the Governor or the General Board of Health to enforce the sanitary measures required?

MR. ADDERLEY, in reply, said, the latest information from the Mauritius was dated February 16, and arrived on March 18. It stated that the fever was on the increase in Port Louis, and had spread to the interior. At that time the chief medical officer stated that the fever had assumed a much milder form, and was better understood; while the attacks were in a considerably smaller proportion fatal. He also stated that there was now an ample supply of quinine and other drugs, which there had not been at first, and which were most useful in meeting the attacks. With respect to the second portion of the Question of the hon. Member, measures had been taken to increase the number of medical officers available. Application with this view had been made by the Government to Madras for English doctors, and two had been sent as well as a foreign doctor. His noble Friend (the Duke of Buckingham), immediately on receipt of the last intelligence, had given directions that two additional English medical men should go out from this country by the first mail. The Duke of Buckingham had also called the attention of the local Government to the apparent want of concert and efficiency of the municipality of Port Louis in relation to sanitary matters, and suggested alterations in its constitution with a view of increasing its efficiency. The Board of Health would be increased by the addition of the Officer in command of the troops, the commanding Officer of the Engineers, the Assistant Military Secretary, and an Officer of the Royal Artillery. Everything had been done that could be done in such a case.

MR. WHALLEY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, What measures have been taken for the removal of the 86th Regiment from the Mauritius, and within what period it may be expected that the Regiment will, by this or other means, be rescued from its present perilous condition; and, with reference to the General commanding in the Mauritius and the Colonel of the Regiment, whether any steps have been taken or are intended to fix upon those officers respectively the responsibility for the disastrous results of their having lauded the said Regiment, in disregard of instructions and in defiance of the express warning of the local authorities?

MR. ADDERLEY said, the circumstances of the landing of the 86th Regiment would be better stated by his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War, who was at present absent from the House; but he might, in the meanwhile, observe that circumstances had been very much misunderstood, and much greater precautions had been taken as to the landing and disposal of these troops when landed than had been supposed. He believed little bad result had followed. There had been some sickness, but only one death in that Regiment. The measures which had been taken with a view to the reformation of the municipality of Port Louis did not affect the officers to whom the Question of the hon. Gentleman referred. They simply had reference to the efficiency of the municipality in carrying out sanitary measures in the town of Port Louis.

RELIGIOUS, &c., BUILDINGS (SITES)
BILL—[BILL 18.]

(Mr. Hadfield, Mr. Bazley, Mr. Leeman,
Mr. Akroyd.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. HADFIELD, in moving the second reading of this Bill observed that it was very nearly in the words of a measure which last Session passed through the House without a dissentient voice. Two Members of the Cabinet expressed their opinion in favour of that measure, and a like opinion had been expressed by two Chairmen of Committees appointed to consider the Mortmain Act, 9 Geo. II., c. 36. He was not aware that on the present occasion there was any real opposition. The late Lord Chancellor (Lord Cranworth) had stated that he could see no possible objection to the Bill. Its provisions extended to all sorts of charitable and scientific, as well as religious societies, and it really only conferred on them the same powers as was given by the Companies Act, 25 & 26 Vict. c. 89, s. 21, to joint-stock companies—namely, power to acquire two acres of land for the purpose of building for any charitable institution which they might require. By the provisions of the Mortmain Act, certain restrictions were imposed on such institutions, and the Bill proposed that whenever land was purchased for the purposes of such an institution there should be no necessity for incurring such an enormous expense as was at present required to obtain a proper conveyance of land. The Mortmain Act contained two sets of provisions: the first was that no person should devise land for charitable purposes, and that when any gift was made by deed, the deed must within six months be enrolled in Chancery, and the donor live twelve months after the execution of the deed; and the second was, that every conveyance for a charitable institution should be void (see Section 3) except it were duly executed and duly enrolled six months after execution, although a full and valuable consideration should have been actually paid for the purchased property. It was with the latter only that he wished to interfere. He did not object to the enrolment of deeds and the consequent expense, in the case of large and rich institutions; but the present regulations ope-

ed as a great restriction to the establishment of many of the smaller religious, benevolent, and literary societies of the kingdom. In many schools the requirements of the Mortmain Act were dispensed with altogether. All that he wished was that charitable institutions, not exceeding 10 acres, should be freed from the expense which the present state of the law put upon them. Since the passing of the Mortmain Act thousands of deeds, made and executed for full consideration paid, had become void in consequence of their not having been executed in the form prescribed by the Act and enrolled, and Acts of Parliament had from time to time been passed for the purpose of restoring deeds of this character to their full legal operation. There was already an Act to allow trustees to apply at any time to the Court of Chancery to be allowed to enrol, and to make good, their deeds; and since 1860 there had been several thousand deeds enrolled in the Court of Chancery, and thus made legal and binding, under recent Acts of Parliament; whereas for many years they had been illegal. One remarkable instance of the bad effect of the old law was that, many years ago, of the Manchester Infirmary, in reference to which the requirements of the Mortmain Act had not been for fifty years complied with, and during this time the heir to the estate might have taken possession; but instead of doing this he nobly completed the title of the trustees.

MR. HEADLAM said, that some years ago he was Chairman of a Committee upon the Laws of Mortmain, and he might say that though, in that Committee, there was great variety of opinion upon the general subject, yet there was perfect unanimity on this point, that there should be an exception in favour of institutions such as those mentioned in this Bill. In a former Committee, also, he believed that there was similar unanimity in favour of such an exception.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he would offer no objection to the second reading of the Bill. Last year a clause had been moved in "another place" which had induced the hon. Gentleman to give his Bill; but that was a clause which did not appear necessary to insist upon in a Bill which applied only to the objects which this Bill contemplated. He by no means said that it was unnecessary to keep those restrictions on grants and alienations of land which were imposed by the

Mr. Hadfield

Laws of Mortmain; yet, having regard to the small quantities of land which would be taken under this Bill, he should certainly offer no objection to the measure.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Tuesday, 21st April.

LIBEL BILL—[BILL 3.]

(Sir Colman O'Loghlen, Mr. Baines.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN moved the second reading of this Bill.

SIR ROBERT COLLIER wished to guard against its being supposed that he assented to a portion of this Bill, which some persons thought was a very essential part of it—namely, the third clause, by which it was proposed to make every speaker at a public meeting liable for words spoken to the same extent as if he had sat down and deliberately written and published them. He did not wish to discuss the question on the second reading of the Bill; but he begged to give notice that in Committee upon the Bill he should move that the clause to which he referred be struck out. In the Committee the question could be fully discussed.

MR. WHALLEY said, he would also abstain from discussing the Bill at its present stage. He hoped there would be a discussion of the principle of the Bill, to a certain extent when it was in Committee. The law of libel affected the liberty of the subject almost more than any other branch of law. So far as he had heard every one of the petitions in favour of this Bill had originated, if not directly emanated, from parties who were interested in the matter—namely, the representatives of the Press. If there was any injustice whatever in the present law of libel, such was the elasticity of the Common Law of England that any man could go before a Court of Law and say, "Here is an injustice, it is not right that a man should be punished for this transaction." If that could be made clear to the common sense of those who presided over the Court, they could adapt their decision according to the circumstances. If this Bill were passed, it would be impossible for any man to understand the law of libel. The Bill, which had been prepared in Ireland, struck at the root of freedom of speech. The Courts of Law, having administered the law of libel for centuries to the satisfaction of the country, the House was now called upon, for no valid reason, to take the matter into its own hands. He implored the House not to allow the laws of England to be hampered at the caprice of any hon. Irish Member, however learned or however eloquent, more especially if that hon. Member must be supposed, in his attempts to introduce such alterations, to be influenced by a spirit of favour to another system of laws which was in direct opposition to the laws of this country.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Whalley) was mistaken in supposing that this Bill had been prepared in Ireland in the form in which it now came before the House. It underwent considerable examination and alteration last year in Committee of that House and in Select Committee. He did not intend to oppose the second reading of the Bill, although it was a fair matter for discussion in Committee, whether the measure ought to receive the sanction of that House or not. There was an important principle involved in the Bill—he should rather say in the first section, by which it was proposed for the first time to allow an editor or proprietor of a newspaper to show that an alleged libel was a true and fair report of the proceedings at a meeting lawfully assembled for a lawful purpose, open to reporters for the public newspapers, and at which a reporter was present for the purpose of reporting the proceedings of such a meeting for a public newspaper, and that the report was published in such newspaper by the defendant bona fide, without malice, and in the ordinary course of business, and to allow “not guilty” by statute to be pleaded, under these circumstances to an action. It was a fair matter for discussion whether it was expedient that such an extensive alteration in the existing law of libel should be made. It was said that the Bill had been promoted merely in the interest of newspaper proprietors; but he should rather say that it had been introduced for the purpose of protecting the proprietors of newspapers from being liable to actions for libel in cases where they had admitted reports of speeches which, as far as they were aware, contained accurate statements of fact, and where they had published them without malice, merely for the purpose of informing the public upon matters of interest. It had been shown that, on more than one occasion, proprietors of newspapers had sustained considerable hardship in consequence of such reports not being privileged. The principal object of the Bill was to allow newspaper proprietors to publish the proceedings of meetings lawfully assembled for a lawful purpose with a certain amount of impunity, and to enable them to plead in the form pointed out by the Bill that the report was an accurate report of those proceedings, published without malice and in the ordinary course of business. The hon. and learned Member for Plymouth (Sir Robert Collier) had objected to the third clause, by which a speaker of defamatory words at the description of meeting contemplated by the Act was rendered liable to an action for libel. Now, the speaker at such a meeting would be perfectly well aware that his words would be reported in the newspapers and circulated, and that was very different from the case of a man making use of hasty words under circumstances where he could not suppose they would be published. He knew that there was a marked distinction between the law of slander and that of libel, but it was all founded on this—that words uttered orally were fleeting, and were not intended to be permanent. But the distinction in fact between slander and libel was much modified at the present day. At all events, if the first clause of the Bill was carried, and they allowed reports of the proceedings of public meetings to be privileged, they should afford a person defamed by a speaker some opportunity of coming into Court and showing that the charges that had been brought against him were false. The subject was a fair one for discussion in Committee, when he should state at greater length his reasons for believing that some clause should be inserted in the Bill giving the person prejudiced by words published an opportunity of disproving the truth of the charges made against him.

MR. AYRTON said, that the hon. and learned Member for Clare (Sir Colman O’Loghlen) in introducing this Bill in November last, intimated that the Bill would have been passed into a law in the previous Session had it not been for his (Mr. Ayrton’s) opposition to it, and, in truth, the remarks of the hon. and learned Member, instead of being addressed to the merits of the Bill, had rather been addressed to his demerits. In his opinion the Bill had passed through that House last Session in consequence of an assurance that it would go no further. Being one of the many efforts of the hon. and learned Member for the benefit of mankind was suffered to pass in the full conviction that it never could be recognized as part of the law of the land. The hon. and learned gentleman had told them that the Bill had been approved by an illustrious Committee; but, as far as he could test the opinion of that Committee, he did not think that they had been so highly in favour of the Bill as the hon. and learned Gentleman supposed. Every eminent Member of that Committee approved of one fundamental principle of the Bill, while another had told him that he regarded the Bill as most mischievous. It was clear that some distinguished Members of the Committee did not appreciate the legal difficulties of the Bill. He was prepared to show that, even upon the principles which had been laid down, the leading provisions of the Bill ought to be struck out. He was, however, willing to permit it to be read a second time on the understanding that he should take the opportunity of examining into the character of its provisions in Committee. He was ready to admit that the Bill contained some clauses which, when amended, might be useful; and that the clause which placed prosecutions for libel upon the same footing with another class of prosecutions would effect a desirable amendment in the law. The remarks of the Attorney General could be found on examination to furnish a satisfactory reason for adopting the provisions of the Bill. It was said that the Bill was introduced for the benefit of newspaper proprietors. That might be so; but the question was, whether newspapers proprietors ought not to be treated like others who entered into commercial enterprizes for their own profit and advantage, and whether they should not incur the responsibility that naturally attached itself to such enterprizes. He could not understand how Parliament could pass a law by which a man deriving profit from an undertaking could be protected from all the consequence that might arise from his own negligence in the conduct of that undertaking. If he were to sum up in a few words his opinion of this Bill, he should say that it was an attempt to degrade by law one of the most honourable and useful, and, at the same time, most intellectual professions—that of reporting for the public journals—to the level of a mere mechanical process. The effect of the Bill if carried would be to reduce newspaper proprietors to employ mere mechanical reporters, mere stenographers, at a salary of a few shillings per week, to take down the words of a speaker, and write them out just as they were uttered, instead of engaging gentlemen of education, intelligence, and discrimination, who were competent to perform the task of reporting a speech in conformity with decency and with law. The Bill was just such a one as the most ignorant and ill-disposed members of trade unions demanded, in order to enable them to escape the consequences of their illegal acts. It would be a great misfortune if a class of ignorant and incompetent persons were, by an Act which afforded them protection from the responsibility which naturally attached itself to their profession, placed upon an equality with gentlemen of education and intelligence. He thought the subject was a very grave one, as it involved the high character of the press of this country. If this Bill were passed he was afraid it would prove but the first step in a course of legislation which would be likely to endanger that freedom of the press which we at present enjoyed. He had used his best efforts to free the press from the fetters imposed upon it by taxation, and he should deeply regret to see it oppressed by a censorship of any kind. On a future occasion a much wider view of this subject would have to be taken than that suggested by the Attorney General, whose address upon this Bill, instead of being that of a statesman, had been that of a nisi prius lawyer fresh from the defence of his client. And before the Bill was passed he should like to see some one on the Treasury Bench—if such a person ever sat there—capable of grappling with great public questions, who would enter into this grave question with earnestness, instead of allowing the time of the House to be frittered away in listening to legal quibbles.

Mr. Ayrton

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, he was convinced, from the evidence which had been laid before the Select Committee appointed to consider this Bill, and of which he was a Member, that the Press of this country was entitled to some legislative protection against vexatious actions for libel, which were frequently brought by speculative attorneys and involved costs amounting to hundreds, if not thousands of pounds, even although only one farthing damages might be awarded to the plaintiff. Under these circumstances he was prepared to vote for the second reading of the Bill, on the understanding that several material alterations should be made in it in Committee. Although he was willing to give reasonable protection to the proprietors of newspapers against vexatious actions, he was by no means prepared to go the length of exempting them altogether from the necessity for the exercise of that discretion which everybody was bound to use in dealing with the affairs of other people. The first clause of the Bill proposed to give newspaper proprietors the opportunity of pleading that the report complained of was published without malice, and that it was a true and faithful report, produced in the ordinary course of their business. It further provided that the proof this plea should amount to a defence. He thought it would be an improvement that such plea should be received in evidence, but that it should be left to the Court to decide whether such proof in all cases constituted a defence. He confessed he was unwilling to take from the Court a discretion upon this point. It might so happen that though there was no malice on the part of a newspaper proprietor in publishing a certain matter, he might nevertheless be made the means of circulating the malicious statements of others. The provision in the third clause requiring the person uttering the defamatory words to publish a retraction of them in the same newspaper in which his speech had appeared was, in his opinion, not quite satisfactory, seeing that a large number of the edition containing the libel might be circulated throughout the country, while a limited number of copies of the paper only might be published containing the retraction. Something ought to be done to secure the defendant, in a vexatious action, his costs. While he was of opinion that the Press should be free from all previous restraints, he had never gone the length of saying that it ought to be exempted from those penalties which justly fell on it, for the careless or culpable circulation of calumnious and libellous matter. He agreed with the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth (Sir Robert Collier) that it was not advisable to alter the law of slander in the way proposed by the Bill, nor in any way to curtail the liberty of speech, for the sake of giving protection to the newspaper proprietors. It might frequently happen that at vestry and other meetings a speaker might properly, on public grounds, bring against a person provisional charges which called for investigation; and it would be unfair, in such a case, to render the speaker at once liable to an action for libel. He should give his assent to the second reading of the Bill, with the view of agreeing to such Amendments as the discussion in Committee might show to be right.

MR. HENLEY said, he also had served upon the Select Committee upon this Bill, and fully appreciated the great difficulty that existed in dealing with this question. He agreed, on the one hand, that the Press should be freed from all undue restrictions, while, on the other, it should be rendered answerable for any abuse of its privileges. As to the question whether the provision in the Bill rendering a speaker amenable for the words he used should be retained, he must inform the House that the clause as it now stood was altered to its present form in Select Committee. The case of a man who deliberately used words at a meeting where he knew reporters were present for the purpose of publishing his speech was very different from that of the man who casually uttered words which he believed would, in all human probability, go no further, and it was worth the consideration of the House whether some difference should not be made in the law with regard to the two cases. The words of the Bill upon this point were very precise, as they strictly limited its operation to a certain class of meetings at which reporters were known to be present. On the whole, was it not of great advantage to the public that publicity should be given to the proceedings at the vast number of public meetings at which reporters were present? The question must be judged by the balance of convenience. The hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton) had objected to relieve those who published newspapers from their responsibility, on the ground that by adopting such a course Parliament would be degrading the office of reporter. But when hon. Members recollected what the gentlemen of that profession—whose vast skill and accuracy in recording speeches he readily admitted—had to do they would see that it was hardly possible that they could think of anything except of making a faithful transcript of the speaker's words; and really this was all they had to do. It was, therefore, not the reporters, but the proprietors of newspapers, for whose relief the Bill had been introduced, and even they had but little time for exercising their discretion as to what should and what should not be published. It was sometimes extremely difficult to determine what was and what was not a libel, and frequently it puzzled both Judge and jury to determine the question, and yet newspaper proprieors were expected to arrive at a sound legal conclusion at a few minutes' notice. Under these circumstances, he thought that, trying the question by the balance of convenience, it was preferable that the newspaper proprietors should be protected when giving faithful reports of such meetings as were contemplated by the Bill than that they should be made defendants in actions whether real or vexatious, brought against them by those who felt aggrieved by the language of the speakers. It was not right that the newspaper proprietors should be subject to such actions while those who uttered the defamatory words in the presence, perhaps, of 5,000 people, with the full knowledge that they would be reported and published, escaped scot free. He had assented to the Bill in the form in which it left the Select Committee, and unless he heard stronger reasons against it than had yet been adduced he should support it in Committee.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, he did not intend at that moment to enter into any general defence of the Bill, believing that the House was favourable to its second reading, and that it would be better to discuss it clause by clause when they got into Committee, as each of the first five clauses involved an important principle. Under these circumstances, he should fix the Committee for such a day as would enable the whole subject to be fully discussed. In answer to the observations of the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton), he begged to state that he had not charged that hon. and learned Gentleman with having prevented the Bill from passing into a law, but merely with having prevented it from getting into the House of Lords in sufficient time for it to be carried last Session. The Bill was introduced last March twelvemonth, and after being read a second time, was referred to a Select Committee, which included among its Members the right hon. Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe), the right hon. Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley), the Attorney General, and the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck). Having been fully considered by that Committee, the Bill in an altered shape came down to that House, and was discussed clause by clause in Committee. On the third reading of the Bill the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets thought fit to put a Notice upon the Paper to read the Bill a third time on that day six months, but was beaten upon a division by 79 to 18. The effect of that notice was to delay the Bill in this House so long that it could not be considered in the Lords last Session. The first clause of the Bill was agreed to unanimously by the Select Committee, and Clause 3, which was objected to by the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth (Sir R. Collier), was the result of a compromise, and was agreed to by a large majority of the Select Committee. He should be prepared to defend the principles of these clauses in Committee.

Mr. Henley

MR. REARDEN gave his cordial support to the Bill, which he believed was very much wanted. Newspaper proprietors had done their duty admirably, and should not be subject to such restrictions as at present. Being a great reader of newspapers, and a subscriber during thirty-five years to no less than nineteen of them, he thought he was entitled to express an opinion on the subject.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Wednesday, 20th May.

ARTIZANS' AND LABOURERS' DWELLINGS BILL—[BILL 1.]

(Mr. McCullagh Torrens, Mr. Kinnaird, Mr. Locke.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clauses 1 to 5, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 6 (Officer of Health to report as to Condition of Streets).

MR. HARVEY LEWIS objected to its terms as giving too much power to medical officers of health.

MR. SERJEANT GASELEE agreed with the hon. Member for Marylebone (Mr. Harvey Lewis), and said that in legislating on this subject they must take care not to introduce continental despotism.

MR. LEE MAN said, this was one of the most useful clauses of the Bill.

MR. HENLEY complained that as the clause was now drawn the report of the officer of health could be carried out without giving the owner of the premises notice, and his only remedy would be by an appeal. The clause ought to be amended so as to give him notice in the first instance, and allow him to be heard upon the complaint made of the state of his property.

MR. GOLDNEY said, this clause merely provided how the Act was to be put in motion. The subsequent clauses provided for carrying into effect the medical officer's report. The objection might more properly be taken upon the 8th clause.

MR. THOMAS CHAMBERS objected to the clause and to the whole scope and substance of the Bill, on the ground that it would lead to an enormous extent of taxation. Knowing that in Marylebone the limit of endurance had been reached with reference to local taxation he hoped the House would reject the clause. The medical officer was not only to inspect streets and premises, but to report if their condition, state, and situation were injurious or prejudicial to health. There was not a town in the kingdom where exception might not be taken to the situation of houses; and were they on the mere report of the officer of health to have them swept away? This Bill was not required; for more had been done during the last ten years to improve the dwellings of the labouring classes than had been done in the previous 100 years.

MR. M'CULLAGH TORRENS thought it was not within the province of the Committee to renew the discussion on the policy of the measure. The Bill had been twice read a second time, and would have gone through Committee but for want of time. He defended the provision contained in this clause as beneficial and necessary.

MR. HARVEY LEWIS said, there was hardly a street that might not be swept away under the clause. A medical officer might have reported at one time against that House on the ground that its situation in proximity to the Thames was prejudicial to health, and have had it swept away.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he would remind the Committee that the clause was identical with that in the Building Act; so that it was not new. All the clause imposed was that the medical officer should report; and as the principle had been previously affirmed by the House, it was their duty to endeavour to bring the Bill into such a shape as that it should be just to the ratepayers and beneficial to the inhabitants of these miserable and wretched dwellings. This clause, after all, merely provided for a report which need not be carried out. The question of increasing the rates was a material one, and deserved consideration.

SIR J. CLARKE JERVOISE said, he hoped the hon. Member for Marylebone (Mr. Harvey Lewis) would divide the Committee on the clause. They ought to use very great caution before adopting it. He thought it would be very difficult to find an officer of health whose discretion would warrant their intrusting to him the carrying of this clause into operation.

MR. GREENE thought the objection of the hon. Member for Marylebone (Mr. Harvey Lewis) should have been taken at an earlier stage of the inquiry. He had no respect for any man who dared to get up in the House and say the dwellings of the poor were not a disgrace to the country. It was all very well to talk about sweeping away districts—that was all clap-trap. He was in favour of the Bill in the main, and he feared that, if it were now thrown over, legislation upon this important question would be for a long time delayed. He was surprised at the opposition of the hon. Member for Marylebone (Mr. Harvey Lewis) to the measure; and he thought that hon. Gentlemen who went to the hustings with professions of anxiety for the welfare of the working man on their lips ought to carry out those professions practically in the House.

MR. AYRTON said, he trusted the opposition to the clause would be withdrawn. All it did was to carry out to a further extent than had hitherto been done the policy of the Act of 1855. It simply provided that if a house was in a certain bad and unhealthy condition it should be brought under the notice of the local authorities. That, he considered, was a very necessary provision in order to rescue the poor from the consequences of the past neglect of the Legislature. As to the expense he trusted the House would put the expense incurred for the metropolis on the metropolis.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID suggested a modification in the terms of the clause. He was friendly to the measure; but he thought that the scope of the duties assigned to the officer of health was too wide, and he wished to restrict the duties of the surveyor by leaving out the word "prejudicial." "injurious" or "dangerous" was quite sufficient.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, other parties besides the inhabitants of Marylebone had petitioned against the Bill, and the clause under discussion would be so exceedingly expensive in the carrying of it out that practically it would be inoperative. He thought a clause ought to be introduced into the Bill to provide that a certain number of cubic feet of air should be proded for each person by the construction of the dwelling.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 7 agreed to.

Clause 8 (Officer of Health to deliver copies of Report to Clerk of Local Authority and Clerk of Peace).

MR. CANDLISH moved an Amendment to the effect that the contents of the report of the local officer of health affecting the premises of any person should be communicated to that person, in order that he might have an opportunity of removing the nuisances complained of, without the necessity of his being summoned in the first instance before the quarter sessions or the magistrates.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY thought that until the Committee had determined to whom the orders were to be made, they were not in a position to go on with the Bill.

MR. LEEMAN proposed an Amendment which he thought would meet the view of the hon. Gentleman—namely, that a copy of the inspector's report be delivered to the person whose premises were reported to be unhealthy.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 9 and 10 agreed to.

Clause 11 (Local Authority to prepare Plan and Specification of required Works).

MR. CANDLISH suggested that an alteration should be made, for the purpose of giving a discretion to the local authorities. As the clause stood the local authorities would have to carry out the suggestions of the local inspector.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 12 and 13 agreed to.

Clause 14 (Owner to execute specified Works, or sell Premises to the Local Authority).

MR. CANDLISH moved an Amendment that would substitute "fourteen days" for "three calendar months," with the view of preventing owners postponing the execution of works for too long a period.

MR. GRAVES said, the clause as it stood was an exact copy of one which had for some years been working in the most satisfactory manner in Liverpool.

Mr. Labouchere

MR. CANDLISH said, that as this was the case he would withdraw his Amendment.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 15 to 23, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 24 (Local Authority to pay Compensation when total Demolition required).

MR. POWELL moved to omit the words "subject to the provisions of this Act with reference to the use thereof," his object being to leave the owners of property interfered with under the Act in the same condition as other owners of property.

MR. M'CULLAGH TORRENS objected to the proposal.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause amended, and agreed to.

Clauses 25 and 26 agreed to.

Clause 27 (House to be improved may be taken down).

MR. POWELL objected to the effect it must have upon the disposal of the ground from which premises should be removed. It would, he contended, if adopted, impose a restraint upon the use of the land even for purposes that might be desirable for the public good or for the private advantage of the owner. By various local Acts, in force in almost all the large towns, there was ample power given to the local authorities to regulate the erection of buildings. He proposed to omit certain words, to get rid of the objectionable effect of the clause.

MR. GOLDNEY observed that the clause was simply conditional, and could not be acted upon without the previous assent of the local authorities.

MR. GRAVES remarked that the point under discussion was one with reference to which previous legislation had failed. It happened that, after the ground was cleared, there were instances of warehouses and sheds being erected on the site, thus preventing the free circulation of the air, and causing an evil as great as the one intended to be redressed by the clearing of the ground. In fact, a very high price was paid for improvements by the local authorities, and when the money was paid, the site was turned to private and individual purposes. This was a point that required very careful consideration, and he suggested its postponement to enable them to go carefully through it.

MR. HENLEY could not see on what principle severe restrictions should be placed upon a man who, having pulled down his old property, was about to re-build it.

MR. LOCKE did not think there could be any objection to the local authorities exercising powers to prevent any deviation from the rule they may lay down as to the erection of buildings.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON thought that all the requirements of the case could be met without the operation of this clause, and if his hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge (Mr. Powell) persevered with his Amendment to strike it out, he should go into the Lobby with him.

MR. M'CULLAGH TORRENS thought that the operation of this clause would be very useful, especially in many districts of London, where the powers of the local authorities were far from sufficient to cope with cases which this clause was framed especially to meet.

MR. HENLEY thought the Amendment proposed by the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets, and which had been accepted by the author of the Bill, would answer every purpose; and therefore he hoped the hon. Member for Cambridge would withdraw his Amendment.

MR. POWELL said, he would withdraw his Amendment.

Clause amended, and agreed to.

Clause 28 (Appropriation of Property acquired by Local Authority).

MR. POWELL moved an Amendment enabling building companies, as well as the local authorities, to erect dwellings for the labouring classes.

MR. HIBBERT proposed the omission of the words after the word "first" in line 5, down to the word "authority" in line 8, for the purpose of inserting the following words:—

"Dispose of by way of absolute sale or exchange—or for a lease for a period of not less than ninety-nine years—any part of the premises acquired by them under this Act, so as to provide thereby for the construction of new buildings or the repair or improvement of existing buildings thereon suitable for the occupation of the labouring classes."

COLONEL SYKES thought that if power was given to the local authorities to turn working people out of their dwellings on the ground that they were unhealthy, the local authorities ought to be compelled to provide better dwellings for them.

MR. LOCKE said, if the object of the hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. Hibbert) was not to prevent the local authorities from being obliged to erect new dwellings for the poor, there was no necessity for the Amendment. He apprehended that the hon. Member's object was to relieve the local authorities of that responsibility, and therefore he should oppose the Amendment.

MR. HIBBERT denied that that was his object.

MR. AYRTON thought there was no necessity for the Amendment. The local authorities within seven years would be obliged to divest themselves of all property which they had acquired under this measure.

MR. HIBBERT said, he would withdraw his Amendment.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 29 to 34, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 35 (Expenses of Local Authority).

MR. CHAMBERS moved an Amendment to restrict the maximum rate to 1d., instead of 3d., in the pound.

MR. GRAVES pointed out that the power to go up to the maximum was permissive, and not compulsory.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 36 to 38, inclusive, agreed to.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Tuesday, 21st of April.

ELECTRIC TELEGRAPHS BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in moving for leave to introduce a Bill to enable Her Majesty's Postmaster General to acquire, work, and maintain Electric Telegraphs in the United Kingdom, said, he was sorry that he had not a more convenient opportunity to ask leave to introduce the Bill of which he had given notice; but the business of the last week had been so engrossing, that he had not been able to find a more convenient one. He was afraid that the time now at his disposal was so limited that he should not be able to detail to the House at any great length the scheme of the Government; but he would endeavour to give all the information which he thought the House could expect. The Bill was to enable the Postmaster General to acquire, maintain, and work electric telegraphs. In this country they had been in the habit of leaving to private enterprize the administration of most of the internal affairs of the country; but there had always been one exception, and that had been with regard to postal communication. He believed it had been with the entire assent and approbation of the community that that postal communication had been a monopoly in the hands of the Government. He would submit to the House that telegraphic and postal communication might be considered as coming within the same category. Both provided means for communication between correspondents at a distance, and it was only in the mode of conveying that correspondence that there was any difference. He thought it would be admitted that that which had succeeded so well with regard to the conveyance of letters might be expected to succeed equally well with regard to telegraphic communication. He was not aware of any reason having been urged against monopoly in the one case that would not hold good as regarded the other. It might be asked, for what reason was the change proposed? First of all, he thought he should be able to show by statistics that this country was behind other countries with regard to telegraphic communication, and he would quote a few figures which would show that this was the case. Now, he would take two countries—Switzerland and Belgium. He took the proportion of telegrams to letters in those two countries, and in the United Kingdom, for the year 1860, and it appeared that we were very far behind Switzerland and Belgium with respect to the proportion of telegrams to letters. In that year there was in Belgium one telegram to 218 letters; in Switzerland there was one telegram to 84 letters; while in the United Kingdom there was one telegram to 296 letters. He went on to the year 1863, when in Belgium there was one telegram to 114 letters; in Switzerland, one telegram to 74 letters; while in the United Kingdom there was only one telegram to 197 letters. Coming down to 1866, he found that there was in Belgium one telegram to 37 letters; in Switzerland, one telegram to 69 letters; but in the United Kingdom there was only one telegram to 121 letters. The great increase in the proportion of telegrams to letters in Belgium, from one in 218 in the year

1860 to one in 114 in the year 1863, was traceable to the reduction of the tariff from 1½f. to 1f.; and the further increase to one in 37 in the year 1866 was due to the reduction of the charge from 1f. to half a franc. This, he thought, showed that we were suffering from too high a rate for telegraphic communications, and if we were equally favoured with those countries, the probability was that telegraphic communication would be largely increased. We in this country were more likely to use telegraphic communications, if within our reach, than they were in the countries he had named, and for this reason, that the United Kingdom being of a much greater extent, we should save more time by communicating by telegraph instead of by letter than they could in these small countries. He had shown, therefore, the backwardness of this country as regarded telegraphic communication, and he would now endeavour to show the House that the present system did not give satisfaction to the commercial world. Last year a deputation from the Associated Chambers of Commerce waited upon himself and the Postmaster General at the Treasury on this subject, and they presented a memorial, and also petitioned Parliament on it. They complained—first, of high rates; secondly, of vexatious delays; thirdly, of inaccurate rendering of messages; and fourthly, of the absence of telegraphic communication in whole districts. Now, with respect to rates—the rates for messages were as follow: In the United Kingdom, for 100 miles 1s. for twenty words; for over 100 miles and under 200 miles, 1s. 6d.; for over 200 miles, 2s.; and between Great Britain and Ireland, 4s. To show the relation of charges in foreign countries to those of the United Kingdom: France for a distance of 600 miles charges for twenty words 1s. 8d.—the charge in Great Britain was 2s.; in Prussia, for 500 miles the charge was 1s. 6d. against 2s. in England; in Belgium, for 160 miles, the charge was 5d., against 1s. 6d. in Great Britain; and Switzerland charged 5d. for 200 miles, against 1s. 6d. in Great Britain. He thought that under the present system of private telegraphic communication there was not much prospect of any great reduction of rates; because the companies now concerned in telegraphic business paid dividends to shareholders, and because the administration being divided between different companies—there being four companies, besides railway companies who sent messages—the cost of administration must be greater than if it were in the hands of one body—namely, the State. He believed, therefore, that if the business of telegraphy were a monopoly of the Postmaster General he would be able to work at much lower rates, and at the same time to make the thing pay. The shortness of the time at his disposal obliged him to go at once to the provisions of the Bill he proposed to introduce. The Bill was not compulsory in its terms. It proposed to give the Postmaster General power to purchase the undertaking of any telegraph company in the United Kingdom. But as it was obvious that if the Postmaster General were to acquire one or two undertakings he would be able injuriously to affect the other companies not so purchased, it was proposed that in the case of his purchasing one undertaking, any or all of the other companies concerned in conveying telegraphic messages should be able to compel him to purchase their undertakings at a price arranged by arbitration. Then with regard to the railway companies. There had been some difficulty with respect to them. There were, as they knew, some railway companies which either themselves or by means of lessees, worked the telegraphic wires for their own business, and also conveyed messages for the public; and it was thought that some of these companies might be unwilling to relinquish the use of their wires for their own railway purposes; while at the same time, if a Government competition were established, they would lose that profit which they now acquired from conveying messages for the public. A provision had therefore been made in the Bill, that, in the case of railway companies having wires used for that joint purpose, they should be able to compel the Postmaster General to purchase their right to convey messages for the public, so that those companies would be left in the same position, as regarded profit and loss, as they were in under existing arrangements. He would say that that power to compel the Postmaster General to acquire those works was limited to a period of twelve months from the passing of the Act, or from the acquisition of the first undertaking, he forgot which.

MR. SPEAKER here called the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to the fact that it was a quarter to six o'clock.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER then moved that leave be given to introduce the Bill.

MR. MILNER GIBSON rose to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the Bill sought to give exclusive power.

MR. SPEAKER here intimated that the time during which any discussion could be taken had passed.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to enable Her Majesty's Postmaster General to acquire, work, and maintain Electric Telegraphs, ordered to be brought in by Mr. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, Mr. STEPHEN CAVE, and Mr. SCLATER-BOOTH.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 82.]

UNITED PARISHES (SCOTLAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. WALDEGRAVE-LESLIE, Bill to amend the Act of the seventh and eighth years of the reign of Victoria, chapter forty-four, relating to the formation of Quoad Sacra Parishes in Scotland, and to repeal the Act of the twenty-ninth and thirtieth years of the reign of Victoria, chapter seventy-seven, ordered to be brought in by Mr. WALDEGRAVE-LESLIE, Major WALKER, Mr. WELLWOOD MAXWELL, and Mr. M'LAGAN.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 81.]

House adjourned at ten minutes before Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, April 2, 1868.

MINUTES.]—Sat First in Parliament—The Lord Carrington after the Death of his Father. SELECT COMMITTEE—On Poor Relief nominated. PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Bills of Exchange and Promissory Notes * (65). Second Reading—Marine Mutiny; Mutiny *; Inclosure * (61); Medical Practitioners (Colonies) * (56). Committee—London Coal and Wine Duties Continuance * (59). Report—Indian Railway Companies * (63); London Coal and Wine Duties Continuance * (59). Third Reading—Consolidated Fund (£6,000,000).*

PRIVATE BILLS—THE EASTER RECESS.

On the Motion of The CHAIRMAN of COMMITTEES it was—

Resolved, That Standing Order No. 179. Sect. 1. be suspended; and that the Time for depositing Petitions praying to be heard against Private Bills, which would otherwise expire during the Adjournment of the House, be extended to the First Day on which the House shall sit after the Recess at Easter.

MARINE MUTINY BILL.

(The Earl of Longford).

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE EARL OF LONGFORD, in moving that the Marine Mutiny Bill be now read a second time, said, their Lordships would be aware that discussions occurred almost annually on the subject of corporal punishment in the army, when this measure and other kindred measure which also now stood for a second reading—namely, the Mutiny Bill—were presented to the other House of Parliament. By the Bill of last session the power of sentencing prisoners to corporal punishment was restricted to a very few cases of aggravated offences. Last year the House of Commons had adopted a further Amendment, one not proposed by the Government, and not supported by any considerable authority—the effect of which was that sentences of corporal punishment in time of peace were wholly abolished for all classes of offences. It might be doubted whether it was altogether wise to withdraw that power from military authorities; but he did not ask their Lordships to reverse the decision of the House of Commons. He could only hope that its effect would not be prejudicial to the efficiency and discipline of the army.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>a</sup>."
(The Earl of Longford).

THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE said, that before the House agreed to the second reading of these Bills, he wished in addition to what had fallen from his noble Friend (the Earl of Longford), to point out to their Lordships the rather awkward position in which matters now stood. He certainly had no intention of asking their Lordships to make any change in the Mutiny Bill as passed up by the House of Commons; but it was only right their Lordships should understand the position in which the military authorities stood now that corporal punishment had been wholly abolished, without any other punishment whatever having been substituted for those offences for which it had hitherto been inflicted. According to the wording of the Act as it passed last year, the power given to pass sentences of flogging was extremely limited, but it was still retained for the very grave offences of mutiny and insubordination accompanied by personal violence. The cases, therefore, to which that punishment was applicable were cases of the most aggravated kind: and the position in which the Bill in its present form placed them was this—that whereas the power of inflicting that punishment for those offences had ceased to exist, no punishment of any other description had been substituted for it. There was a Royal Commission now sitting whose attention had been directed to that subject, and if that Commission had thought fit to report in favour of the total abolition of flogging, he apprehended they would have at least recommended or suggested some other mode of dealing with the class of offences which he had just indicated. But, as things now stood, nothing of that sort had been done, and those very aggravated cases under the Mutiny Bill were really unprovided for. It might perhaps be said a soldier could be shot for mutiny; but he asked their Lordships whether so extreme a punishment as that could be inflicted when flogging had been deemed too severe? The power of shooting a man on the spot was so grave that it could be justified only in the most serious cases. Therefore the military authorities were now placed, as he had said, in the most awkward position in this matter; and should they have any instance—as he hoped they would not—of aggravated mutiny or anything of that kind, in consequence of that portion of the Mutiny Act having been expunged, he trusted their Lordships would clearly understand that the fault did not rest with the military authorities. At the same time he could not help thinking—though he was not the person to propose any alteration in the decision of the House of Commons—that this subject had hardly received the amount of attention which its importance deserved. He certainly admitted that the punishment of flogging was in itself degrading; but it was the deterring effect of a punishment to which they had to look, and he did believe there really was an immense deterring power exercised over the men by the knowledge that this punishment would be inflicted for gross misconduct. The civil law had lately adopted corporal punishment for various offences, and with what result? Since "garotting" had been visited with flogging they had had far fewer cases of that crime than before. That exactly illustrated what he meant by saying that this punishment had a great deterrent effect; and it was on that ground alone that the military authorities felt it was undesirable wholly to abolish it. Another serious point was this. He understood that the present Mutiny Act was not intended to do away with that species of punishment when the army was in the field; but if it was done away with in time of peace, it seemed to him very questionable whether it should be inflicted the moment the army took the field—the time, above all others, when they desired to raise the tone and morale of the troops. The object of them all must be to keep the army efficient, not only in respect to general duty, but especially in its discipline. In this country an army not in thorough discipline would be most distasteful to the people, and they might depend upon it it would give great trouble not only to the authorities but to the public at large. He therefore hoped, as that punishment had now been struck out of the Mutiny Act, that the Royal Commission now sitting would give the subject its very gravest consideration. That punishment having been expunged from our military code without waiting for their Report, he repeated that he did trust the Royal Commissioners would now more than ever devote their most anxious and serious attention to the question of what substitute should be adopted for the very powerful means which had been placed in the hands of the authorities for preventing dangerous, troublesome, and undisciplined men from committing themselves in the way they sometimes did. He was the last man to stand up for any improper punishment; but he had thought it right that their Lordships should know the exact position which they now occupied as regarded the whole question of punishments in the army.

VISCOUNT HARDINGE said, he was not surprised that the illustrious Duke who was responsible for the discipline of the army had brought that subject forward. Very great concessions had been made by the Government in respect to it. Before last year, corporal punishment was applicable to no fewer than twelve different offences; but the Government on that occasion consented to restrict it to two—namely, mutiny and gross insubordination. It was true that under the old Mutiny Act flogging could be commuted to penal servitude, and he believed that under the present Bill also a soldier could be sentenced to penal servitude as well as to dismissal from the service. But penal servitude could be applied only in extreme cases; and as to dismissal from the service, even with ignominy, many soldiers would actually commit gross offences in order to get dismissed. Therefore, under that Bill, there was positively no substitute for corporal punishment. He felt sure that it was always a painful duty for the illustrious Duke and for officers of the army to advocate the retention of corporal punishment in time of peace, but they felt that without it the discipline of the army could not be kept up, and he for one believed that a very large majority of officers were of this opinion. He regretted that the other House should have decided this question without waiting for the Report of the Royal Commission; and that the matter should there have been treated as a party question, the announcement of the numbers having been, it was stated, received with loud cheers from the Opposition. He trusted, however, that the change would not be detrimental to the service.

EARL GREY also regretted that the result of the division had been received in “another place” with loud cheers. Of late years new notions seemed to have sprung up as to the duties of an Opposition. It was certain that, in old times, it used to be considered the duty of those who had held high office under the Crown to be present when Motions of this kind came under consideration: but, on consulting the Division List, he found that not a single Gentleman who held office under the late Administration was present, to take part in the discussion, or to vote on one side or the other. Thirty years ago, when he was Secretary at War, this question of corporal punishment occasioned a great deal of excitement. There was a strong opposition to the continuance of corporal punishment; but he thought it his duty to resist the Motion for its abolition. He wished to restrict the punishment as much as possible; but he believed that entirely to do away with it in extreme cases would be dangerous to the service and disadvantageous to the really good soldier. The father of the noble Viscount (Viscount Hardinge) gave him the most able and efficient support in meeting this Motion, and it was very much owing to his aid and assistance that he was able to convince the House of the danger of agreeing to the Motion. When he subsequently sat upon the Opposition Benches he thought it his duty to assist the Government in resisting a similar Motion. Of late years, however, a new doctrine had sprung up, as to the responsibility of the Opposition. It used to be thought that the Members of the Opposition who had served the Crown were not less responsible than the Members for the Government, and at they were bound to use their best efforts to prevent the passing of any measures prejudicial to the public service, and give the House the benefit of their advice and official experience. These remarks, he thought, called for by the conduct of those who were in Opposition both on one side and the other.

EARL DE GREY said, he presumed the remarks of the noble Earl applied principally to his noble friend Lord Hartington, the late Secretary of State for War. But the fact was that he was a member of the Royal Commission to inquire into the question of the discipline of the army, and at an early period of the debate Colonel Wilson-Patten, also a member of the Commission and a Cabinet Minister, laid it down that no member of the Commission ought to take any part in the division. On Mr. Stow's Motion Mr. Gladstone paired against the Motion during the dinner hour, and the division came on unexpectedly during his absence. The noble Earl's own practice must have told him that Members who had held high office occasionally paired during the dinner hour. As the division came on sooner than was expected, perhaps this would account for the absence of the names in question from the division.

THE MARQUESS OF EXETER said, he could confirm from his own experience the necessity for substituting some other punishment if they abolished corporal punishment. When he was at Gibraltar some men in certain regiments were in a highly insubordinate state, and two separate Courts martial were appointed to try the offenders. One of these Courts martial was presided over by a field officer of the line, and the other by himself. Some of the men insulted the Court, and the only way in which order could be preserved was by sentencing one man to corporal punishment, and another to three months' imprisonment. This was effectual; but if flogging were done away with, he feared that scenes such as he had witnessed would often occur, greatly to the inconvenience of the service.

EARL GREY explained that he had not particularly alluded to the Marquess of Hartington; but it was the fact that no members of the late Government voted against the Motion of the hon. Member for Batham.

EARL RUSSELL said, that his noble friend (Earl de Grey) had, he thought, amply vindicated Lord Hartington. Without entering into the question of the expediency of corporal punishment, it appeared to him that Her Majesty's Government might have inferred from the debate and division of last year, that whenever the question came on this year, there would be a very considerable majority in favour of the abolition of flogging. He thought that after the division of last year the Minister of War ought to have immediately appointed a Royal Commission to sit during November and December, and then, when the House met in February, they might have had the Report of the Commission, and their suggestions as to the best substitute for corporal punishment.

Earl Grey

THE EARL OF LONGFORD said, that the Secretary of State for War had been taken by surprise by the impatience of the House of Commons, and was not prepared to recommend at once a change in the system of military punishments. As a Royal Commission now had the subject under consideration, with the best means of forming a judgment, the Secretary of State would await their Report without taking any further steps. With regard to the conduct of the front Opposition Bench, as he might not be a good judge, he would rather leave that question in the hands of the noble Earl on the cross Benches (Earl Grey).

Motion agreed to: Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> accordingly; Committee negatived, and Bill to be read 3<sup>a</sup> To-morrow.

MUTINY BILL read 2<sup>a</sup> (according to Order): Committee negatived; and Bill to be read 3<sup>a</sup> To-morrow.

POOR RELIEF BILL [H.L.]

Select Committee on: The Lords following were named of the Committee:—

L. Abp. York	E. Ducie
D. Richmond	E. Ellenborough
M. Salisbury	E. Kimberley
E. Devon	V. Eversley
E. Denbigh	L. Clinton
E. Hardwicke	L. Egerton
E. Carnarvon	L. Northbrook.
E. Grey

PUBLIC PETITIONS—APPOINTMENT OF A SELECT COMMITTEE.

PRINTING PETITIONS.

EARL RUSSELL moved (according to Notice)—

“That a Select Committee be appointed to whom all Petitions presented to this House shall be referred, with Instructions to the said Committee to report whether any of the Petitions so referred ought to be printed for the Use of this House.”

It very frequently happened that the Petitions presented to the House contained matters of great importance, and which would be of great use to their Lordships in subsequent discussions.

LORD REDESDALE thought that the adoption of the proposal would entail considerable expense with no corresponding advantage, for the Petitions would very seldom be read by anyone. It was open to persons who desired publicity to be given to a particular Petition to print and circulate it for the benefit of the public and of the Post Office. It was likewise in the power of any noble Lord to propose that a Petition be printed, in which case the House would decide whether it was advisable that it should be done. The question had been discussed on previous occasions, and it had always been thought better to adhere to the existing practice. He should like to hear the opinion of noble Lords on the subject; because there could be no objection to deal with it according to the general sense of the House.

EARL STANHOPE gave his cordial support to the proposal. He was of opinion that the printing of Petitions might, in many cases be very useful. The only doubt he entertained was rather as to a point of form. The noble Earl proposed that the Committee should report to the House what Petitions should be printed. Now, he thought it would be a great saving of time if the Committee should have power at once to order the printing of such Petitions as they might think advisable. Such, he believed, was the case with the Committee of the House of Commons.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, as he understood the proposal of his noble Friend (Earl Russell), it would not interfere with the power which any noble Lord had now of moving that a Petition be printed.

LORD LYVEDEN approved the suggestion made by the noble Earl opposite (Earl Stanhope) that the Committee should have power to order Petitions to be printed.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, as far as his own opinion was concerned—for this was not a Government question—he saw no objection to the proposal of the noble Earl (Earl Russell) except that it would entail some expense. At the same time, he thought some Petitions might be very usefully printed. At present the public were under the impression—not a very wrong one—that very little attention was paid to Petitions presented to Parliament, and, perhaps, the adoption of this Resolution might give a new impetus to the presentation of such addresses. As to the proposal of the noble Earl, interfering with the right of any Peer to move that his Petition be printed, he apprehended it would have no such effect. The fact that a Peer had made a Motion to have his Petition printed, if the House agreed to it, would supersede the necessity of the Committee ordering the printing of the same Petition.

EARL RUSSELL said, he had no objection to adopt the noble Earl's (Earl Stanhope's) suggestion that the Committee should have power at once to order the printing of Petitions.

LORD REDESDALE thought the practice of printing Petitions might be very much abused. A person might present a pamphlet in the shape of a Petition, and have it printed at the public expense. He only hoped when the Petitions were printed that their Lordships would read them.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE said, that the Committee, of course, would exercise a discretion with respect to the Petitions that should be printed, and he thought that power might very well be given to them.

After a few words from Lord STANLEY of ALDERLEY,

Motion amended, and agreed to.

Resolved, That a Select Committee be appointed to whom all Petitions presented to this House, other than Petitions relating to Private Bills, shall be referred, with Instructions to the said Committee to direct the printing for the Use of the House of such Petitions as they shall think fit.—(The Earl Russell.)

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

RESOLUTIONS.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY, who had given notice to move the following Resolutions:—

1. That it is expedient that Notice of an Intention to ask a Question should be given in the Minutes, except in Cases which admit of no Delay:

2. That the Committee of Selection are desired to exercise their Discretion in calling for the Service of Lords absent from the House:

3. That in future, in entering the Reports of Bills amended in Committee of the Whole House in the Journals, instead of the Report of such Amendments being entered as made formally by the Chairman of Committees, the Name of the Lord who moves the Reception of the Report and takes charge of the Bill in that Stage be substituted.

said, he would direct their Lordships' attention to a subject which had been discussed on Thursday evening—the Report of the Select Committee upon the Conduct of Business in their Lordships' House. It appeared to him at that time that the best way to proceed would be for their Lordships to assent to the Report, and that the recommendations of the Committee should be discussed in detail afterwards, at their Lordships' discretion. He had inferred, however, from the debate of the other night, that their Lordships would prefer that the recommendations of the Report should be embodied in a set of Resolutions to be proposed seriatim. That wish of their Lordships he had endeavoured to carry out. He thought the most convenient course would be to move the Resolutions separately, and their Lordships could discuss them one by one as they were moved. He begged to move the first Resolution.

Moved to resolve—

“That it is expedient that Notice of an Intention to ask a Question should be given in the Minutes, except in Cases which admit of no Delay.”—(The Lord Privy Seal.)

VISCOUNT HALIFAX said, he thought that the Resolution of the noble Earl went beyond the recommendation of the Committee, and, if carried, would put a stop to many Questions which might be fairly asked without notice. In the other House of Parliament there was a very convenient usage, no discussion being permitted on a question being asked. He concurred in the opinion that it was not desirable to stop the putting of Questions in all cases without formal notice; but, at the same time no Question which was at all likely to give rise to debate ought to be put without notice having been given. The proposal of the noble Earl, in its present form, might put a stop to a number of Questions that were not likely to raise debates; and it was scarcely expedient to go quite so far as that.

EARL RUSSELL said, he saw no objection to the Resolution as proposed. It would have the effect of stopping any noble Lord from putting a Question at ten minutes past five o'clock, and thus initiating a debate which might last a considerable time, to the great inconvenience of those noble Lords who had given notices. He thought it might fairly be left to the discretion of noble Lords not to put Questions early in the evening without notice, unless they could be answered at once by the heads of Departments, or unless it was apparent that the Question was such as to show the propriety of suspending the rule in that instance.

LORD TAUNTON said, he did not think the present practice of the House led to any serious inconvenience, for noble Lords usually gave notice of Questions when they were of such a character as probably to give rise to discussion. He thought it undesirable that any positive rule should be laid down.

LORD LYVEDEN said, that the Resolution carried out the intention of the Committee in making the recommendation. In the other House, the Speaker would stop any Member seeking to put a Question without notice, as being contrary to the rules of the House. In their Lordships' House, however, they had no similar functionary whose duty it would be to stop any irregularity. The great point to be attained was, no doubt, to put a stop to the practice of putting without notice Questions which were likely to give rise to debates.

EARL GRANVILLE suggested that the noble Earl should vary the Resolution, and follow more precisely the words of the Committee. This would stop the practice of putting Questions without notice, when there was no necessity for haste; but would not prevent the putting of urgent Questions, although they might possibly give rise to discussion.

THE DUKE OF CLEVELAND said, there ought to be some rule on the subject which should be sufficiently distinct to prevent debates being raised upon Questions; but the rule could always be suspended in cases in which the House might think discussion desirable.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that if their Lordships followed the precise words of the Committee they might not attain the object the Select Committee had in view. That object was not merely to prevent the putting of Questions without notice; for that object might easily be gained by the refusal of the Minister or the other Member of the House to whom the Question was addressed to give an answer until he should have had an opportunity of informing himself upon the subject to which it related. The real evil was the debate which was sometimes raised by putting a Question. It had been complained that Questions had been put and discussions raised without notice; and it went forth to the public that many noble Lords who might have been most anxious to express their opinions on the subject had been denied the opportunity of so doing. That was the evil which had to be remedied; but what he was afraid of was that the Resolution would, on the one hand, operate to prevent Questions being put which might very conveniently be asked; and, on the other hand, it would not check discussion, because, without a Question, by other devices easily specified, any Member of their Lordships' House might initiate a discussion upon any subject. He suggested that the Resolution, instead of taking the form which had been proposed, should be in these words—

“It is desirable, where it is intended to make a Statement, or raise a Discussion on asking a Question, that Notice of the Question should be given in the Minutes and Orders of the Day.”

He therefore proposed that the following Resolution should be substituted for the proposed Resolution:—

“That it is desirable where it is intended to make a Statement, or raise a Discussion on asking a Question that Notice of the Question should be given in the Orders of the Day and Notices.”

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY considered that the suggestion of his noble and learned Friend would be an improvement upon his Resolution, and proposed that their Lordships should adopt it.

Motion (by Leave of the House) withdrawn.

Then it was moved to resolve,

That it is desirable where it is intended to make a Statement or raise a Discussion on asking a Question that Notice of the Question should be given in the Orders of the Day and Notices.—
(The Lord Chancellor.)

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE warned their Lordships against the proposed alteration, which he conceived was opposed to the spirit of the privileges and usages of that House from time immemorial. The Resolution which they already possessed, providing that the Business on the Paper should be proceeded with at a quarter past five o'clock was quite sufficient, and he preferred it to the one now moved. It would be very injudicious for their Lordships to bind themselves down in the manner now proposed.

EARL STANHOPE said, his noble Friend who had just sat down did not seem aware of the precise grievance which it was sought to remedy. He was surprised that one who had attended so closely to the debates in that House as his noble Friend should not have been aware of numerous occasions on which a noble Lord, who had only given a private notice to the Minister of the Crown, had risen a few minutes before a quarter past five o'clock, and made an hour's speech in reference to a matter of which the House had not been apprised. The consequence was that, the House having had no notice of the Question, the debate which might otherwise have been of general interest was confined to the noble Lord who put the Question and to the Minister of the Crown. He thought that the debates of the House had suffered materially from the existence of that practice. The objections to the Resolution were met by the Amendment of the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack.

Motion agreed to.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY moved the second Resolution—

“That the Committee of Selection are desired to exercise their Discretion in calling for the Service of Lords absent from the House.”

LORD REDESDALE explained that the Committee of Selection had already the power of proposing the name of any Peer; but, as a matter of fact they did not propose Peers who were known to be absent, nor any Peer without first communicating with him. The object of this Resolution seemed to be to direct the Committee of Selection to be less careful about obtaining the consent of a Peer before nominating him on a Committee. He saw no reason why the Resolution should not be adopted.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE remarked that the Committee of Selection did exercise their own discretion at present.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he wished to see adopted much the same system as was adopted in the House of Commons with regard to Members selected to serve on Committees. Many Peers who were perfectly able to perform these duties avoided doing so by absenting themselves from the House, except upon great party debates and divisions; and thus the matter had an important bearing on the attendance in that House—a subject which had been commented on out of doors. This was a great grievance, which he should like to see put an end to. Then, again, many young Members of the House—having made their engagements for the next month, whether for pleasure, business, or otherwise—now refrain from coming down to the House, where they might train themselves for taking part in its discussions, from a fear that if they showed their faces there they might be pounced upon by the noble Lord Lord Redesdale), or the other Peers who elected the Private Bill Committees.

LORD REDESDALE said, he was sorry if any noble Lord stayed away from the fear of being asked to serve; because it had not been his practice to ask any Peer to serve on a Committee when he could lead any important engagement, or any other sufficient reason. Owing to the time when the Private Business came up to their Lordships' House, it would be impossible to appoint their Committees by rota in the manner adopted in the other House. At first they might find many Peers willing to serve, while few would offer themselves afterwards, and some would have to serve twice; but there would not be the same disposition as was now shown to undertake those duties voluntarily. The present system, even when there was a considerable pressure of business, worked well.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON wished the Resolution could be brought back to the original form in which it stood in the Report of the Committee; and if the noble Earl opposite (Earl Granville) gave the House an opportunity of dividing on his proposition, he would support him. The Resolution, as it now stood, was mere surplusage, as it only asked the Committee of Selection to exercise a discretionary power, which they already exercised.

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH said, the proposal of his noble Friend the Lord Privy Seal was not that the House should give a discretion to the Committee of Selection which they already possessed, but that they should be requested to exercise that discretion when deemed advantageous.

VISCOUNT HALIFAX said, what was really desired was that the absence of a noble Lord from that House should not exempt him from serving. He would, therefore, suggest the adoption of words to this effect—

"That the Absence of any noble Lord from this House, except on sufficient Reason, ought not to prevent the Committee of Selection from calling for his Services."

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY preferred the words just suggested to those proposed by the Lord Privy Seal; and he trusted that the Resolution, when adopted, would not remain a dead letter. It was both desirable and just that Peers who were in the habit of absenting themselves from the House should be called upon to serve on Committees when their services were required.

Earl Granville

EARL STANHOPE opposed the Resolution, which he regarded as open to great practical objection.

EARL COWPER said, that some years ago he moved for a Return of the number of Peers who had served on Committees. He believed that in the year to which the Return referred only 120 Peers out of the whole number of Members of their Lordships' House had served on a Committee at all. The consequence was that many Peers had been obliged to serve twice; and, besides the Chairmen of the different Committees, one Peer had served on three Committees. Thus a heavy burden was entailed upon conscientious Peers by the idleness and default of others. The system under which the noble Lord (Lord Redesdale) obtained Members to sit on Private Bills must remind their Lordships of the system of recruiting for the British army. There was one great difference certainly; for he had never heard of the noble Lord offering anyone anything to drink; but he was obliged to go round and to whisper first to one and then to another, holding out hopes where he could that the inquiry would not be a very long one. He should be sorry to see a system of conscription adopted for the British army; but a well-managed conscription for compelling the Members of that House to take their fair share in Private Business would be a very good thing.

LORD CHELMSFORD moved an Amendment—

To leave out from ("Selection") to the end of the Motion for the Purpose of inserting the Words following, ("should in the Exercise of their Discretion call more frequently than at present for the Service of Lords absent from the House.")

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY could not agree to the Amendment.

EARL STANHOPE thought that the Amendment of the noble Viscount (Viscount Halifax) exactly met the wants of the case.

Amendment (by Leave of the House) withdrawn.

Then it was moved to resolve,

That the Absence of any Lord from this House, except for sufficient Reason, ought not to prevent the Committee of Selection from calling for his Services.—(The Viscount Halifax.)

Motion agreed to.

Then it was resolved—

That in entering in the Journals the Reports of Bills amended in Committees of the Whole House, the only Name entered therewith shall be that of the Lord who moves the Reception of the Report and takes Charge of the Bill in that Stage.—(The Lord Privy Seal)

BILLS OF EXCHANGE AND PROMISSORY NOTES
BILL [H.L.]

A Bill to amend the Law of Bills of Exchange and Promissory Notes—Was presented by The Lord SOMERHILL; read 1<sup>a</sup>. (No. 65.)

House adjourned at a quarter past Seven o'clock, till To-morrow, half past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, April 2, 1868.

MINUTES.]—SUPPLY—considered in Committee
—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES—Classes I to VII.

PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered— County General Assessment (Scotland)*; Peerage (Ireland).*

First Reading—Peerage (Ireland)* [83]; County General Assessment (Scotland)* [84].

Second Reading—Petty Sessions and Look-up Houses* [75]; Prisons (Compensation to Officers)* [80]; Renewable Leasehold Conversion (Ireland) Act Extension* [61]; Metropolis Gas [49].

Committee—Local Government Supplemental* [77].

Report—Local Government Supplemental* [77].
Considered as amended—Industrial Schools (Ireland)* [6].

PRIVILEGE—MEMBERS' SEATS IN THIS HOUSE.—OBSERVATIONS.

COLONEL GREVILLE-NUGENT said, he wished to call the attention of the House to a Question of Privilege. The number of seats in the House was very limited, and it would be extremely convenient to Members to know the rule upon which seats were to be retained for the night. Last year a Question arose upon this very matter with respect to two Gentlemen on the other side of the House, who had placed their cards on the Bench before the Speaker came in to Prayers. On that occasion he believed it was ruled that it was necessary a Member should be present at Prayers in order to secure his seat for the night, and that no card left upon the seat before that time would entitle an hon. Member to a seat for the night unless he had been present at Prayers. He thought it was also laid down on that occasion that if any hon. Member placed his hat upon the seat, it was to be supposed that he remained within the precincts of the House, and if he returned before the Speaker came in to Prayers he was entitled to retain the seat for the night. Now, he came down to the House shortly after three o'clock for the purpose of securing a seat, and placed his hat on a vacant seat next to that of the hon. Member for King's County. A few minutes afterwards he returned, and found that his hat had been removed, and that his seat was occupied by the hon. and gallant Member for Aberdeen. He remonstrated with the hon. Member, because he had perceived that it was the usual courtesy of the House to respect hats. The hon. Member told him that he had been twelve years in the House, and he replied that he had had the honour of sitting in the House sixteen years, and during that time he had never removed any hon. Gentleman's hat. He thus found himself without a seat; and, thinking that it would be very much for the convenience of the House to know, he wished to ask Mr. Speaker, whether the rule he had mentioned would be adhered to?

COLONEL SYKES said, he thought the House would expect from him some explanation as to the charge of want of courtesy on his part. He disclaimed any want of courtesy. The rule of the House was that no Member should have a claim to a particular seat unless he was at Prayers, and unless he put his card on the back of the seat; but there were a great number of Members who were constant in their attendance at Prayers, and who therefore by the courtesy of the House were allowed constantly to occupy certain seats. ["No, no."] He said Yes. On that very Bench there were five Members who continually occupied the same seats in consequence of their constant attendance at Prayers for many years. During the three Parliaments he had been in the House he had occupied the same seat, or the corresponding one on the opposite side, and it had rarely been occupied, though accident had kept him from Prayers. He had an instance of what he stated to be the custom in the case of the hon. Member below him—the hon. Member for Sheffield, who had occupied the same seat ever since he (Colonel Sykes) had been in the House.

MR. SPEAKER: The Question raised by the hon. and gallant Member for Longford (Colonel Greville-Nugent) has been often under the consideration of the House, and the House has laid down rules upon the subject for the observance of its Members. The hon. and gallant Member accurately stated what passed relative to this question last year, and the words that were ed upon that occasion are now before e. It was then observed that hon. members who came down early in the morning to attend to their duties were placed at a disadvantage, because, being confined to the Committee-room, they could not come into the House until their hats had been secured by others. Under these circumstances it was decided that any Member who, having come down to the House in the morning in the discharge of his duty on a Committee, shall before prayers place his hat on a seat as an indication of his personal attendance within the precincts of the House shall be permitted to retain that seat, as though he were present in the House. Arrangements were made by the Serjeant-at-Arms to give effect to the wishes of the House, and those arrangements were generally quiesced in. I think, therefore, that after the discussion that occurred last year, it may be taken to be one of the rules of the House with respect to this matter; and under these circumstances any Gentleman who, having placed his hat upon a seat, and being in immediate attendance upon the House, on returning here has a right to expect that that seat will be reserved for him. That I understand to be a rule, generally accepted by the House, and one therefore which all Members ought to respect.

MERCHANT SHIPPING CONSOLIDATION BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. GRAVES said, he wished to ask the Vice President of the Board of Trade, when he can say when the Merchant Shipping Consolidation Bill will be introduced?

MR. STEPHEN CAVE replied that, in consequence of his hon. Friend's Notice, he had communicated with the person who had been engaged to draft this Bill, and who had been unexpectedly delayed, owing to circumstances of a private nature, and by no fault of his own. That Gentleman had informed him that he was winding up other business in order to devote himself to the work of consolidation, and drawing new clauses; and that he hoped to have completed his work before the Session was much farther advanced.

TECHNICAL EDUCATION — MR. WHITWORTH'S ENDOWMENT.—QUESTION.

MR. BRUCE said, he wished to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, If it is true that

Mr. Speaker

Mr. Whitworth has offered a very large sum to be applied in promotion of Technical Instruction; and, if so, whether he can state what is the precise nature of the endowment, and whether he can lay upon the table of the House any Papers on the subject?

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU: Sir, it is true that Mr. Whitworth has made a most munificent offer, in a letter addressed to the First Lord of the Treasury, on the 18th of March last. Mr. Whitworth proposes to found thirty scholarships of the annual value of £100 each, to be open to public competition, and to be obtained by proof of intelligence and efficiency in mechanics and cognate sciences. I need not say that that generous offer was accepted with thanks by the Committee of Council on Education, and the Minute embodying his letter, which is the only Paper on the subject, I propose to lay on the table of the House.

COURT OF CHANCERY—SALARIES AND EXPENSES.—QUESTION.

MR. CHILDERS said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it is his intention to propose to Parliament, during the present Session, to charge the salaries and expenses of the English Court of Chancery on the Consolidated Fund and Votes of Parliament, as is now the case with the other Courts of Common Law and Equity in the United Kingdom; and, whether, as the salaries, compensations, and other expenses of the Irish Court of Chancery are so charged under the Act of 1867, he intends to apply to Parliament for power to wind up the Suitors' Fee Fund, Exchequer Compensation and Fee Fund, Chancery Compensation and Fee Fund, Bankruptcy and Compensation Fund, and Box Fund. He would put, at the same time, the other Question of which he had given Notice. Whether it is the intention of the Government to follow up the inquiry as to fees, commenced by the Committee of which Mr. Goschen was Chairman, appointed by the late Board of Treasury?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, it was not the intention of the Government to introduce a measure for the purpose of winding up the funds alluded to by the hon. Member, nor did the Government propose to introduce, at present at all events, a Bill to deal with the Court of Chancery in the way suggested by the hon. Member. With reference to the hon. Member's Question respecting the Commission, it was the intention of the Government to follow up the inquiry as soon as time and circumstances would admit.

VACCINATION—SMALL-POX AT WOOLWICH.—QUESTION.

SIR J. CLARKE JERVOISE said, he wished to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, Whether he has noticed a paragraph in a Medical Journal relating to a recent outbreak of small-pox at Woolwich, in which it is stated that "four new" and "eleven fresh cases were vaccinated;" and how this statement is to be reconciled with that of the Vice President of Council on Education, on the Vaccination Bill of 1867, that "small-pox is absolutely preventable by vaccination?"

Lord ROBERT MONTAGU said, in reply, that he had not spoken of an imperfect vaccination of individuals, or of a partial vaccination of the population. By a perfect vaccination of the whole people the disease could be stamped out. As an example he might mention that this had been done in one district by the energy of Dr. Hughes, of Mold, in North Wales. The paragraph from the British Medical Journal, which the hon. Baronet had sent him, was favourable to that view. It commenced thus—

"Arrest of the Small-pox at Woolwich.—We are very glad to learn that the careful measures of vaccination and visitation instituted on the advice of Dr. Sutton, at Woolwich, are really telling now."

He was happy to be enabled to say that small-pox was nearly eradicated at Woolwich.

ECCLIASTICAL COMMISSIONERS—BENEFICE OF KILPEC, HEREFORD.

QUESTION.

Colonel BARTHELOT said, he wished to ask the Judge Advocate, Whether the Ecclesiastical Commissioners admit that the benefice of Kilpec, in the county of Hereford, has a local claim upon them for a grant in augmentation; and, if so, why no grant has yet been made to the benefice, although its income does not exceed £10 per annum?

Mr. MOWBRAY replied that Kilpec had at present no local claim. All the property in the parish in the possession of the Commissioners came within the special exception contained in the 12th

Section of the Act of 1860. No local claim would accrue until the estimated expiration of a lease which was held for three lives, two of which were under thirty years of age. At such expiration the Commissioners were bound to consider the wants and circumstances of the place. Kilpec had no claim in respect of population, which is only 267.

ELECTION PETITIONS AND CORRUPT PRACTICES AT ELECTIONS BILL—BRIBERY AT MUNICIPAL ELECTIONS.—QUESTION.

Mr. J. STUART MILL said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether it is his intention to propose any measure, either separately or as a provision, in the Election Petitions and Corrupt Practices at Elections Bill, for the prevention of bribery at Municipal Elections?

Mr. DISRAELI: Sir, the subject to which the Question of the hon. Member relates is one of very great importance, but I am not prepared to deal with it in the manner he suggests. I shall make every possible effort to carry the Bill which refers to Parliamentary Elections before the dissolution. I think that that is a matter of the greatest moment; but I do not contemplate mixing it up with the subject referred to by the hon. Member.

CASE OF POLICE SERGEANT STONE.

QUESTION.

Mr. LABOUCHERE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he has any objection to lay on the table Copies of all Correspondence in his Office or in the Office of the Chief Commissioner of Police, respecting the dismissal of police sergeant Stone from the Metropolitan Police Force?

Mr. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, he found that Stone was dismissed in 1864, and the case had on several occasions been investigated. A gratuity had been given to that officer, for which he expressed his thanks. He thought the matter ended there, as Stone did not complain of any other grievance, and asked for some other employment. The hon. Member was perfectly welcome to see the Papers, which were very voluminous, but he did not think any advantage would result from their being printed.

THE ABYSSINIAN EXPEDITION
ESTIMATES.—QUESTION.

MR. FAWCETT said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether he has received an Estimate of the expense incurred in India for the Abyssinian Expedition, he having stated on the 8th of February that he had telegraphed to Bombay for this Estimate; and whether he will state its contents and lay it upon the table?

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Sir, I have not received any complete Estimate from Bombay, but I have received several accounts more or less full, which I communicated to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. These accounts were carefully collated with the information which we had in this country; and it was upon the foundation of these accounts that my right hon. Friend gave his Answer a little time since with regard to the probable cost of the Expedition. I do not think the House would understand the accounts from Bombay; but in two or three weeks the Budget will, I hope, be brought forward, and by that time I trust we shall be able to give a tolerably accurate Estimate of the cost of the Expedition. It may interest the House, however, if I mention that Sir Robert Napier expected to be at Theodore's camp, which is about twenty-five miles from Magdala, at the end of March; and, as far as I can judge from the telegrams I have received from him, that expectation was likely to be fulfilled, so that we may expect by the time we re-assemble after the holidays, or within a few days afterwards, to hear the result of his coming into the immediate vicinity of Theodore. Probably by that time we shall know when the Expedition will begin to return; and, under these circumstances, I think it will be more convenient that we should delay any further communication regarding the Estimates until we are in a position, after the holidays, to speak with some confidence.

CHOLERA IN THE MEDITERRANEAN.
QUESTION.

SIR J. CLARKE JERVOISE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether any steps were taken to prevent the outbreak of cholera in the Mediterranean in 1867, in accordance with the Report of the British Cholera Commissioners, October, 1866, on the "Origin, Transmissibility, Incubation, Fomites, and Measures of Prevention" of Cholera; and, whether, in consideration of the life, liberty, and property of many of Her Majesty's subjects depending on the adoption of the conclusions arrived at by the Conference, a translation from French into English of the Report, "preceded by a Prologue," will be distributed?

LORD STANLEY said, in reply, that the regulation of British colonial ports was not conducted by the Foreign Office, and it was needless to add that the Government had no power over the acts of Foreign Powers; but he might state that a Sanitary Board had been established at Constantinople, having for its object to check the spread of cholera in the Mediterranean; and some regulations had been issued by that Board, respecting which he had replied to a Question by the hon. Baronet a few days since. Regarding the latter part of the Question, he doubted whether it would be worth while to do as was suggested.

POOR LAW—GRAVESEND BOARD OF GUARDIANS.—QUESTION.

MR. O'REILLY said, he rose to ask the Secretary to the Poor Law Board, Whether it is a fact that the Chairman of the Gravesend and Milton Board of Guardians objected to the appointment as porter of a person, otherwise well qualified, on the ground that he was a Roman Catholic; whether such objection caused his rejection; and, whether he will have any objection to lay any Correspondence on the subject upon the table of the House?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, in reply, that communications had been received by the Poor Law Board from Mr. Sullivan, a Roman Catholic priest of Gravesend, and two others of the same parish, respecting the subject referred to. The Gravesend guardians, having advertised for a porter, selected two applicants from those who responded; only one, however, attended, and he was a Roman Catholic, named Duggan. The guardians, therefore, postponed the election. The hon. Member was quite right in supposing that the only apparent reason for Duggan's rejection was his religion; but it should be stated that the resolution was unanimous on the part of the guardians. It was, perhaps, needless to add that the regulations of the Poor Law Board contained nothing to prevent the election of a Roman Catholic as a porter to a workhouse; but guardians were perfectly free—and the Board had no power to compel them to elect any particular man. The Papers on the subject consisted merely of the Correspondence between Mr. Sullivan and those who acted with him and the Board; and, as he conceived it would not serve the public to lay it on the table, he proposed to communicate with the hon. Member on the subject in private if he desired to do so.

RULE OF THE ROAD AT SEA. QUESTION.

MR. HOLLAND said, he wished to ask the Vice President of the Board of Trade, When the Papers which were laid upon the table of the House in December (having reference to the steering and sailing rules), together with the set of diagrams, explaining the "Rule of the Road at Sea" under every circumstance, will be printed and issued?

MR. STEPHEN CAVE said, in reply, that the Papers referred to by the hon. Member had long been ready, and might have been distributed some time ago; but it had been thought prudent to delay issuing them in consequence of some important Correspondence with the French Government on the subject, which would render the information more complete. As soon as this additional matter was ready—which he hoped would be at no distant date—no time should be lost in placing the whole in the hands of Members.

INSURRECTION IN CRETE. QUESTION.

MR. KENNEDY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether cruelties are enacted in Crete at present, such as took place while the insurrection was raging in full force; whether tranquillity may be considered to be now re-established; and if, not, whether the British Government exercise any influence in favour of the Christian population?

LORD STANLEY: Sir, it is not very easy to obtain accurate and trustworthy information with reference to what is passing in Crete; but I think I may say that many of the stories of the outrages and acts of cruelty which have appeared in the newspapers have been, if not wholly invented, yet very much exaggerated and over-coloured. Generally, I take the state of things in Crete to be this:—The insurrection has dwindled down to very small proportions; but it would be premature to say that tranquillity has been altogether re-established. With regard to the latter part of the Question of the hon. Member, I may say that Her Majesty's Government, have from the first exercised their influence in favour of the Christian population—in favour of giving them a large measure of self-government, and of establishing equality before the Law between the Christian and Mahomedan population.

BOUNDARY BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. WATKIN said, he would beg to ask, Whether the Boundary Bill will be printed and circulated before the adjournment of the House?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, he believed the Bill would be almost immediately printed and circulated.

ELECTRIC TELEGRAPHS BILL. QUESTION.

MR. AYRTON said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he will lay on the Table any Correspondence, with respect to the purchase of the Electric Telegraphs, which has taken place between the Government and the several Companies?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER stated, in reply, that Papers relating to the communications between the Government and the Electric Telegraph Companies in reference to the proposed purchase of the Electric Telegraphs by the Government would be laid upon the table before the Bill was proceeded with, and the second reading of the Bill would be deferred for a sufficient period to allow the House time to consider it.

ESTABLISHED CHURCH (IRELAND)— THE APPROACHING DIVISION.

QUESTION.

MR. YORKE desired some information from the Foreign Secretary touching the issue to be submitted to the House, he believed, before its adjournment. In common, he presumed, with other supporters of the Government, he had that morning received through the usual channel a request to attend in his place; but the request was accompanied by a printed paper which he believed he might read without committing a breach of confidence, as it had been already published. It ran as follows:—

“That there may be no misunderstanding, it is greatly desired that Members will bear in mind that the first division will be taken not on Lord Stanley's Amendment, but directly either to affirm or negative Mr. Gladstone's Motion to go into Committee.”

That document had puzzled him (Mr. Yorke) a great deal. His first impression was that the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary had withdrawn his Amendment; but on looking at the Orders of the Day he found the Question to be debated set forth in the following terms:—

“Motion made, and Question proposed, ‘That this House will immediately resolve itself into a Committee to consider the said Acts’:—(Mr. Gladstone).—Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word ‘House’ to the end of the Question, in order to add the words ‘while admitting that considerable modifications in the temporalities of the United Church in Ireland may, after the pending inquiry, appear to be expedient, is of opinion that any proposition tending to the disestablishment or disendowment of that Church ought to be reserved for the decision of a new Parliament’—(Lord Stanley), instead thereof:—Question proposed, ‘That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question.’”

It was obvious that if the Question, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question,” were decided in the affirmative, the noble Lord would be precluded from putting his Amendment; and therefore it might be true in the letter, that the noble Lord's Amendment was not involved in the Question to be submitted to the House, but virtually his Amendment was precluded from being submitted to the House in case the Question first submitted was decided in the affirmative. If it were decided in the negative, then the Amendment would be put; but he did not see in what sense it could be said that the division would be taken on the Main Question, when, if it were decided in the affirmative, the noble Lord's Amendment would be precluded from being put. He therefore begged to ask the noble Lord whether it was his intention to withdraw the Amendment; and, if not, in what sense the House was to understand the Notice that had been circulated among the Government supporters that morning.

LORD STANLEY: Sir, in answer to the Question of my hon. Friend, I may say it is not my intention to withdraw the Amendment which I have moved, nor will any change or modification whatever be made in the course of our proceedings as arranged at the commencement of this debate. I am not the author of the document to which my hon. Friend refers; but I apprehend it is simply intended as an explanation of the manner in which, according to the forms of the House, supposing we divide, the division will be taken.

Mr. Yorke

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE: Sir, the Answer given by the noble Lord to the Question just put has, I think, a very material bearing upon the proceedings of the House, and raises difficulties which I should like to apply to you, Sir (Mr. Speaker), authoritatively to solve. I desire then to ask you whether the first division, if it be taken on the Question, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question,” is to be considered as a division on the Main Question, “That the House do now resolve itself into a Committee;” because if it be so, of course those who vote with the right hon. Gentleman are voting in the sense of his Resolution; and if it be not so, those who do not vote with the Government abstain from voting for the Amendment of the noble Lord. I desire, therefore, to know from you, Sir, the precise purport of the Question which you are to put from the Chair.

MR. SPEAKER: The Original Motion before the House is, “That the House resolve itself into Committee.” To that an Amendment had been proposed, and the House has, up to this time, been mainly engaged on the Amendment. If the House should affirm “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question,” that will be decisive of the Amendment, and then will come the Main Question, which will stand disembarrassed from all other words.

ESTABLISHED CHURCH (IRELAND)— THE MAYNOOTH GRANT.—QUESTION.

MR. WHALLEY said, he wished to put to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire a Question, which he had reason to believe would be answered satisfactorily by him—that was to say, in the sense in which he was understood to have spoken when introducing his Resolutions. His reason for putting it was that it related to a matter in which the public took very considerable interest. The Question which he wished to put to the right hon. Gentleman was this, Whether, in the event of the Resolutions moved by him being carried, he would include in any Bill which might be introduced by himself, in pursuance of those Resolutions, provisions for the repeal of the Maynooth Grant; or whether, in the event of Bills to carry out those Resolutions emanating from other quarters, he would himself propose or support proposals by others, having for their object the withdrawal of the Maynooth Grant and of all other endowments in Ireland?

MR. GLADSTONE: I think, Sir, if I might ask the indulgence of my hon. Friend, it perhaps would be more convenient and more in accordance with the usage of debate if I were to offer in any remarks I may have to make on the Amendment of the noble Lord to-morrow night what would substantially serve as a reply to him. I would only say, as I know he is quite right in his statement that a great interest is felt on the subject—that I thought I had in my opening speech answered what I take to be the most important part of the hon. Member's Question, by saying that in my opinion—for I can say no more than that it was my opinion—any plan such as I had been endeavouring to lay the basis and foundation of must include provisions, whether immediate or not, for the entire relief of the Consolidated Fund from all charges, either for the Maynooth Grant or any other purposes of religion in Ireland.

ESTABLISHED CHURCH (IRELAND).

MOTION FOR COMMITTEE.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [30th March],

"That this House will immediately resolve itself into a Committee to consider the said Acts,"—(Mr. Gladstone :)

And which Amendment was,

To leave out from the word "House" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "while admitting that considerable modifications in the temporalities of the United Church in Ireland may, after the pending inquiry, appear to be expedient, is of opinion that any proposition tending to the disestablishment or disendowment of that Church ought to be reserved for the decision of a new Parliament,"—(Lord Stanley,)
—instead thereof.

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

Debate resumed.

MR. ROEBUCK: Sir, As I hold very definite and what are called in the cant phrase of the day "advanced" opinions on this subject, I shall be very plain and explicit in my statement of them. From the time that I entered political life I may say I have held steadfastly one opinion about Established Churches—I have always believed that they are a mischief; and therefore, Sir, impelled by no personal object, whether of power or profit—impelled neither by party considerations nor yet by any purposes of ambition—I shall vote for the right hon. Gentleman's Resolutions. I believe that a Church Establishment is a bad instrument for teaching religion. A Government when it undertakes to teach religion must, of necessity, undertake to teach some particular religion, and by so doing must necessarily give offence to a great number of persons in respect to subjects which they believe to be of the greatest possible importance. Moreover, I believe that Churchmen, and especially Church dignitaries are very unfit to be legislators; and therefore I should be very much pleased to see any departure from the House of Lords of any Church dignitaries. These being my opinions on the Main Question before us, I still wish to address to the House some considerations upon the manner and the arguments by which these propositions have been supported on the present occasion, and also, I may say, of the aim and intentions with which this proposition has been brought forward. One argument advanced in support of this Resolution has been that the present Established Church of Ireland is a badge of conquest as regards the Catholic population of Ireland. Now, this is a proposition that I utterly and entirely deny. The conquest of Ireland—the Norman Conquest of Ireland—was made when England and Ireland were Catholic, and if there be any badge of conquest resulting from the transactions of that time, it is the Catholic Papal Church of Ireland; for, as the right hon. Gentleman himself said, at the time of this conquest Ireland was not in connection with the Papacy, and therefore the Norman conquest, which led to that connection, established as a badge of conquest the Papal Church in Ireland. And, accordingly, I say it is misleading the people of Ireland for us to allege that the present Established Church of Ireland is a badge of conquest. No man would be more ready, and has been more ready, than I to state my utter abhorrence of the mode in which England has governed Ireland. No man has been more ready to find fault with those terrible penal laws, which were the curse of Ireland and the disgrace of this country. But those laws have been repealed, and now there remains no possible grievance in Ireland except that Established Church which, is now complained of. Since the year 1829 this House has pursued one steady course of legislation with regard to Ireland. Day by day, year by year, we have erased from the statute book one enactment after another, which drew a line of distinction between the Irish people and the people of England. And now, at this present moment—I challenge contradiction of the statement—there is no difference between the situation of an Irish Catholic and an Englishman in England before the law. Well, then, if we have done that, have we not done much that ought to have conciliated the people? But we are told that we have done nothing until we have disestablished the Irish Church. Now, Sir, the quarrel between England and Ireland is not a quarrel of religion; it is a quarrel of race; it is a quarrel of conquest. [“Laughter.”] Aye, of conquest. We have no quarrel with Scotland, because we did not conquer Scotland. We have even now a quarrel with Wales—as everybody knows who knows anything of the country—because in the days of Edward I. we conquered Wales. It is one of the most curious phenomena of man’s nature that a circumstance like that should rest in the recollections of a people; but it does, and the Irish people will not, to the latest hour of their existence, forget that they were conquered in the reign of Henry I. Now, that may appear to be a paradox; but search the history of the world over, and you will find it to be true. But we are told, and we were boldly told by a hon. Member behind me, that, disendowing the Irish Church, arrange the land question as you will—even in the fashion which the Irish people want it—still you will not have done that which the Irish people demand, and without which they will not be satisfied. What do they want? They want separation from England. We may hide it as much as we please from ourselves, but the fact remains, that until you have separated Ireland from England, and made her independent, you will not have satisfied the wishes, the intentions, the projects of a great portion of the people of Ireland. So much, then, as to the statement that the Irish Church is a badge of conquest. Now, next, as to the Irish Church being a tax upon the people of Ireland. Let us understand that matter clearly. We are told that the tithes belong to the Irish Papal Church. My answer is—a very small portion of them only. And, moreover, I claim for this Parliament the power of changing the appropriation of public property, and devoting it to whatever purpose it pleases; and if this Parliament decides to disendow the Irish Church, it has perfect power to do so, and all the talk about the sacredness of her property is to me utter nonsense and rubbish. But, Sir, this cuts both ways. Do not talk to me of the Church property belonging to the Irish Roman Catholic Church, because I assume at once that Parliament has power to divert the public property. It has diverted the Church property, and so far it has gone to the Irish Church. There is no sacred right—none of any sort connected with human affairs. What to-day is law, may be to-morrow repealed; and there is nothing this House has established which to-morrow it may not disestablish. Now, let us understand this doctrine of tithe, because it was one of the statements made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire that the Irish people maintained a Church to which they are opposed. I deny that entirely. They do not do any such thing. The Irish farmer when he takes a farm takes it subject to tithe; he therefore takes it at so much less rent, and he does not pay the tithe. The landlord when he buys an estate buys it charged with tithe; he buys it at so much less, and therefore he does not buy the tithe. It does not belong to him. To whom does it belong? It belongs to the State, which may apply the tithe as it will. Therefore, the real question at issue is this—Is the property now held by the Irish Church so employed that it may be said to be employed in the best way for the Irish people? I think I am putting the case in the fairest way possible. Well, I do not think it is, Sir; but, at the same time, I think much may be said in its favour for the way it is applied, and that is not taken into consideration by those who speak and talk on the subject. First, I think I have established that neither the farmer nor the landlord pay the tithe. Therefore, it is no tax upon the people of Ireland. Now comes the question as to its application. This first step in the application of tithe is a thing that requires consideration. As it is now applied, it places in every parish of Ireland an educated gentleman and his family. That, I say, is a matter of the greatest possible importance to any country; but more especially to Ireland. That is the first application of the funds of the Irish Church at present. Now, I am perfectly willing to say that far too much of the proceeds of the Irish Church are applied to the dignitaries of that Church, and that I should like the hard-working clergy of the Irish Church to be far better paid than they are. But still I return again to the view that there are an educated gentleman and his family in every parish in Ireland; and I ask any Gentleman connected with that country, or at all acquainted with it, whether the greatest possible benefit does not follow from that fact? I am quite sure I am speaking the truth when I say that if, in any locality or parish, there are a few resident gentlemen, among the most esteemed and respected of them is the clergyman of the Established Church. Further, I believe that the greater number of these men spend more money than they ever receive from the Church while they live in the parish in which they serve. Therefore, I say to right hon. Gentlemen on the front Opposition Bench, is this the moment at which you propose to disendow the Irish Church at one blow? You ought at least to recollect the fatal effect it will have in taking from every parish in Ireland one man who is bound to be resident there throughout the whole course of his life. So much for that; but there is yet another thing which you should take into consideration. Now, I think it is unwise to hide from ourselves the actual state of the case as regards the mind of the people of Ireland. If you were to poll the people of Ireland to-morrow, the large majority would be found hostile to English connection; but there is a body to be found in Ireland who are heart and soul in connection with England. They are loyal—they are enthusiastically loyal. Who are they? Why, they are the Irish Protestants. The Irish Church with them is a matter of strong feeling—they love their Church; and they believe their Church does them good, in which I think they are mistaken. But they believe it; and you are about to run counter to that strong feeling of the Irish Protestant people when you take away from them that Church which they hold in such great veneration. I do not hold that feeling which I have just expressed with regard to the Protestant Church in particular. I tell the Roman Catholics that I feel exactly the same with regard to their Church, and I do not think it at all a benefit to the population. Therefore, Sir, I am quite ready to disestablish and disendow any Established Church which I can lay my hands upon. But still, Sir, there are times for all things, and I want to know is this a time we should select for the disendowment of the Irish Church and making ourselves unpopular with that small portion of the Irish people who are really heart and soul with us? This is a consideration which a statesman should weigh well in his mind. I can imagine men so vivid, so vehement, so energetic in their course, and so desirous of personal aggrandizement, that they forget everything connected with the Irish Church. I can imagine such men; I do not pretend that I can see them—I can imagine them; but he is no statesman who at this time and in this peculiar contingency proposes to disendow the Irish Church. I have known many years when it might have been done. I advocated its being done in 1835; but the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) opposed it then as far as we went. The Resolutions of Lord John Russell were supported by myself and the great Radical party at that time; and we attained the end for which those Resolutions were proposed. We ousted the Tories from power, and no sooner was that happy consummation attained, than all the recollections of those Resolutions were forgotten, and we were left with our mouths open and our eyes staring to look at the sudden gyration of the great Whig party. That was not the only time at which we were so served. Sir Robert Peel came into power, and the last time he presided over the councils of this country he did great good for England. He did away with the Corn Laws; he improved trade, and established a financial state of things such as was never before known. But what was the immediate return made him by the Liberal party? They turned him headlong out of office, and upon what? Upon a proposal to protect life and property in Ireland, which proposal was supported by the right hon. and hon. Gentlemen who turned Sir Robert Peel out as soon as they themselves got in. Again, Sir, in the same way, when Lord Derby was in power in 1859, Resolutions on the subject of Reform were brought by that eminent Reformer Lord John Russell, who, when he found that "finality" would not get the Whigs into office, turned Reformer. It was proposed to oust Lord Derby; and I took the liberty of saying that the persons whom the Liberal party were about to bring in would never carry a Reform Bill. I said that Lord Palmerston might propose, but never would carry a Reform Bill. Again, what happened? Lord Derby was ousted, and Reform slept as long as Lord Palmerston lived. Again the change occurred in 1866, and the Tory party came again into power, and immense exertions and vehement attempts were made to turn them out; but luckily, Sir, there were more men of my opinion than there had been in 1859. We kept the Tories out, and we got a Reform Bill. And now I want to say one word to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire. I hope the same trick is not to be repeated—for tricks I call the things I have been describing. I hope there will be no Motions of that kind; but that these Resolutions, which are bold in their utterance, will be as boldly carried out, and that we are to oust the Gentlemen opposite, as I suppose we are, there will be no halting, no shuffling, no trickery, but that the thing will be done. I hope there will be no saying—"This is so difficult; we did not contemplate the thing before us; we have grown wise men by time and experience; we must let the thing drop; we are here, and will stay here." I hope nothing of that sort will happen; but that when we have carried these Resolutions—or they will be carried—I hope the right hon. Gentleman will steadily adhere to them, and by no apparent juggling, (paraphrasing the phrase), twist or turn, evade the passing of these Resolutions. There are some things which are curious in them, with regard to addressing the Sovereign. As I am not an official person, I will not touch on that point, though I think it is one which might engage the attention of a legal official; but, if we carry these Resolutions, I hope the right hon. Gentleman is prepared with a Bill; and that these Resolutions have not been framed as a mere cast upon the waters to attain a particular end; but framed by persons who have carefully considered what they wish to attain, how it is to be attained, and means at their hands to attain it; and further, that when the right hon. Gentleman comes before the people of England with his Bill he will be prepared to stand or fall by his measure.

Mr. Roebuck

Mr. Roebuck

I said at the commencement of my remarks that what I was about to say I would say plainly, and I think I have done so. There can, I imagine, be no misunderstanding as to what I have said, and, above all, I would ask hon. Gentlemen to believe that I have no desire to express anything disrespectful to the Catholics. Many of my dearest friends are Catholics, and I entertain so much respect for them that I hope nothing I may have said will be construed as disrespectful to anything they believe in or hold in reverence and respect. I cannot, however, help feeling that the Catholic population of Ireland is hostile to English and Imperial rule. I regard this question not as an Englishman, not as an Irishman, not as a Scotchman, but as an Imperial Englishman. I know not what other phrase to employ, for I detest the word "Briton." I use the phrase "Imperial Englishman" to signify a subject of this Imperial country, and we all must perceive, from the numerous indications around us, that no great Empire was ever brought together but by separate pieces. And we are told and taught, and must believe it, that at this time no small Empire can exist. The mere fact that there is such a steamship of war as the Warrior, costing £500,000 proves that no small country can maintain itself at this time without the aid and assistance of great nations around it. Cut off Ireland from England and you cut off her right arm. As long as I have a voice in this great Assembly that voice shall be raised in maintenance of the Imperial rule, whenever that rule is called in question. No sentimental talk about oppression to Ireland, and, indeed, nothing on earth, shall move me from that position. Whatever comes, our Imperial rule must be maintained, and, whatever disputes may occur, nothing ought to induce this House to do anything to dis sever one portion of the kingdom from the other. And now, Sir, I would ask the right hon. Gentleman opposite and the right hon. Gentleman on this side of the House not to forget in their strife this Empire. Let not place, let not ambition so blind them as to induce them to rush headlong into courses which, in their quieter moments, they must know to be dangerous to our greatness. They have in their hands the destinies of this great Empire, and I implore them never to forget in the conduct of their warfare the comfort and the happiness of the people.

MR. HENLEY: I can assure my right

hon. and gallant Friend (General Peel) (who had risen at the same time) that I shall not stand long between him and the House, and that I should not have done so at all if I had not heard the Speaker distinctly name me. The hon. and learned Gentleman who has just closed his address (Mr. Roebuck) has, I think, put this question on the very strongest grounds. He says he will do everything in his power to maintain the Union, and that as an Imperial Englishman, and looking at the matter from an Imperial point of view, he will do everything he can to prevent the right arm of England being cut off. Now, I agree with him in that, and I think it is not unfair to examine the proposal before us, in order to see how it bears upon that branch of the question. One of the Resolutions proposed by the right hon. Gentleman embodies a principle, and another a question of time. I shall briefly address myself to both these questions, and first of all I will take the question of time. The right hon. Gentleman who has brought this matter before the House has by his statement saved us much trouble. Some of us might have otherwise thought it was a Motion brought forward because certain parties were not in power. My opinion of the character of the right hon. Gentleman forbids my having any such opinion. It might, perhaps, have been thought that he had been impelled to take up this question by the amount of crime and distress in Ireland, or else by a general sense of justice to the nation. The latter supposition, however, I am obliged to put aside, because, if there had been any strong sense of that in the breast of the right hon. Gentleman, it is impossible that for twenty-five years he could have remained silent and quiescent under such circumstances. Then we come back to what I think the right hon. Gentleman himself said—namely, that he had been induced to bring this question forward because the Government of which he was a Member, and subsequently the present Government, had been obliged to repeal the Habeas Corpus Act on account of the Fenianism which existed. The right hon. Gentleman told us that steam had bridged the Atlantic, and that this fact caused Fenianism to assume a different shape from what it might have assumed under other circumstances. Being now carried to America, one is naturally led to ask what “platform” it was that the Fenians chose when they came to this country. I think their first and broad proposition was “Ireland for the Irish.” The next was to get rid of all priests and parsons of every sort, creed, and description. At least, this was said of them, though whether truly or not I do not know. I suppose these great friends of liberty, the Fenians, considered all persons whose business it was to persuade them to do right, or dissuade them from doing wrong, were enemies of the human race. In the next place, the landlords were to have their throats cut as a simple way of getting rid of the land difficulty. Now, all these were very plain and simple questions, and they were straightforward also; because if a man says he will cut my throat, while I have an opportunity of cutting his, we can square the matter, and there is an end of it. With regard to the land question we have the proposal of the hon. Member for Westminster (Mr. Stuart Mill) and that of the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright). Both these hon. Gentlemen proceed by somewhat violent modes—one of which may perhaps be designated as rape, and the other by the gentler phrase of seduction. But the right hon. Gentleman, the Member for South Lancashire says, “Do not trouble your heads about either of these methods; but endeavour, with me, to do away with the Irish Church, after which you will have the land at your disposal, and you can try your experiments in that direction.” Now, it seems to me that in the course of the debate the right hon. Gentleman has almost earned for himself the name of a “compound Fenian,” for, by the way in which he blends the violent and the gentle together and proposes a scheme of spoliation on which they can work their wicked will, he seems to be a joint actor in favour of the Fenian movement. [“Oh! oh!”] The Fenian movement is to dissolve the Union. “Ireland for the Irish” means nothing less than that. You may turn the phrase about as you like, but that is what it means. Now, is the matter which we have now in hand likely to strengthen, or is it likely to weaken, our power of opposing the Fenian movement? That is the point which we must look at and decide. Did the party which sought for a dissolution of the Union twenty years ago, when the battle of the cabbage-garden was fought, ask to have the Church disestablished? I do not think you can find that it was, and if it were not, and if you are not going to conciliate the party which now wants to dissolve the Union, by doing away with the Irish Church, why should you thereby offend that section of the Irish people on whom you have been almost always obliged to rely in times of trial, difficulty and danger whether in Ireland or elsewhere, and who have always stood firmly by our institutions? What will be the feelings of these people if you wantonly offer a great affront to them and do them a great and permanent injury? The right hon. Gentleman has told us in his most beautiful language something about the nature of this Establishment. He said something about the piety of those who had gone before, in setting apart a portion of their property for the maintenance of those who were to come after them, and for the promotion of their best and greatest interests. That was the substance of what he said. But the right hon. Gentleman described one side of the subject as being ethereal and the other as being earthy. I confess that whether it be ethereal or earthy, or a compound of both, I think that those who in years gone by—more years than I could enumerate—set aside in all Christian countries this portion of property for religious purposes did a great good. I do not want to say anything now upon the origin of this appropriation. I believe that may be disputed. But I know that for a long series of years this property has been so set aside, and that it has been confirmed by a long series of enactments in its present channel. But this I must say, that every word that was uttered by the right hon. Member for South Lancashire, every word that fell from the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright), and every word that fell from the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck) against the Establishment of the Irish Church—every word so uttered goes against all Establishments. The hon. and learned Gentleman who has just spoken said he was not disinclined to disestablish anything anywhere. This confirms my opinion that it is not merely a question of disestablishing the Irish Church, but a question which strikes at the root of all Establishments. The hon. Member (Mr. Bright) drew a vivid picture of what was going on in various parts of the world, endeavouring to show—quoting, I think, Lord Aberdeen—that the Establishment in Scotland was an injury to that country. I think we may couple the expression of the right hon. Gentleman three years ago—that the possibility of acting on this subject was a “remote” one—with the statement of the hon. Member (Mr. Bright) that he would be a rash prophet who said anything as to the time the English Church would last as an Establishment. [Mr. BRIGHT: If that was agreed.] If three years ago was a remote period with regard to the Irish Church, how long will it be before the time of the English Church comes, provided you once enter upon this course? The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Goschen) said the Irish Church was only a Parliament Church. But what security have you for anything except Acts of Parliament? What security have you for the Funds? It rests on the national faith; and can anything be more strongly pledged than our national faith was at the time of the Union with Ireland? It is impossible that we can have anything more strong. And is that all? What happened in the Act of Union with Scotland? There again you recited the fact of the maintenance of the Established Church. I say, if the Irish Church is a Parliamentary Church, so is the English, so is the Scotch Church. You can draw no difference between them. It is the principle of endowments you are attacking. You say that the Irish Church is small in numbers. I do not know whether the figures of the right hon. Gentleman are accurate; but he was not able to show a material difference between the relative numbers of Protestants and Catholics in Ireland now and at the time of the Union. On this ground, then, how would it be just to alter now that which it was just to stipulate for in a solemn treaty then? There is another point to be borne in mind. Will anything that we can do on this subject have a chance of pacifying Ireland? From what section of her people have you had any such assurance? Well, if it is not certain you will do that, why attempt to do what will be a great wrong, and break a solemn treaty, pledging the good faith even of your Sovereign to the maintenance of the Establishment? It seems to me that you are going to ask us to do this great wrong wantonly, and without any security for the future. I feel strongly upon this matter. The right hon. Gentleman said he sympathized with those who had a strong feeling for the Establishment. I am one of those. I feel that the Establishment is a great benefit and blessing to the country, and therefore I have a strong feeling in its favour. I wish I had the right hon. Gentleman's vote instead of his sympathy. For twenty-five years he has been carrying the Irish Church in his belly; yet now he comes forward on a sudden to cast her off and destroy her. Now, many a man in this House, who is a loyal subject of the Queen, might say, "Abstractedly I do not defend monarchy upon principle." I do not know whether there is any such individual; but I can conceive that there may be; and so with regard to the Irish Church Establishment. At all events, I defend the Establishment upon principle, believing it to be the duty of the State to set apart funds for the maintenance of that which the governing Power in the State believes to be the truth, and to support the truth and see that it is taught to the people. I think the question presses in another way. The hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Roebuck), says this country is strong. I admit that power and right are two different things; but we should remember that we are now called upon to exercise that power in breaking a treaty made for the benefit of the weak. You made this treaty; you took away from those with whom you made it the power of exercising a voice, except in a very limited and inefficacious degree; and, recollecting this, I say it would be unjust and ungenerous to do what you are about to do. Believing, Sir, that, unconsciously it may be, you are playing into the hands of those who want to dissolve the Union between this country and Ireland, I can only say that if I were to vote for this measure, I should feel that I was a traitor to my Sovereign, my country, and my God.

Mr. Henley

GENERAL PEEL: The vote which I shall give upon the present occasion will be governed entirely by the opinion I have formed upon the effect of the Resolutions of the right hon. Gentleman upon the Constitution of this country. It will have no reference to that other issue which may govern the votes of many Gentlemen opposite—namely, whether the right hon. Member for South Lancashire or the right hon. Member for Bucks shall sit upon the Treasury Bench; but I cannot help expressing my regret that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) should have thought it necessary to make the destruction of the Protestant Church in Ireland the war-cry by which, I will not say to rally "the rabble" around him—for, notwithstanding the high authority of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bouverie), I do not think that is a respectful way of speaking of hon. Gentlemen opposite—but in order to induce those "followers who will not follow" to follow him into the Lobby, and that he should not only make the destruction of the Protestant Church in Ireland that war-cry, but should do so upon such scant notice as would hardly be decent or respectful in the case of a Railway or a Turnpike Bill, and should ask this House by an abstract Resolution to do two or three such little things as repeal an important Article of the Union and the Coronation Oath, and destroy the Established Church of Ireland. Now, what are the grounds on which the House is asked to go into Committee to express an opinion that the Established Church of Ireland should cease as an Establishment? I wish to argue the matter fairly, and to consider the ground put forward by the highest Roman Catholic authority (Cardinal Cullen), who says in a letter—"It is now admitted that the Established Church is an injustice and an insult to the people." Sir, in considering whether it is an injustice, I put aside altogether, as the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield did, the assertion which is often made by some—that it is a great act of injustice that Roman Catholics should be called on by the payment of tithe to contribute to the support of a religion to which they do not belong. I think the answer to that was put so well in the pamphlet of Sir George Lewis, from which we have all seen copious extracts lately, that I need not dwell upon it. He says, in point of fact, that the Catholics pay nothing—that tithe in Ireland is not in the nature of a tax, but is a reserved rent that never belonged either to the landlords or tenants. If that be so, I cannot see the injustice of calling on the Catholics to pay that which never belonged to them. As to the title of the Protestant Church to the endowments which it possesses, I rely entirely on the highest legal authority in this country—the Lord Chancellor. He proved in his speech on the 24th of June last the perfect validity of that title. I will not repeat the quotations he made from the speeches of Lord Plunket, Lord Macaulay, and other friends of the Catholics, who all admitted that there was no title equal to that of prescription, and which was just as valid for Church property as any other kind of property. I have never heard that questioned, except by Dr. Moriarty, who, I believe, is a Roman Catholic Bishop. He says—

"The Catholics acknowledge no prescription

this case. There is no Statute of Limitations. The right is in abeyance, but unimpaired."

Now, I am no lawyer; but I can conceive the right being "in abeyance and unimpaired" on the part of those who have admitted the title of those who are in possession, and that they did so the Secretary of State for the Home Department moved the other night, for he quoted their words to that effect. I am one of the Members of this House who took part in the debates of 1829; and I must take leave to draw attention to the contrast that exists between the Resolution which was passed in the Committee on which the Bill then brought forward was founded and the Resolutions about to be submitted to the House. The Resolution passed in Committee on the 6th of March, 1829, was as—

"That it is expedient to provide for the repeal of the Laws which impose civil disabilities upon Roman Catholic subjects of His Majesty, with such exceptions, and under such Regulations, as may be required for the full and permanent security of the Establishments in Church and State, the maintenance of the Reformed Religion, established by Law, and of the rights and privileges of the Bishops and of the Clergy of this Realm, and of the Churches committed to their charge."—[2 Hansard, xx. 892.]

I venture to say that without that Resolution there would not have been ten men who would have voted for the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire says that Catholic Emancipation was extracted from us through fear of the Catholic Association. That, in all events, did not decide my vote. I said at the time "That I believed the very worst kind of legislation was that which submitted the law to a power which was opposed to the law;" and therefore I voted in the minority, and from that moment I have never seen any reason to regret my doing so. On the contrary, subsequent events have proved that the opinion I then expressed was founded in truth. I may be told that the admission of Roman Catholics to this House might be expected to lead, as a necessary consequence, to such a measure as this. That was the view I took, and so stated it at the time. I have no objection to Roman Catholics as individuals. I have no objection to them as a body. Nay, I stated that I had no objection to the Roman Catholic religion so long as it did not interfere with the Protestant Church. I never joined in the cry of

General Peel

"No Popery." On the contrary I look with the greatest possible respect on the Roman Catholics—with far greater respect than upon those half Roman Catholics and half Protestants whose service, if not contrary to law, is certainly contrary to the spirit of our religion. And though I would not write up "No Popery" on the outside of our churches, I would wish to see it inscribed on the inside. I can assure the Roman Catholics that if any endowment or any property of theirs was attacked I would object as strongly against any spoliation of it, as I would against the spoliation of the property of the Protestants. I wish to see justice done. Hon. Gentlemen opposite said, "Justice was refused to Ireland." My opinion of justice to Ireland is, that we ought to pay the same respect to the rights of property in Ireland—whether the property is that of the Church, of a corporation, or of an individual—as to the like rights in England. I, for one, will never consent to pass a law for Ireland the principle of which will not apply to this country. And if I wished to give any proof of my anxiety to do them justice, I would remind them that after many years of Liberal Government it was left to me to do justice to the Roman Catholic chaplains in the army, by placing them on the same footing as the Protestant and Presbyterian chaplains. I was for levelling up, not for levelling down. I was quite certain that the securities offered at the passing of the Emancipation Act would be swept away, and ever since I have had a perfect horror of securities. I said on that occasion that the Roman Catholics never would be satisfied until they had the property of the Irish Protestant Church. I was replied to on that occasion by a Member for whom I had the greatest respect—Sir Francis Burdett, then Member for Westminster, who, I have every reason to believe, spoke the sentiments of that constituency. That long-tried friend of the Roman Catholics said, in reply to what I had stated—

"The hon. Member who had spoken last had fallen into the strange notion, which had been lately brought into notice, that nothing less than the subversion of the Established Church could content the Catholics. Such an idea was so injurious to the persons to whom it attached, and so utterly out of their contemplation—an idea which he trusted none of them dreamed of—that it was creating feelings in their minds which they never thought of, to suggest this objection."—[2 Hansard, xx. 876.]

But perhaps it may be said the hon. Baronet did not represent the feelings of the Roman Catholics. I will, then, give you what was said by the representative of a Catholic constituency (Limerick) in reply to Mr. Daniel Whittle Harvey, then Member for Colchester, who had stated that the ground on which he supported the measure for the relief of the Roman Catholics was that it would lead to a combination between the Catholics and Dissenters for the purpose of making a joint attack upon the Establishment of the Protestant Church. And now you shall hear what the calm man of Limerick of those days said. Mr. Spring-Rice said—

“If this measure were likely to endanger the Protestant Church, or at all to trench upon its constitution, then he should think Catholic Emancipation a measure attended with danger.”—[2 Hansard, xx. 812.]

He concluded by saying—

“If the question were to go to a division on the grounds stated by the hon. Member for Colchester, there was not a friend to the Catholics on the Opposition side of the House, and, he hoped, not a friend to the Established Church on either side, who would not unhesitatingly refuse his support to it.”—[Ibid. 813.]

Well, then, the Catholics accepted the relief on the terms it was offered to them—on the Resolution providing security for the Protestant Church. But then I am told that times have changed since then, and no doubt I shall be accused of belonging to that party which the present hon. Member for Westminster (Mr. Stuart Mill) called “stupid,” who never keep pace with the times. Well, the times have changed; but that is exactly what I predicted, and surely it is no proof of stupidity in foreseeing what has occurred; at all events, I was wiser than the hon. Member for Westminster of those days, who said it never would occur. But the times are now going at such a rapid pace, and that not only without any control, but with a rivalry on the part of the Leaders, on both sides, who shall outstrip the times, bringing us so suddenly to such dangerous and unheard-of changes, that if any sensation novelist could have ventured to anticipate them, they would have appeared incredible. I will not venture to predict what they will not do; but this I will say—if these Resolutions be carried, the inevitable result will be the separation of the Church from the State in this country, and the repeal of the Union with Ireland. We are told that there are great masses of the Irish people dissatisfied with the Government;

do you think you are going to purchase their affection by adopting these Resolutions? I am going to leave the use of flattering words to others, and to say that which I believe to be true. You ask me what I believe to be the cause of the dissatisfaction which exists among the Irish people? and my reply is—It is the result of what you yourselves have done—it is the result of the sympathy you have shown for revolution elsewhere—to the moral support, as it is called, you have given to popular movements on the Continent. Have we not heard some of those, who ought to have the greatest sense of the responsibility resting upon them, say that the majority of a nation is entitled to decide upon whatever form of Government it thinks the best? And, if that be true, no doubt the Roman Catholics in Ireland are entitled to the benefit of the argument. I have said that I have never joined in the cry of “No Popery!” I never had the least sympathy with Orangemen or Orange Lodges, as long as there was no attack made upon their religion—as long as their demonstrations could only be considered as offensive to their Roman Catholic fellow-subjects—and as long as they were acting on the offensive, instead of on the defensive. But I regard their assembling now, in order to protect their religion, as the proper discharge of their duty as members of the Irish Protestant Church, and as affording an example which Churchmen in this country would do well to follow. Members of the Established Church, in all parts of the country, should endeavour, by petitioning and by every constitutional means in their power, to put a stop to the progress of these ideas. It has been stated that this question can only be decided by a new Parliament, to be returned by the new constituencies. Now, I have always objected to the practice of constituencies extracting pledges from candidates with reference to the course they would pursue upon a particular political question on which their opinions might be altered by argument. But this question of the Irish Church is one of principle—it is a question of the Constitution of the country, of the Throne, and of the State; and I should advise every Protestant elector in both countries not only to extract from his candidate a statement as to his present feeling upon the subject, but also a pledge that he is not to be “educated” so as to change them. I have lately en invited to join a new party, who, I think, call themselves Constitutionalists, who profess to stand by the principles laid down in the now famous letter of the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, addressed to Lord Dartmouth. And by the principles enunciated in that letter I hope that the writer will strictly abide. But, Sir, when I ran my eye over the list of the vice presidents and members of the association which I was invited to join, I found that it consisted only of my old friends the Conservatives under a new name. Now, I do not like changing names. I am always suspicious of persons having a great many aliases. When I found that my friends the Constitutionalists were the very people who, in my opinion, destroyed the Constitution last year, I had no wish to enrol myself among them. No, Sir, if I am obliged to go back and change my name, I would much rather go back to that under which I was brought up—that of the good old Tories. They, I believe, were the best Constitutionalists, and the best supporters of our Constitution, both as regards Church and State. I was not in the least surprised at the warmth and energy with which my noble Friend near me (Viscount Cranborne) opposed the amendment brought forward by the Government as explained by the speech of the noble Lord who moved it. It is difficult, if not impossible, to know what that amendment means. It might mean nothing; it might mean anything; or it might mean everything. The way I read it was this:—That the Cabinet was not yet entirely converted; that the party behind them was not sufficiently educated; and that the proposal of the Government, as explained by the noble Lord, was this: "Go thy way this time; when I have a more convenient season I will call for you;" and that the destruction of the Irish Church might prove hereafter to be one of those Conservative triumphs which the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury promised the party. But I was quite relieved from that impression by the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary. As long as that right hon. Gentleman sits upon that Bench which he adorns—and I hope that he will continue to sit there for a very long time—I shall feel perfectly safe, because I know that no Government of which he is a Member could propose the disestablishment of the Irish Church. It is suggested that the issue of this debate may be to bring in a Liberal Government; but I say to the Protestants of the Established Church, "By no means give way to despair; be strong and of good courage, and be not dismayed; you have the examples before you of 1835 and of 1859." The Liberal party have been referred to as the "engineers" and "pioneers" who clear the road; but I rather look upon them as guide-posts which point out the road—and a very bad road it often is—but who never advance one inch themselves. It may be said that I am about to raise the old cry of "No surrender," and as far as the connection between Protestant Church and State in Ireland is concerned I join most heartily in that cry. Upon the subject of the "modification of the temporalities,"—whatever that phrase may mean—I do not believe that there is one man in a hundred who would not be inclined to do away with the anomalies mentioned by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire. But I think it will be quite time enough to decide that point when we see the Report of the Royal Commission now sitting to inquire into the subject. We can easily decide what shall be done with any surplus revenue not required by the Irish Church when we have ascertained what that surplus is. I am guided on this point by the opinion of Sir Robert Peel. In the course of the debate upon the Appropriation Act of 1835 the then hon. Member for Derbyshire quoted from Captain Macheath, whereupon Sir Robert Peel turned round and said, "He was a much cleverer man than you are, for he never appropriated his surplus until he ascertained that he had got it." I am content to act upon that principle, and to wait until I hear the Report of the Royal Commission. Meanwhile, I shall meet both the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman opposite and the Amendment of the noble Lord with a direct negative.

General Peel

MR. LOWE: I have listened to the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck) with great pleasure, for two reasons: first, because he promised us his vote; and, next, because I derived additional conviction of the strength of our case from finding that his feelings in our favour are so deeply rooted that he is about to give us that vote in despite of every argument that he used against us. I will not occupy the time of the House in commenting upon the speech of the hon. and learned Member, because he entirely answered himself, and sometimes even went so far as to answer his own answer. I wish to draw the attention of the House rather more directly than has been done by recent speeches to the subject before us. If we take the Census of 1861 as our guide, we shall find that every 100 average Irishmen are divided in this manner—seventy-eight will be Roman Catholics, who have no assistance at all towards the support of their religion; twelve will be members of the Irish Church, as it is called, who receive State assistance towards the support of their religion; nine will be Presbyterians, who receive an endowment or bribe, in order to induce them to acquiesce in the existence of the State Church; and 1 per cent will consist of waifs and strays made up of other and minor sects. There is a simple eloquence about these figures which goes to my heart when I mention them, and the most elaborate argument can scarcely add to their force. They do not, however, by any means state the whole case against the Irish Church. The 12 per cent who belong to the Established Church are, upon the whole, the richest part of the Irish community, and are therefore the best able to maintain an Establishment of their own, while the 78 per cent who belong to the Roman Catholic Church, and who receive nothing, form the poorest part of the Irish community, and are the least able to maintain a Church of their own. It is impossible to recur to these facts without being reminded of Dives and Lazarus; only Lazarus was allowed to eat of the crumbs which fell from the rich man's table, while the Irish Lazarus gets nothing whatever. The case, however, goes still further; for this inequality, instead of being smoothed over, is greatly exaggerated by all the external manifestations that are possible. The Church of the 12 per cent is not only endowed, but it is Established. The Queen is its head—its Bishops sit by rotation in the House of Lords—it has Ecclesiastical Courts established and maintained at the public expense to decide ecclesiastical questions arising among this small body; and it has an Establishment altogether so superfluous and so monstrous as if it was intended to point and give sting to the inequality that already existed. Just look at the difference between the state of things in this country and in Ireland. Look at the difference between the numbers of the members of the Church of England in this country and in Ireland, and then recollect that there are twelve Bishops belonging to the Irish Church. I am reminded, in pointing attention to these facts, of the lines—

"If, in England, for three million souls 'tis conceded

Two proper-sized Bishops are all that is needed;

'Tis plain, for the Irish half-million who want 'em,

One-third of a Bishop is just the right quantum."

If the Irish were to have Bishops in the same proportion as the English, they should, instead of twelve Bishops, have one-third of a Bishop, or something like that. People talk of the danger of trusting the Church in a country like Ireland to voluntary efforts. Why, Ireland is, par excellence, the country of voluntaryism. What can be a stronger instance of that principle than a country in which 78 per cent of the people pay every shilling that is raised for their religion? It is not because you insult that voluntaryism by placing side by side with it this pompous and overgrown Establishment that you alter the real feeling of the community; and, do what we will, it will remain a country of voluntaryism. The question before you is, whether you will consent to go hand and hand with that feeling, or will strive to overshadow it by the pomp of the Irish Establishment? Then I suppose that the use of the Establishment must be to make people better. Can anyone, can any reasonable man, believe that the Irish Establishment is calculated to make anyone better? What good qualities is it to educe? Is it likely to make the Catholics better when they feel that it has been taken from them; if not as a badge of conquest, certainly as a badge of reconquest? They must be more than human if they do not compare with feelings of discontent the poverty and homeliness of their own worship with the pomp and splendour of the worship of the minority. Is it the Protestants whom you expect to make better, by accustoming them to the selfishness and the disregard of the feelings and rights of their neighbours, which are inseparable from the condition of a dominant minority. Then is it a wise thing that such an Establishment should continue to exist? Is it wise that, after we have one by one struck off the fetters of the Irish Roman Catholics, we should leave these last two or three to gall and single, so as continually to remind those whom we wish to conciliate of the sufferings they formerly endured? Is it wise, by a constant reference to the date of that Church's birth, to recall to the recollection of the Irish Roman Catholics a period when those without the pale were regarded by the Protestants as creatures scarcely human, and when the Church was imposed upon them, without the slightest regard to their wishes, their feelings, their traditions, or their devotion? I can scarcely imagine any course more imprudent, if we really desire to conciliate Ireland, than to stand, as the right hon. and gallant General (General Peel) recommends us to do, dogmatically by this Establishment. We may rely upon this, that, by whatever means we may attempt to conciliate the Irish Roman Catholics, it is a conditio sine qua non to our success that we should fully acknowledge that they are our equals in political status, a thing which they never can feel while this Establishment is maintained. The proportion of Protestants and Episcopalians to the Roman Catholics in Ireland is pretty much the same as if with two-and-a-half millions of Catholics, two-and-a-half millions of Englishmen were Roman Catholics, and that the Pope, or some foreign Power which we could not resist, forced upon us an Establishment surrounded with every circumstance of pomp and power for the benefit of those people, and that the Protestants were left to provide for their own religion. We should say that nothing but main force should induce us to bear it, and if we submitted to any other means we should deserve and receive the contempt of the world. This being the state of the case with regard to the Irish Church, we are asked with an air of triumph why this side of the House has moved in this matter now? The question should rather be, why have we not moved long ago? I have never entertained a doubt on this subject, and never shall. There have been those, however, who have led this party who have thought differently. But the times have changed. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) deplores the changes that are coming. But what is this change? The shadow that has fallen over you in this matter is created by the fire you kindled last year. ["Oh, oh!"] Do you suppose that you can meddle with the institutions of the country without its producing its natural effects? Do you think that after what was done last year, in the cause of equality, you can have recourse to your old stock arguments, and go on evoking our sympathies as you have over and again attempted to do for a pampered minority—a minority pampered at the expense of a poorer majority, and that we should listen to arguments which appear to ignore the existence of any Irish beyond the pale of the Church? But there are other circumstances, I think, which justify us in the course we have adopted. We have got a new Government, and a new Government that do not come to us in the guise of a Conservative Government, but as a truly Liberal Government. Now, the Chief Secretary made this observation in his speech with regard to the Protestant Church. He dealt with two subjects, one was that of education and the other was the Church. Now, this is what he said, and this is what is given us, the Liberal party, as a truly Liberal doctrine with regard to Ireland—

Mr. Lowe

"The Question must be dealt with in a very different spirit from that which advocates entire abolition."—[3 Hansard, exc. 1393.]

He continued—

"Confiscation is the worst proposal that can be made, either as regards the Church or the land."—[Ibid. 1394.]

I am not canvassing the justice of the noble Lord's statement. I merely wish to show you what the manifesto of the Government was on the Irish Church Question. Then he says—

"The despoiled, if confiscation were agreed on, would feel much more sorely than those to whose position they were brought; and I am sure that the statesman who proposed to give peace to Ireland at the expense of the Irish Church, would create few additional friends of British rule, and would not fail to alienate a large and influential party to whom we are bound by every tie that is sacred."—[p. 1394.]

I do not deny that he spoke in that respect the language which hon. Gentlemen opposite have been accustomed to hear and cheer on this subject, language that goes home to their feelings, and I am not now arguing against the justice of what he says. But what I maintain is, that in this language and in this speech hon. Members on this side will not recognize what they have been accustomed to regard as truly Liberal sentiments. And when the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government appeals to us to support his Government on the ground that it is truly Liberal, and when we are furnished with this as a specimen, we are challenged to show what truly Liberal sentiments really are, and to declare that we can not for a moment accept as such the opinions which were expressed by the noble Lord. Then we have the only other thing that has been wanting—"The hour has come, and the man." We have at last a Leader who does not shrink from this question. The noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn endeavoured to show that the Resolutions were bald and meaningless; that there is no effect in them; that he could not gather what they meant; but, at the same time, he told us in his speech that they had been received with rage and resentment in Ulster. So that apparently their meaning was understood by the people of Ulster, and the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary appeared to comprehend their meaning when he took them for his text the other evening, and dealt with them in a manner which showed that they were not the absolutely meaningless phrases which they were held to be by the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn. It certainly appeared as if the noble Lord had prepared a speech on the hypothesis that the speech of my right hon. Friend would not explain the Resolutions. Indeed, it reminded me of the guns in the Bosphorus, built in the wall, which would blow a vessel to pieces if it would only be kind enough to pass exactly in front of them. But, if it did not, the guns will not traverse, and their contents go into empty air. We, at all events, have not shrunk from discussing this question. We were challenged by the noble Lord the Chief Secretary, and we have, I rejoice to say, taken that challenge up. The question has been fairly raised, and it must be decided. Then, what is there to be said against the proposal of my right hon. Friend? It is said that we are giving up the Act of Union. I should like to ask any hon. Gentleman, legal or non-legal, whence the Parliament of 1800 derived the power which enabled it to bind all future Parliaments, or why it possessed such paramount authority that we should have lost a certain amount of our power, which has been taken away from us and all succeeding Parliaments by the Act of the Parliament of 1800? We claim no power to bind our successors; and, while the Government are endeavouring to impress upon us the fact that we cannot by our action control the next Parliament, we are told that we cannot interfere with what was done by the Parliament of 1800.

Then, Gentlemen talk of a compact; but who were the parties to that compact? How many Roman Catholics sat in the Parliament at that time? The Protestant Parliament of Ireland makes, or is bribed to make, a compact with the Protestant Parliament of England, purporting to exclude Roman Catholics for ever from rights which are, as I say, inherent in every Roman Catholic. We have nothing to do with, and are not bound by, such a compact as that. This notion of a permanent law, and the power of one generation to bind another, would be ridiculous, if it were not so mischievous. In that respect, at any rate, we may take a lesson from America. The Americans have always acted upon the doctrine that the present generation is lord and master of the destinies of the generation; and it has been that pliability of their machinery which has enabled them to carry on their Government under many difficult circumstances. Then there is the Coronation Oath. I will not say much about that, because there is no man who will say that the Coronation Oath binds the Queen in her legislative character. To maintain that it did would be to say that the Parliament of William III. had power to veto the action of Parliament for all time to come in matters that might be of vital importance to the State. In that case, if a law of the first necessity had to be passed—and it was impossible that the Sovereign should give her assent to it—the result would be that the country would be forced into a revolution. And that is always the fate of permanent laws. Such ideas as these are bugbears in the times of peace; but at other periods they are scattered like the dust before the wind, because the only alternative is revolution. Besides, I should like to ask whether the duties of the Sovereign are not the same before as after the Coronation Oath has been taken; and, if so, whether, before the Oath, the Sovereign is bound to assent to no measure disestablishing the Irish Church? Then there is another argument—the argument of vested interests. A vested interest must be vested in somebody; and, if there is a vested interest here, it must be either in the Church, the clergy, or the laity. It cannot be in the Church, for this simple reason—that a vested interest means, as I understand it, a right to compensation for a reasonable expectation—for a right which can be ascertained in property, or something in the nature of property. Now the Church has no property at all; it is not a body politic or corporate; it is incapable of taking property—it cannot receive it or take it; property cannot be conveyed to it—it cannot own it, and therefore can have no vested interest. On the next point, I take the Secretary for the Home Department as my authority, and he says—

“As for the clergy, we can easily get rid of them with compensation. They are merely there for the benefit of others; they are public employés, who can be dealt with as easily as any others.”

It remains, then, as my hon. Friend the Secretary for the Home Department says, that the vested interest, if it exists at all, exists in the laity. Now, if it exists in the laity, and you take it away, as he says with great truth, you cannot compensate the people at all; you cannot compensate the laity for the withdrawal from among them of the Established Church; it is an injury to their feelings, and causes them inconvenience; but these things cannot be estimated at money value. Then, my right hon. Friend says, that you must not disestablish the Irish Church, because you cannot compensate the people for the loss of it. If that be so, there is no injustice existing in the world of which you can get rid, because people have only to seize upon something which is now the property of the whole community, and you are in this difficulty—you cannot compensate him by raising from the rest of the community the sum required. So that the community lose by the resumption just as much as they gain. Therefore, I apprehend, if you want to perpetuate a system of injustice, you have only to set up that question of compensation to the laity. Then there is an argument called “the garrison argument.” It is said we must keep up the Protestant Church in order to keep up the Protestant influence—in order to keep up a garrison in Ireland. The answer to that is very short. We are strong enough in Ireland at present to enforce a gross injustice on a majority of the people. Do not let us be afraid that when we have the majority on our side we shall not be able to force the minority to do justice: we shall have a better garrison than we have now—the hearts of a grateful Nation. Having referred to these arguments seriatim, I will make one criticism on them as a class, and that is a very important one. When we argue, in order to persuade a person, we ought to start from a common ground; we should get at a principle which we admit, and which he admits. If you start from what you believe, but your antagonist does not agree to, your argument is manifestly futile; it is what is known as “begging the question.” Is there any argument adduced in the course of the debate, or can any argument be adduced by human ingenuity, in support of the Irish Church, which will be at all likely to convince a Roman Catholic? Can any one say that the Roman Catholic is obstinate or wrong-headed because he does not consent to the foundation of the arguments brought forward? I know of no argument which can be brought forward that a sincere Roman Catholic can acquiesce in. You must start from a principle to which he will assent; otherwise, if he refuse to be convinced, it is not his fault, but yours. Would you maintain a system which you cannot prove to those who suffer by it to be indispensable? You cannot justify the possession of what you have obtained by bare force; then how can you hope to keep peace in a country in which the most permanent institutions are secured by bare force; how can you imagine, under such circumstances, the possibility of reconciling the mass of more than three-fourths of the people? I now proceed to another part of the subject, and that is the conduct of the Government; and dealing with this I ask the indulgence of the House, because the Government has contrived by a kind of zigzag policy to make the subject excessively complicated. However, I hope I have succeeded in getting at the bottom of it. I invite the House just to follow me as I briefly run through the history of these transactions. I start with a point to which I have already alluded, and that is the declaration by the First Minister of the Crown that the policy of the Government was to be a “truly liberal” one. These were very re-assuring words for Ireland, and no doubt they had their effect. The second step I have also alluded to; I refer to the statement made by the Chief Secretary for Ireland—that the Government would not listen to any plan for disestablishing, or, indeed, for making any serious changes in the Irish Church, except internally. But, at the same time as the noble Lord said that, he also made another statement regarding Irish education; and that statement, proposed we should grant a charter to a University, to be mainly under the control of the Roman Catholic Bishops, for the purpose of educating the Roman Catholic laity. I am not going to enter into that question now; but I will say this, that every sincere Roman Catholic—certainly every Roman Catholic ecclesiastic—is an enemy to the Protestant Establishment in Ireland; yet, at the same time, as the Government professes undiminished affection for the Protestant Establishment, it proposes to hand over the education of the middle and upper classes of the Roman Catholics—the great majority of the population—to persons to whom it is no discredit to say that they are necessarily, by their situation and creed, the bitterest enemies the Establishment can possibly have. That is zigzag the first. The next one was still more striking. I allude to the letter of the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister, which I think has not received the consideration it deserves. The right hon. Gentleman says in his memorable letter that he had formed a Ministry “by the command and with the approval of Her Majesty.” I do not know whether those words are merely formal; but if they are more than formal, I think they might just as well have been omitted. The right hon. Gentleman goes on to say, referring to a memorial—

Mr. Lowe

“Such expressions of feeling on the part of influential bodies of my countrymen are encouragingly opportune. We have heard something lately of the crisis of Ireland. In my opinion the crisis of England is rather at hand; for the purpose is now avowed, and that by a powerful party, of destroying that sacred union between Church and State which has hitherto been the chief means of our civilization, and is the only security for our religious liberty.”

Observe the words, “now avowed by a powerful party, of destroying that sacred union between Church and State.” What Church, and what State? Of course, it is perfectly clear it is an inference of his own that the right hon. Gentleman has put forward here. What we avow is our intention to break the connection between the Irish Church and the English State.

[SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: What Church?]

The Irish branch of the English Church, and that is represented as if this influential party had avowed its intention of breaking up the union between the Church and State altogether. There is no qualification whatever. Then the right hon. Gentleman speaks of “the sacred union between Church and State.” Why, Sir, the sacred union, as it is called, was effected in the year 1800 by the Act of Union; it was not obtained by sacred means at all. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman opposite will take a note of this, and in due time prove how a thing which did not exist before the Union, and was created by the Act of Union, can possibly be sacred, and whence the inspiration came. He possibly knows something of the influence under which that Parliament acted; but I do not think he will call it sacred. But we will pass from that expression to consider “the chief means of our civilization.” What is that? The Church of Ireland? The right hon. Gentleman actually tells us that our chief means of civilization is the Church of Ireland; and that the only security for our religious liberty is this very Church of a small minority, which religious liberty, unable any longer to endure so great an injustice, has risen up against, resolved to see its end. That letter was, no doubt, intended to serve a purpose, and far be it from me to say it will not do so. It was intended to assure a certain party that their interests were safe in the hands of him who, in his time, has played many parts, and now stands forth as the great Protestant champion. The experience that the right hon. Gentleman has had of mankind has taught him to rely much on their gullibility. I am sorry to say I have contributed a little to his opinion of mankind. With the Amendment moved by the noble Lord the Member for King’s Lynn in one hand and the charter for the Roman Catholic University in the other, he is going, by means of these three remarkable lines in this letter, to establish himself at the head of the Protestant and No Surrender party, and to persuade them to retain him in office. But for once he has over-estimated the limits of their gullibility. Well, this step can hardly be called a step. The Catholic University has hung fire: it hangs fire still; and I do not believe we are to hear any more of it. I took the liberty to say it is a pyrotechnical display, and I believe it is. It may be described by the lines of Virgil—

“Liquidis in nubibus arsit arundo, Signavitque viam flammis, tenuesque recessit
Consumpta in ventos.”

It shone for a moment; it was dissipated by the first breath of opposition, and we shall hear no more of it. Well, the next step is the Amendment of the noble Lord the Member for King’s Lynn. You will observe the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government has been going very far; he appears as a very high Protestant indeed, and, in accordance with the zigzag policy which guides the Government, the noble Lord has been going a little bit the other way. The memorable letter appeared in The Times one morning, and on the very same afternoon, so necessary was it to take a little relaxation after the extraordinary pitch of religious zeal to which the right hon. Gentleman had wound himself up, that the noble Lord gave notice of his Amendment. It has been described as being "obscurely worded," but I am bound to say it is by no means obscure. I think I understand it perfectly, and I will state what I think it means. It has two propositions. In the first place, it admits that considerable modifications in the temporalities in the Irish Church are—["No, no!"] I beg pardon—"may be" expedient. "Scandals" was the word used by the Secretary of State for the Foreign Department. Then, what do these words mean? I have no doubt as to their meaning. Whether it makes for or against my argument it is quite clear that they refer to the pending inquiry. We all know what that was. It was an inquiry into the administration and revenues of the Irish Church and how they could best be improved. It was attempted to add to the scope of that inquiry by the addition of words relating to a more equitable distribution of the revenues; but these words were rejected, and accordingly there can be no doubt that the Amendment only contemplates a certain re-adjustment within the Church. That is a fair construction—I do not care which way it makes—of the wording of the noble Lord's Amendment. I dare say you might get rid of some scandals, but I doubt whether that would improve matters much; because the "educated" gentleman, of whom we heard to-night, would probably be needed more in a parish where there were only a few Protestants than where there were a great many. I do not enter into that. All that the words do is to pledge the Government to deal with internal reforms of the Church; and then it adds that any proposition tending to the disestablishment or disendowment of the Church ought to be reserved for the decision of the new Parliament. We had no comment upon these words from any hon. Gentleman who spoke from the Benches opposite. But, what do they mean? I apprehend that when a man says, "I have got a box for the play to-night, and I have reserved a seat for you"—that constitutes an invitation for me to go to the play with him; and when he tells me, 'I have got a dinner party, and reserved a seat for you' that he thereby invites me to dine with him; and, in like manner, that the proposal to reserve this question of the Irish Church for the decision of the new Parliament means, "I invite the new Parliament to deal with it." That, then, is the construction of the Amendment. The first part pledges the Government to immaterial alterations within the Church; the second invites the new Parliament to deal with the Church as it chooses. And when I look to the speech of the noble Lord as explanatory of the Amendment I find that, speaking for the Government, he says—

Mr. Lowe

"We have made up our minds to two things; the first of these is that an alteration in the status," the temporalities of the Irish Church "is inevitable."

The noble Lord, speaking on behalf of the Government, goes on to say, "That will be the first business of any Government when the new Parliament assembles." Therefore, I say that, no doubt, is the meaning of the Amendment of the noble Lord. I do not blame it for obscurity; but I blame it, if he will allow me to say so, for a want of good sense. ["Oh, oh!"] Why should we make any alteration in the Irish Church; why should we pull it about and transfer its funds from one part of the country to another if we do not intend it be permanent and enduring? If we do anticipate that it will be permanent and enduring, why reserve it for consideration in the new Parliament? It is like saying, "I approve spending large sums of money this year in beautifying and planting Hyde Park, reserving for the consideration of Parliament next year whether it will not be better to cut it up into streets and build upon it." I come now to that part of the speech in which the noble Lord introduced his Motion. That speech, I think, has been very ill-treated by his own party, and for this reason. I really do not see how, if such a Motion was to be proposed, it could have been supported in any other manner than it was. I have endeavoured to give a fair and honest construction of what the Motion meant. And how on earth was it to be supported? It was very easy to make such a speech as my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary made. But he spoke against the Amendment. Nothing was easier than to do that. But the noble Lord was under the melancholy necessity—from which the Home Secretary felt himself to be quite dispensed—of supporting his own Motion. We really should make allowance for Gentlemen in such difficulties. And if this Motion was a right and proper Motion, the speech of the noble Lord was a right and proper speech in support of it. Look to what the Foreign Secretary said—and the importance of the statement rises beyond the immediate question and goes to the very root of responsible Government—he spoke with a desire—

“That the ideas and intentions of Her Majesty’s Government in objecting to the Resolutions of the right hon. Gentleman shall not be misconstrued or misunderstood either here or out-of-doors.”—[3 Hansard, cxc. 495.]

Therefore, you have the noble Lord’s own word for it—and nobody can doubt it for a moment—that in what he said he was not merely the organ of the Government to the extent of moving the Amendment, but that, as the organ of the Government, he gave vent to the opinions which he expressed in the course of that speech. Let us see what some of those opinions were—

“Probably there is not one educated person in a hundred who will stand up and pretend that the Irish ecclesiastical arrangements as they exist are of altogether a satisfactory kind.”—[3 Hansard, cxc. 498.]

You may say that relates to internal arrangements; but see what follows:—“If you alter the present application of the endowments”—that might mean, perhaps, transferring them from one place to another, but mark the end of the sentence—“what will you do with them?” The noble Lord admits that he is puzzled what to do with them, as many other persons have been and will be puzzled what to do with them. I will not enter into that question. I am pointing out to you that your organ—the second man in the Government—comes forward and tells us he speaks on your behalf, and that he is determined there shall be no mistake as to the meaning of Her Majesty’s Government in the words which he uses and the sentiments which he expresses. He enumerates five different plans which have lately come under public notice, and of the last of these he says—

“Lastly comes an idea which finds great favour, I believe, among a portion of Irish Churchmen, although I am bound to say I do not think it is one that a reformed Parliament is likely to adopt—the scheme, I mean, of leaving untouched the Protestant endowments as a whole, but re-distributing them so as to get rid of the scandal which everybody admits to exist—of sinecure livings and empty churches.”—[3 Hansard, cxc. 500.]

What does that mean? There are five schemes which he passes in review; upon four of them he expresses no opinion whatever, all of them being different plans of disendowment, and when he comes to the fifth, which is a scheme involving no disendowment, that he discusses with a sneer as an idea which will find no favour with the House. And then the noble Lord says, with great simplicity, having enumerated all these different projects, “and it is into this great chasm that you invite us to plunge.” That the Government should actually be compelled to give a clear opinion upon the Irish Church—what misery, what horror! There was a time when it was considered the duty of the Government of England to give its opinions clearly to the House of Commons; when the Government trusted the House in return for confidence reposed by the House in the Government; when frankness in the communications of the Government was the correlative of trust given by the House—when the Government guided, led, directed, and moderated the opinion of the House of Commons. But we all know those days are past and gone. The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister will be known at least for this—that he and the Government of which he is at the head have thoroughly inaugurated a new era, and that the notion that a Government is bound to plunge into such a chasm as would be involved in its really committing itself to a bold, clear, outspoken policy on the Church of Ireland is never again to be looked for. The noble Lord says—

“We affirm two propositions, one of which I conceive to require no proof—namely, that some modification”— this is the thing which is so self-evident that it requires no proof at all—

“That some modification, be it what it may, in the status of the Irish Church Establishment is to all appearance inevitable.”—[Ibid 506.]

What does “status” mean? What is the status of a woman? Married or single. What is the status of a Church? Whether it is Established or not. Then the noble Lord winds up in this manner. He says—

“Then it is asked, ‘Why not meet the Motion by a direct negative, or by the Previous Question?’ Simply for this reason: either one or the other of those courses would imply, or might possibly be considered as implying, that we objected to this question being dealt with at all, in any form or at any time. And that is a misconception against which we reasonably desire to guard.”—[p. 506.]

What question? The status of the Irish Church Establishment, and the appropriation of its endowments to other purposes than that of the Establishment. So that we have the authority of the noble Lord for saying that the reason this peculiar course was taken was from the fear lest it might be concluded that the Ministry really meant to stand by the Irish Church. The same night we had the speech of the Solicitor General—not a Member of the Cabinet certainly, but still Counsel for the Government, and as such speaking in some manner on behalf of the Government as a whole. And I must make this remark, both upon the speech of the noble Lord and that of the Solicitor General, that they seemed to have been prepared with very peculiar deliberation and accuracy; and that whatever errors they committed were certainly not occasioned by too rapid or careless improvisation. The Solicitor General speaking after the noble Lord, but in the course of the same evening, said—

“He would never consent to leave the Protestants of Ireland without an Established and an endowed Church,” and declared that “he would be no consenting party to a policy which carried to the extent to which the right hon. Gentleman carried it, must result in a religion betrayed and a country ruined.”—[3 Hansard, cxci. 551.]

That was pretty plain speaking. Of course the policy the hon. and learned Gentleman referred to was the policy proposed by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone), and not opposed by the noble Lord opposite. That is the way the Government treats this question. Then, the next night my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary spoke, and if there had been any doubt left as to the extraordinary proceedings of the Government his speech must have removed it. From beginning to end he never noticed the speech of the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn. He never said a word about it. But every single position that the noble Lord took up he most emphatically denied and denounced. Let anyone on the other side who thinks I do not say the truth say “No.” He began by denying the truth of some observations which had been made about the conduct of the Government upon the Reform question last year, and he gave a short but most admirable reason for their conduct. He got rid of all the difficulty as to which some invidious observations had been made by my noble Friend below the Gangway by the statement that it was not a matter of principle at all. Well, I think that was a capital answer. It was a matter of degree, he said; of a little more or less. Whether we should continue to live under an aristocracy, which he had always fought for and prayed for and approved; or under a democracy which he had always derided and denounced, it was only a matter of degree! Then we come to this: he says—

Mr. Lowe

“Supposing we had met these Resolutions by a direct negative—which, as far as I am personally concerned, I should be, and am, perfectly prepared to do.”—[3 Hansard, cxci. 580.]

This, the House will observe, is a latent censure on the noble Lord's Amendment as strong as words can imply. He then takes upon himself—and I do not blame him for it—to answer for the Government. He says—

“I will give the right hon. Gentleman no other pledge than this, that we will act in accordance with the former part of the Amendment. . . . But if you ask us to go further, I will say, at least, for myself, as I have upon former occasions, that I will not be a party to a measure for disestablishing the Irish Church.”—[Ibid, 597.]

Now, what is that but saying “I will go with the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn as far as the first part of the Resolution, and I will oppose to the utmost of my power the second part of it?” I am not making any comment as to who is right or who is wrong; but I want to show the House the way in which the Government meets the case. I have now finished reading these extracts, which, I am sure, will be a great relief to hon. Gentlemen opposite. I ask the House to consider what all this amounts to. Here you have the Government acting in the most inconsistent manner, setting up at one moment zeal for the Church, and the next moment willing to intrust the education of the young—one of the most sacred of charges—to the hands of its bitterest enemies. The right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government comes forward with a letter which out-Herods Herod in the extraordinary height to which it carries the principle of an Establishment; and the very next day we have the noble Lord proposing an Amendment which virtually gives up the principle of an Establishment altogether, or which reserves the principle for the next Parliament, leaving it to that Parliament to decide what is to be done. But, as if that was not enough you put up another Minister, who takes a different part. First, you have the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn, who argues the question in the spirit of the Resolutions before the House; the next day you have the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Home Department, who gets up to deny everything the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary said—to deny what he asserted on your behalf, and to assert on your behalf what he denied the day before. And that is the manner in which you think it right, and decorous, and worthy the dignity of the House of Commons to treat this question! It is nothing new to us to observe these things—to see the Government change its attitude—to find that there should be a complete change in the attitude of the Government in this House. We now find that the Government, instead of initiating measures, throw out, like the cuttle fish, of which we read in Victor Hugo's novel, all sorts of tentacula for the purpose of catching up something which it may appropriate and make its own. First one thing is thrown out, and then another; and when anything does not take, it is withdrawn immediately, and the Minister repudiates it, and disavows those who brought it forward. Consequently, in the political vocabulary, we have a new sobriquet introduced, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire's "nine-pins." But you were not content with the inconsistency which I have pointed out to the House. You could not exceed the inconsistencies of last year. You have done your best this year, but you are not able to come up to your inconsistencies of last year; the nature of things does not allow it. You have initiated a new idea in Parliament. It is the first experiment of the kind, and I certainly hope it will be the last. You have recently taken to do this—to put forward successively two Gentlemen holding the highest offices, except one, in the Government, to contradict each other and state contradictory lines of policy to this House. The one says you are in favour of making any modification in the Irish Church; and the other says you will not listen to any such proposal; so that those who like may vote with the Foreign Secretary, and those who do not like to vote with him, may vote with the Secretary for the Home Department, the question before the House being the same all the time. The House of Commons has endured a good deal of this kind of thing. We have been all lowered by it. The Government has been lowered by it; the House of Commons has been lowered by it; and the estimation in which public men are held by the country has, I fear, been irretrievably lowered by it. I rise to denounce as strongly as I can these innovations. I think it was enough to have the ground of the Government shifted from the letter of the right hon. Gentleman to the Amendment of the noble Lord in one day—to go from one pole to the other in a single jump—I think that was enough; but the right hon. Gentleman is a man of daring genius, and has reached his culminating point of audacity. In his letter he puts forward the connection between Church and State as sacred; but in the Amendment he expresses his willingness to invite the attention of Parliament to the propriety of abolishing that connection in Ireland. He has been guilty of many inconsistencies; but inconsistencies do not satisfy the right hon. Gentleman. He must soar a little higher; and actually two Members of his Cabinet come forward with two absolutely contradictory lines of policy on one of the highest and most important subjects that can engage the attention of Parliament. I can add nothing on this subject. I lament all this more than I can express; because, without speculating very closely on the future of a new Parliament, of this I am certain, that the vessel of the State is going to enter on stormy waters, and should enter on them in good trim. I think that the peril which is to be attributed to the conversion of right hon. Gentlemen opposite last year, has been immensely aggravated by their manner of conducting the business of the House. I see from it the most disastrous results. Everyone says that there is no honesty, and that no institution is secure for a moment. [Ironical cheers.] Those Gentleman who voted so steadfastly for household suffrage last year do well to cheer. These things come—no doubt rightly—before the time of the Parliament to which your Vote of last year will give rise, and which appears to us now only by the shadow which it casts before it. Why have they been antedated? Because, since the right hon. Gentleman and his Colleagues have adopted this line, every one feels that when institutions are attacked, which the Executive Government ought naturally to defend, the Government will not step forward to defend them, but will even endeavour to wrest out of the hands of others the carriage of the question in order to more effectually destroy those institutions. Therefore it is that, not only changes are made and will be made, but will be made with violence, rapidity, and ing at the views propounded by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, and to the probability of his being again Chancellor of the Exchequer, he almost feared the right hon. Gentleman might, at some future period, propose to take the property of the Church for supplying the exigencies of the State. We had seen in other countries what had followed the disendowment of Churches. They hardly knew yet what would be the effect of the confiscation of Church property in Italy; but they knew that many years ago the same thing occurred in France. The Government of that country said on that occasion, "We will take care to provide for the clergy—if we confiscate their property we will make provision for them." What provision did they make? He did not know whether they gave them churches and residences; but as regarded incomes, in the case of large parishes the sum allowed was £80 a year, in middling parishes £60, and in small parishes £48. Would that be the provision made for clergymen of the Established Church in Ireland when it was disendowed? He did not see how the principle of disendowment could be carried out in Ireland, unless they also adopted it in Wales, where the Established Church was in a minority. When the Church went in Ireland and in Wales we might tremble then for the Church of England. The right hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member opposite had done justice to the labours of the Irish clergy; and there was a letter in The Times of to-day from the Knight of Kerry, in which he said—

"Assuming absenteeism to be an evil, and believing that one of the most real and tangible wants of Ireland is that of resident men of education and position, especially in the more remote districts, it is well to remember that, putting aside for a moment the religious aspect of the case, you have, as matters stand now, in the Protestant clergymen an educated gentleman, with a certain income, residing in every parish in Ireland. Those who are acquainted with the poorer and less civilized parts of this country, and who remember the sad years of the famine, will bear me out when I say that it would not be easy to exaggerate the amount of good done at that trying time by the Protestant clergy."

He, too, should be sorry to see the poor of Ireland deprived of the services of the Protestant clergy. It was a very common thing for the poor to remit their money to the savings banks through the medium of Protestant clergymen. He trusted the Government would accept the challenge thrown out to them by the right hon.

Mr. Horsfall

Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire. He would ask them, "Do you mean to take your stand on the Irish Church? Then do so, and go to the country upon that question." He had had the honour of presenting a petition signed by 10,000 inhabitants of Liverpool, and another signed by eighty-five clergymen in that town against the disestablishment of that Church, and he knew that in various parts of the country a very strong feeling existed against such a policy. He believed that if the Government went to the country, either now or in January, it would support them. The Home Secretary had quoted from a speech of Sir James Graham in 1835, and he (Mr. Horsfall) had, as a stranger, listened to a speech of his upon the same subject, and he would make a part of that speech his own. That right hon. Gentleman said—

"If the Irish Church is doomed to fall, happier is the man who shall perish in its ruins than he who survives the fall."

MR. CLIVE said, he would stand but a very few moments between Irish Members and the House. The House would not suspect him of wishing to recapitulate the arguments of this debate. Indeed, he had been able to get up but little enthusiasm on the subject. There were, however, one or two speeches which he must notice. The hon. Gentleman who had just sat down (Mr. Horsfall) said, that in the event of the Irish Church being disestablished, the Northern Protestants would be for the repeal of the Union. Now, his experience was entirely at variance with this conclusion, and he disbelieved it entirely. Moreover, the hon. Member reproduced the argument of Dr. O'Brien as to the area of some of the parishes in Ireland. Kilcommon was his instance. A great portion of that parish belonged to him (Mr. Clive), and he could answer for it there was little there for a clergyman to look after. There were grouse and snipes, but no roads, except those which he had made, and which, by the way, had given a great deal of employment to the people, thereby proving that landlords were not altogether so bad as they were represented to be. Well, then, the hon. and learned Member for Sligo (Mr. Serjeant Armstrong) told them on that side of the House that there was a great aversion towards the Protestant clergy, on the part of the Roman Catholic population. Now, he had known Ireland well for twenty years, before, during, and since the famine, and he could undertake to say that the statement had no foundation whatever, and that no body of men ever did their duty more conscientiously than the Irish clergy. The only fault found with them was that they belonged to the Church of the minority. He thought but little of some of the arguments used. He cared nothing for the Coronation Oath; he was not excited by the 5th Article of the Union. On the other hand, he did not believe that these Resolutions were a panacea for the so-called woes of Ireland—woes in which he hardly thought Gentlemen below the Gangway implicitly believed, and which he was sure were grossly exaggerated. If hon. Gentlemen would take the trouble of going through the evidence taken before the Committee of the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Maguire), and before the Lords' Committee, they would find that his (Mr. Clive's) statement was true; and more particularly if they would study the evidence given by the hon. Member for Cork himself. They would find it eloquent and impressive; but of proof there was nothing. Great English and Irish landlords were really doing all they could. Some small resident landlords there were in Ireland, as elsewhere, who might not perform their duties, but their number was rapidly decreasing. At the time when Sir George Lewis published his work on Irish disturbances, and ever since, he had been of opinion that perfect religious equality should prevail in Ireland; that the Church, as Established and privileged, should cease to exist; and therefore the first Resolution of the right hon. Gentleman he was prepared to support. But disendowment and the absence of all pecuniary assistance were very different things. To the voluntary system he entirely objected—first, because in the older creeds, in the words of Sir George Lewis, such as the Greek and Roman Catholic, it led to superstition, in the Protestant to fanaticism. Hence we had the anxious sect, the camp meetings, and the revivals of America. Again, he objected to the voluntary principle because he held it to be entirely inapplicable to a country where the population was thinly scattered over a large area. He did not quite understand the Resolutions of the right hon. Gentleman or the explanation in his speech as to the manner in which he intended to provide for the offices of religion or the support of the ministers. He said that three-fifths, or perhaps two-thirds of the revenues might remain to the Protestant Church; but he (Mr. Clive) was unable to comprehend how this was to be brought about, and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would explain his views on this point. One word as to the Irish Church Commission. He knew well that the Commission had nothing to do with the question of the establishment or disestablishment of the Irish Church; and assuming that the first Resolution was carried, all the further arrangements might well come from that body. He was quite satisfied that the statistics, which would be put in a convenient form, would show that a half or two-thirds of the revenues might be saved, that the staff of the Church might be very much diminished, and that there would be ample funds for all the religious bodies in Ireland, if they would accept them. He did not know himself why they should not accept them; but he did not wish to leave the Protestant Church without endowment or pecuniary assistance, and he thought if it were so left it would be the worse for the country. In expressing these opinions he spoke as a resident, and as one who passed a great deal of his time in Ireland.

MR. LEFROY said, at a crisis so momentous as the present he would gladly have left the defence of his Church to abler hands than his own. As, however, the Resolutions proposed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire materially effected the interests of the constituency which he represented, he felt it his duty to express, as forcibly as he could, his objections to them. He regretted that so much party spirit had been infused into this debate, and should have been much better pleased to hear a matter so solemn and important as the one under consideration discussed in a fairer and more becoming spirit, and with the simple object of ascertaining what was the best that could be done under the circumstances. Ireland on this, as well as on many former occasions, had been made the battle-field of political warfare. He deeply lamented that such should be the case. He felt some difficulty in dealing with this subject; because, if he made any references to the speeches of hon. Gentlemen present, he would be told that he was indulging in the argumentum ad hominem, which was offensive. If he alluded to the opinions of able statesmen who had passed away, he would probably be told that the opinions of public men change now so rapidly, that those of the statesmen of former times would probably have changed also if they had lived in the present times. If he called attention to the ancient history of the Church, he might be told that it was as uninteresting as an old almanack. He objected to the Resolutions of the right hon. Gentleman as being unconstitutional, unjust, and calculated to produce much mischief to the whole united Empire, as well as to Ireland. The first Resolution, which embodied the attack, was unconstitutional, because it was at variance with the Act of Union. The attack made upon the Irish clergy by the hon. and learned Member for Sligo (Mr. Serjeant Armstrong) he believed to be unjust and unfounded. The Irish clergy were a most estimable body of men, and were never found deficient in the sacred duties they had to discharge. The Resolutions were unjust, because they took by surprise that portion of the Irish people who belonged to the Established Church. No notice had been given them of this attempt to deprive them of their property and rights, and they had no opportunity afforded them of preparing for the crisis. This attack on the Irish Church could not be made without inflicting injury upon the kingdom at large. (That the attack on the Irish Church would be more dangerous to England than had been represented in that House was sufficiently proved by a passage which he quoted from a paper, representing, as he said, popular feeling on the subject; and it was also indicated by the tone of the French papers on this debate.) In respect to the Act of Union, whilst he did not, for a moment, deny that Parliament had a legal right to repeal any Act it had passed, he yet looked upon the Act of Union as wholly different from an ordinary Act. That Act was founded on a solemn compact, entered into by the British Government for the maintenance of the Established Church in Ireland, and he contended that the House had no right to deprive the Protestants of Ireland of the benefits of their Church, which were secured to them by that compact. Lord Castlereagh, the great Minister of that day, when the Act of Union was passed, characterized that measure as one establishing one State, one Legislature, and one Church, and said that incorporated with the English Church, the Irish Church would be based upon such a strong and national foundation as to raise it above all fear. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire had also said, according to the letter quoted the other evening by the Secretary for the Home Department—

“In any measure dealing with the Irish Church, I think, though I scarcely expect ever to be called upon to share in such a measure, the Act of Union must be recognized and must have important consequences, especially with reference to the position of the hierarchy.”

The second Resolution was of great importance; but it could not be acted upon until an Act of Parliament was passed empowering the Ecclesiastical Commissioners to carry out its principle. He believed, indeed, that if those Commissioners were to act in the way it directed, they would be liable to be brought before the Court of Queen's Bench for not exercising the functions intrusted to them. In the speeches made by the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Maguire), the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright), the hon. Member for Westminster (Mr. Stuart Mill) or the many other addresses they had heard on the other side of the House, there was nothing to show that the Church in Ireland presented a substantial grievance to the people of that country generally. On the contrary, The Cork Reporter, The Tablet, and many of the other organs of Catholic opinion, attributed the discontent and disloyalty of the people to far different causes. He admitted that the conduct of some of the Irish Bishops and clergy in the times of Charles I. and Charles II., and even in the reign of George I., was by no means creditable to the Church; but the fault lay with the English Government, which made bad appointments. A vast improvement had taken place within the last century. Churches had increased, the working clergy had increased, and religion had advanced with great rapidity. Within the last twenty-five years the churches in one district had increased by twenty-five, and the working clergy in proportion. The voluntary subscriptions paid into the Ecclesiastical Commissioners' hands, for building, enlarging, and repairing churches, since that Board was established in 1834, amounted to nearly £200,000. In Dublin, Cork, Tuam, Kilmore, Limerick, and many other places, they also witnessed large sums expended voluntarily on the construction of new cathedrals and churches, or repair of the old ones, which did not pass through the Ecclesiastical Commissioners' office; and, as an example, he need only refer to the munificent conduct of one of our most distinguished citizens of Dublin in effecting the restoration of the Cathedral of St. Patrick at an outlay of £130,000. He would have preferred these Resolutions being met by a direct negative, but he would support the Amendment upon the ground that an opportunity ought to be given to the Royal Commission to state their opinion upon the subject before Parliament proceeded to legislate at all on the subject. He objected to the alienation of the funds of the Church; but he should be pleased to see such a re-distribution of those funds as would render the Church more efficient.

Mr. Lefroy

SIR JOHN GRAY said, the hon. Member for the University of Dublin gave the House an elaborate account of the vast number of churches that had been built, and of the large sums that had been expended in repairing the houses of worship used by the Anglican clergy. The vast expenditure he thus described he used as an argument against disestablishing and disendowing the State Church in Ireland; but he omitted all reference to the fact that these churches were nearly empty on each Sabbath day, and to the not less important fact that, with the noble exception of the unfollowed example set by the Member for the City of Dublin, the sums expended on the building, the extending, and the repairing of Anglican churches in Ireland were paid not by the Anglicans themselves, but from the State funds. ["No!"] He begged to assure the hon. Gentlemen who said "No," that if they took the trouble to investigate the facts they would find that on an average there were more than £50,000 a year paid for the building and repairing of the Protestant Churches of Ireland by the Irish Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The figures for 1864 were £51,000, for 1865 £52,000, and for 1866 £71,000, and the series of reports would show that £50,000 a year was below the average cost of fabrics to the public; and he was at a loss to know upon what pretence the Irish Church could lay claim to consideration, because of the moneys spent on Church buildings, when all that money was supplied from the national Church Fund, and not by the members of the Anglican faith. The hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Horsfall), who preceded the hon. Member for Dublin University on the same side, entered into a discussion on the difference between parishes, of which there 2,400 in Ireland, and benefices, of which there were 1,510.

The distinction was a just one, but the argument based on it was not tenable. The consolidation of these 2,400 parishes, into 1,510 benefices, arose from the fact that there were no congregations in many of the parishes, and two, three, four, and sometimes as many as nine parishes were converted into one benefice to make up one congregation. The consolidation did not arise from the smallness of the parochial area, but from the absence of Anglican inhabitants, and occasionally from the desire to give a good income to a friend. He would illustrate the question, the discussion of which was raised for the first time in that debate by the hon. Member for Liverpool, by the circumstances of the united dioceses of Limerick, Ardfert, and Aghadoe. There were in these dioceses 183 parishes, and of the 183 no less than 22 had not one Anglican resident. Yet in these 22 parishes, in which no Anglican was to be found, there was a Catholic population larger than the total Anglican population of the three united dioceses. There were, however, parishes in which some Anglicans were to be found, which presented a case hardly better than those in which no Anglicans existed. There were 68 parishes in these three united dioceses in which the total Anglican population amounted to a number that if equally distributed would give just one Anglican family for each parish, not one of the 68 having three families residing in it. He submitted that these 68 parishes out of the 183 parishes of one diocese, no one of which had three whole Anglican families resident, and the aggregate of which gives but one family for each of the 68 parishes, is a far more damaging fact for the Irish Church, than was the fact that there were 199 parishes in Ireland without one, which the Bishops contrived to smother out of you by uniting other parishes into benefices. What is the Catholic population of these 68 parishes? The Anglican population is 360, including all the paid Church officials and their households, and the Catholic population is 76,035. Having said so much for the hon. Member for Liverpool's argument as to the small area of the parishes which have no Anglicans, he would, with the permission of the House, give him a few illustrations as to what Irish benefices as distinct from parishes are. The diocese of Cloyne has its parishes consolidated into 80 benefices. Of these there are no less than 55, in no one of which does the gross Anglican population exceed 12 millions. There are 80, in no one of which is there more than 5 families—deducting the family of the clergyman, who is in each case paid for residing, the total number of Anglican families in the 80 benefices is 44—and for the spiritual instruction of these 44 families there is raised a parochial revenue of £8,626. It would give the hon. Member for Liverpool another group of benefices with larger Anglican populations. There were 110 benefices in the same diocese, the number of Anglican families in which (deducting those of the clergymen who were proper for large families) was 110, and for these 110 the parochial revenue was £7,406, giving for the 154 families a gross parochial cost of £14,032 a year, or in 47 of the 80 benefices of this one diocese an annual payment by the general public, apart from building churches, supplying requiem masses, and episcopal supervision, amounting to an annual cost of £135 9s. 11½d. He hoped the House would agree with him, after considering these figures, that the benefices with fictitious congregations were even worse than the parishes with no Anglican congregations. But, in fact, what was true of the two dioceses he referred to, in order to expose the attempt made to conceal the truth by uniting several parishes into one benefice, was true to all the dioceses of Ireland. There were 33 dioceses in Ireland, and in 4 only of the 33 did the percentage of the Anglican population amount to 20 per cent; in one only did it exceed 25 per cent, and in that one it did not reach 26. In 9 the percentage varied from a little over 2 to 3 and a fraction. One diocese—Dublin—contained more than one-seventh, nearly one-sixth of the whole Anglican population of all Ireland, and yet the Anglicans in that were not 20 per cent of the general population of the diocese. Yet the Church of which these things are true is the Established Church in Ireland, and called the National Church, whose revenues are sacred and inviolable. He knew that many other Gentlemen were anxious to address the House, and being desirous not to abuse the indulgence accorded to him, he would not pursue the statistical argument any further, but proposed to deal with an argument pressed at night by the hon. and gallant General (General Peel), and pressed even more strongly by the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs on a previous night—

Sir John Gray

he alluded to the threat that if the House dared to interfere with the Church—to disestablish or to disendow it—the Anglicans in Ireland would become disaffected and rebellious. They were told that the Church was a sacred and holy institution on which profane hands must not be laid, and that it must be sustained intact to keep the light of the Reformation brightly shining amid the spiritual darkness in Ireland. The noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs told them that if they touched the Church the anger of the loyal Protestants would surge into disaffection, and he warned them—he might say, threatened them—that the consequences must be disastrous, since they were the most intelligent and active and the best organised body in Ireland. He went further. He said the Presbyterians would join the disaffected Anglicans, and that their united force, if in a state of disaffection, would be irresistible. The Home Secretary held out nearly similar threats, and, no doubt, on sufficient authority. He (Sir John Gray) did not believe that these serious threatnings were unauthorized. Certainly the noble Lord did not himself conjure up the evidence that such disaffection was to be dreaded; for the selfish and sordid agitators that are now disturbing the peace of Ireland, are labouring hard to create that disaffection which was relied on by the noble Lord as the best practical support of his Amendment. There existed at that moment in London the headquarters of a most pernicious agitating organization called "The Church Institution." The head centres of that organization were the Bishops of the Irish Church. Nine of the twelve Irish Bishops, including the two Archbishops, were on the directory, and they had recently established in every diocese, and in nearly every parish in Ireland, affiliated societies in connection with the central circle. The Anglican clergyman of the parish was generally the president of the parochial circle, and the clerical agitators were generally the leaders on the platform. That the noble Lord and the Home Secretary knew well the extent of the disaffection, almost amounting to treason, spoken at these clerical agitation societies, was matter of notoriety. The speech of the Rev. Mr. Farrar, delivered at Rathmines, which was more than once alluded to in that debate, was delivered at one of the affiliated circles of the Church Institution. That rev. gentleman talked to his auditory of the attempt that would be made to disestablish and disendow the Anglican Church, and pledged them not to yield up the spoil without a struggle, but to prepare to die as soldiers. At another of the Church Institution circles, held at Newbliss, the rev. Mr. Flanagan, rector of Clones, spoke in a similar strain, recited the old poetic watchwords of the party—

Put your trust in God, my boys,
But keep your powder dry, and told this House and the Sovereign that the loyalty of the Protestants of Ireland was conditional on the maintenance of ascendancy; and were the Church disendowed, their devotion to the Constitution and their allegiance to the Crown would be at an end. This rev. agitator went further. He had the audacity to send a message from his circle to their gracious Queen, admonishing her that the Crown of her ancestor was kicked into the Boyne, and warning her that the same might be the fate of her Crown if she assented to the disestablishing of the Church and the withdrawal of the State revenues. He cited these seditious speeches to show that the noble Lord was not speaking merely as a prophet when he warned the House against the disaffection of the Anglican party; but, while it was true that the Episcopal and clerical agitators thus proclaimed that their allegiance to the Throne was conditional on the continuation of their stipends, he would ask any Member, no matter on what side he sat, who valued and understood the high constitutional feeling that ought to animate the Commons of England, and who appreciated the duties of a Minister and his responsibilities, was it right or was it proper for the responsible Ministers of the Crown to speak with approval of such sentiments, and to threaten that House that, if they freely exercised their privileges by removing the great monster grievance of Ireland, the skilled and active and organized clerical confederacy, whose allegiance is conditional, might proceed to open revolt? The Queen was warned by the platform orator of these societies that one Crown was kicked into the Boyne because its owner failed to support Protestant ascendancy; and, by inference, the Sovereign was threatened that her Crown might also be kicked into the nearest river if she assented to the disestablishment and disendowment of the Irish Church. Did the Minister denounce the insulting threat as was his duty? Did he not rather countenance, approve, encourage the insolent spouters of treason, and threaten you—threaten Parliament—seek to over-awe its deliberations by telling you of the probability that a great and long-deferred act of justice would be followed by the disaffection of the Orange party. The House is asked to delay—to suspend its judgment—to procrastinate. What is it asked to wait for? Is it to give time to these Episcopal and clerical agitators to cover the island with their affiliated societies, to fan the flame of discontent, to stimulate disaffection, and so to prepare for active revolt, that the Ministers who now threaten disaffection may be able to come down on some future occasion and tell that House the Church Institution, the Bishops, the clergy, the advocates of ascendancy, are in revolt—in arms; and, if you would attempt to meddle with the Church, they may enter this Chamber and sweep you hence. He would not pretend to say what amount of connection there was between the Government and the agitating affiliated societies got up by the Anglican Bishops and clergy to enable them still to retain their public revenues. There might be a more direct connection between them than some imagined; he did not say there was, but he would say that the delay urged by the Government under the plea that they should wait for the Report of the Royal Commission was, in fact, the asking to delay till the Church Institution should report, for the Church Commission was, in fact, the Church Institution. He held in his hand a circular issued by the Church Institution in August, 1867. That circular was a whip for funds to protect the Anglican Church in Ireland from the reforms which this House might deem it right to enforce. That private circular embodies the names of twenty-nine individuals who were put thus before “the faithful” as the promoters of the fund for the several steps subsequently taken to defend the Church, including the formation of the affiliated societies of which the Rev. Messrs. Ferrar and Flanagan are such distinguished members. Amongst the names are the Archbishop of Armagh, the Archbishop of Dublin, the Bishops of Meath, of Tuam, of Ossory, of Cashel, of Cork, of Kilmore, and the Bishop Designate of Derry. The circular states that—

“The recent debates on the Irish Church in both Houses of Parliament have clearly shown that one of the chief questions to be determined on the assembling of the Reformed Parliament will the future status and position of the Church in Ireland."

He goes on to say—

"The Church Institution have therefore determined to solicit subscriptions to a special Irish Church Defence Fund, which will be devoted to diffusing sound and correct information in all available quarters by lectures and otherwise."

Cheers. ] He understood those cheers; but he was not yet done with the circular. One of the applications of that fund was the founding of the affiliated societies which taught the sound doctrine of conditional loyalty, and the propriety of informing the Queen that, if she sanctioned any Act of her Parliament for the disendowment of the Church, her Crown would be kicked from off her head. Two months after this circular was issued, the Government thought it time to form their Royal Commission. They appointed nine gentlemen in that Commission; and, though they had all England, Scotland, and Ireland open to them, they selected four of the nine Commissioners from amongst the twenty laymen who, with the nine Bishops and Archbishops, constitute the twenty-nine names embodied in the circular of the Church Institution, which brought the Flanagan and Ferrar doctrines of loyalty and allegiance home to every parish in Ireland. They did not select any of the nine Bishops—that would be too indecent—but they selected the Vicar General of the Ulster province as the representative of the episcopal body, who, with the four laymen, makes the fifth Commissioner chosen from the twenty-nine promoters of the diocesan and parochial agitating circles for the diffusion of sound doctrines and the allegiance due to the Queen and the security of her Crown and person. [Colonel STUART KNOX: Dr. Ball is a Radical; he is not of us.] If Dr. Ball be a Radical, he is the Vicar General of the Anglican Primate of Ireland, and he is the man who was selected by the Primate and recommended to the Dublin University as the fittest man in Ireland, because of his ability and zeal as a Church advocate, to supplant the hon. Member who spoke last (Mr. Lefroy) in the representation of the clerical constituency of the Dublin University. Five, then, of the nine Royal Commissioners were supplied by the Church Institution; and another is the representative of the Anglican Bishops, whose names are in the Church Institution Defence Fund circular, thus giving the Church Institution and conditional loyalty party a clear majority. Is the House willing to wait for the Report of this Church Institution Church Commission? It would be just as wise and as prudent to accept at once the views of the Irish Anglican Bishops or of their reverend platform representatives. But they were told the present Church property was sacred—could not be touched—that the Church had a prescriptive title, and that Parliament or the Crown had no control, no right to interfere. The men who professed those doctrines must be well versed in the history of the Irish Church and of the national Church revenues. When Henry VIII. ascended the Throne he found all the national Church property of Ireland in the hands of the Catholics; in whose hands it had been uninterruptedly for a much longer period than it has since been in the hands of the Anglican Church in Ireland. He transferred all that he did not keep for himself or his creatures to the Anglican ecclesiastics. Mary restored the remnant of the Church property to the Catholics. Elizabeth retransferred it to the Anglicans in every portion of Ireland to which her power extended. Cromwell handed it over to the Puritans and Presbyterians. James II. restored it to the Catholics wherever his rule extended; and when William and Mary ascended the Throne they retransferred it to the Anglicans. Thus the State exercised its power over the national revenues of the Church in Ireland by seven alterations of their destinations within about a century and a half, and each of the seven was equally sacred and immutable. But they were told that it is now really sacred and immutable, for it is now vested in the national Church. He was unwilling at this advanced period of the debate, when so little time remained and so many were anxious to take a part in the discussion, to trespass on the indulgence of the House, but so much had been said about the national character of the State Church in Ireland that he would ask permission of the House to investigate its claim to that character. He would not abuse the concession made to him, and would try to condense what he had to say on the subject. Shortly after Henry sent Browne, the Augustinian friar, to Dublin as Archbishop, he commanded him to induce the Bishops, clergy, and gentry to acknowledge the King's supremacy, and repudiate that of the Pope. A few months trial caused the Archbishop to abandon the hope of inducing obedience to the King's wishes. He wrote to say the attempt imperilled his life, and that no removal of the Papal authority in spirituals could be hoped unless a Parliament was called, and an Act passed to make it high treason for an office holder to refuse to accept the Oath of Supremacy. The Parliament was called, and the slavish assembly of the Pale passed the needed Act. Thus was the Anglican Church introduced into Leinster. He would rapidly sketch its introduction into the other three provinces. The Lord Deputy proceeded to Munster, on a missionary excursion, in the succeeding year, accompanied by a powerful army. He described his proceedings and his success in a letter to the King, and the process may be thus stated. Surrounded by his staff and his army, he summoned the Mayor and Aldermen of Limerick, the chief city of Munster, to his presence, and commanded them to take the Oath of Allegiance. The terrified corporators saw the halberts and the bayonets, and the ample facilities that existed for hanging them if they refused, and the Deputy says they took the Oath, and that he ordered the Mayor to administer it to all the commonalty, and report to Dublin that he had done so. The same day he sent for the Bishop, and commanded him to take the Oath, which he tremblingly did, and was forthwith dismissed, with instructions to administer the Oath to all his clergy. Thus in a day was Limerick converted. The details are thus given in the Deputy's letter to the Royal Master. Munster, through its capital, had thus been converted in less than a week without the aid of any Church missionary, the Deputy doing some effective military services simultaneously in the district. The evangelization of Connaught, and the planting there of the Anglican Church, were not less rapid. Having battered down some castles and churches in Clare, he marched on to Galway, the capital of Connaught, and in his letter to the King from Galway he describes the process of introducing Anglicanism into Connaught. He says, in the quaint style of the day, "Like order as I took in Limerick the same I took in Galway;" and he details how he sent for the Mayor and the Bishop and administered the Oath, which, he says, they "took without grudge," and then he describes that as in Limerick, so in the capital of Connaught, he ordered the Mayor to swear his commonalty, and the Bishop to swear his clergy, and thus within about one week's time Munster and Connaught were brought to embrace the Reformation, and adopt the Anglican Faith. The Deputy proceeded within the same year to Ulster, and there he found them not so timid as in the other provinces. He was resolved; he took Downpatrick, and, anxious that the Gospel light should shine brightly in Ulster, he set fire to the cathedral as the only mode left to him of causing the Anglican Gospel to shine before the people of Ulster; and yet this church, so planted, is called the National Church of Ireland. But it was all in vain. The people would not accept it—the priests refused it, and Ireland was still Catholic. Then came James—the expulsion of the Catholics from the lands, and the plantation of Ulster. The planters were bound under the term of their deeds to plant a certain number of able-bodied men from England or Scotland, well affected in religion, on every lot they obtained. The Catholics were driven to the mountains, strangers were imported, but even yet the Anglican Church did not take root. Cromwell came, and he adopted the terrible transplantation code under which every Catholic in Munster, Leinster, and Ulster, was driven from his home, the troopers of Cromwell planted in their homes, and their former owners driven into the wilds of Connaught. That terrible outrage on humanity is detailed in a most interesting book by General Sir Thomas Larcom, the present Under Secretary of this Government in Ireland. In it many of the details and many of the orders are given, and amongst them was one inflicting death on any Catholic who ventured to return from Connaught without a written pass. No priest was allowed to go with them, and then it was hoped that Catholicity would be stamped out. The hon. and gallant Member for Longford (Mr. O'Reilly) told the House a few nights since that the population of Dublin in 1640 was 2,000 Catholics to 3,000 Protestants. In 1651, eleven years later, the Governor of Dublin, writing to the Executive in London, says that there remained at that time in Dublin but one Catholic. There were in all, a short time before, 751, but all abandoned their priests and the Mass save the one obstinate Papist, and were undergoing proper instruction as Protestants. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire spoke of the gradual change of population, and he showed how the Catholics were moving in this proportion. There are in Dublin now more than 200,000 Catholics, as against this one obstinate Papist in 1651. But even the 750 conformists, coopers, shoemakers, and other artizans were not deemed to be long enough converted to be sufficiently annealed, and they were expatriated a few years after as not having conformed before a fixed date. In my own city (Kilkenny) but forty Catholics were allowed to remain under this code, and they were allowed to remain for the convenience of the Protestant ascendancy. In Clonmel but forty-nine Catholics were permitted to remain, and so in proportion with other towns; and yet we are told that Anglicanism is the national Church and is loved by the Irish people. The Irish Members who sit opposite will not have the term "alien Church" applied to the Anglican Church in Ireland. Like other planters they do not like plain language. I would remind them that the Southern planters of America cherished slavery as they cherish alien ascendancy, but did not call it by its proper name—they preferred the softer name of "domestic institution." Those in power and men in office loved that domestic institution—they cherished it—they encouraged disaffection in order to sustain it—they threatened the American States with dissolution, with Southern disaffection, as we have been threatened during this debate, if they would lay hands on the "domestic institution;" which honest men described as slavery, alien to the genius of a free nation. The Southerners believed that in the men in office they had a guarantee that revolt would succeed. They did revolt, and the South and its "domestic institution," being alien to a free people, are both prostrate in the dust.

Sir John Gray

LORD CLAUD JOHN HAMILTON said, the speech just delivered had proceeded from an Irish Protestant. But the hon. Gentleman was not a fair sample of the Irish Protestants, and if he had been the "garrison" of which they had heard so much would have long ceased to exist. The Amendment moved by the noble Lord (Lord Stanley) had been characterized as vague and indefinite, and if he had wished to meet the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) on his own terms he would have brought forward an Amendment of such a nature. The noble Lord had allowed that modifications in the temporalities of the Irish Church might appear expedient; and surely it was admitted on both sides that anomalies and abuses existed in the fabric of that Church, for it was to inquire into those anomalies and abuses that Lord Russell last year moved for a Commission, which was unanimously agreed to by the Conservative party, in order to place them in possession of those facts without which any sound legislation on the subject was impossible. The noble Lord had been charged with refusing to bind himself to any definite course of policy on that question; but he maintained that a Minister, speaking on behalf of a Government upon a series of Resolutions brought forward at a fortnight's notice and with such indecent haste, touching a national question of the first importance, one of the greatest problems of the age, was not bound to pledge himself beforehand, and in the absence of facts, still the subject of an inquiry, as to what he would do under future circumstances, and in face of fresh events. He confessed, however, that he was not altogether satisfied with the defence the noble Lord had made of his Amendment; but, in common with the other Members for the North of Ireland, he had had complete confidence in the Government on that matter, and he need hardly say that that confidence had been in no way abated since they had listened to the speech of the Home Secretary. Much exaggeration and misrepresentation had for years been practised on the subject of the Irish Church, and, unfortunately, not without effect on the minds of the English people. When the Synod of Cashel in 1172, which was both a national and an ecclesiastical council, accepted the supremacy of Henry II., that King confirmed the revenues of the Irish Church, which from that time forward was joined to the Church of England. In 1560, when Henry VIII. shook off the Papal authority, the Irish people asserted the supremacy of that Sovereign, and in the reign of Elizabeth they gladly accepted the Reformed Ritual, from which period commenced the existing United Church of England and Ireland under the supremacy of a Protestant sovereign. It was not true that any property to which the Roman Catholics had an original title ever passed into the hands of the Established Church in Ireland at the time of the Reformation. At that period all the property of the monasteries passed into the hands of lay proprietors, but the Reformed Church had none of it. The right hon. Member for South Lancashire said that Church had not answered the purpose for which it was established—the conversion of the population; but, even assuming that to be so, it was not the fault of the Church, but of the disastrous policy of the State to which she was allied, which in former days hindered her beneficent work. The Celtic language was discouraged; and from the Reformation to the battle of the Boyne no version of the Bible in that tongue existed, while all that time the agents of Rome were busy among the people. The right hon. Gentleman opposite had endeavoured to prove that the Establishment had overlaid the life of the Church, and said that the recent endowments, building, and restorations of churches in Ireland were few and far between; but during the last twenty years, in the diocese of Derry and Raphoe, no less than £50,000 had been contributed for building, repairing, and restoring churches, besides £1,000 per annum for their endowment. That property could not be taken away by the State without adding robbery to sacrilege. It had been said the clergy had had in their hands for the purposes of conversion a social leverage which it was difficult to estimate; but it was not at all difficult to estimate the amount of odium they would have incurred had they used that social leverage for proselytizing objects. The speech of the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) contained a fallacy so gross that it was advisable to correct it immediately. The hon. Member stated that for all practical purposes the number of Episcopalians in Ireland could not be reckoned as more than 500,000; but in the religious Census Returns of 1861 it appeared that the adherents of the Established Church were 693,000; the Methodists, who had in all previous Returns been included with the Episcopalians, because they always went with them, were 45,000; the Presbyterians, 523,000; and other Dissenters, 76,000; making a total Protestant population of 1,337,000, and giving the outrageously liberal present to the hon. Member of the 337,000, it still left 1,000,000 in favour of the Establishment, because it was notorious that not only the Methodists, but three-fourths of the Presbyterians, were friends of the Established Church. [Mr. BRIGHT: No, no!] I say, “Yes, yes!” Look to the petitions which have come to the House. [Mr. BRIGHT said, he had spoken not of Protestants but of Episcopalians—of persons in connection with the Established Church.] The hon. Gentleman said that not more than 500,000 Protestants were in favour of the maintenance of the Established Church; but instead of that number there were in reality 1,000,000, and 1,000,000 not living in a corner or residing in Birmingham or Manchester, but spread over the whole country, and forming the most enlightened portion of the community. It had been said that the people of Ireland objected to the Established Church. Now, he knew something of the people of Ireland, and it was his firm conviction that a majority of them did not object to the Established Church. He knew many Roman Catholic gentlemen of position and standing who were decidedly in favour of the maintenance of the Established Church, and he had on Monday last presented a petition to that effect, signed by upwards of 1,200 persons, among whom were many Roman Catholics. It was not difficult to know from whom that Motion proceeded. A Church establishment was incompatible with democracy; and therefore the hon. Member for Birmingham, at present the director of the tactics of the Liberal party, might wish to overthrow the Church. Then came the Liberation Society, the atheists and philosophers; next came the weak-minded and vacillating, who, although real Churchmen, were easily misled by the promises of unscrupulous politicians; and last of all, but not least, came the Roman Catholic hierarchy headed by Cardinal Cullen, a Jesuit in the midst of Jesuits. That strange, incongruous, and anomalous body were bound together by an unholy bond for an unhallowed purpose; they had thrown off the mask; but the friends of the Church, fortified by a sense alike of the justice and expediency of their cause, were ready to meet them; and he for one, as long as he had the honour of a seat in that House, would never desert that cause. Their present position might be described in the following passage:—

Sir John Gray

“On us this day has fallen—and we shrink not from it, but welcome so high, glorious, but arduous, a duty—the defence of the Catholic Church in Ireland as the religious Establishment of that country.”

Whose words were those? They were the words of a former student of Oxford — of William Ewart Gladstone. The fall of that Church would not satisfy the people of Ireland. It would not satisfy those who had signed the other day the declaration of Limerick ; for that which they demanded was a repeal of the Union. It would not satisfy the Protestants of the North of Ireland to be robbed of all they held most sacred by the votes of Englishmen and Scotchmen, contrary to the wishes of a majority of the people of Ireland. ["No, no !"] Did the House believe that after that act of spoliation they would look with respect upon the poor remnant of the great compact between the two countries? He said that if they outraged the feelings of the loyal people of the North there was no saying what they might do. And what would be the immediate effect of the adoption of that Resolution? Ireland was at present more prosperous and tranquil than she had been for the last four years. Fenianism was almost stamped out ; and the people were contented with a popular and impartial Government. Their dormant loyalty was aroused by the approaching visit of their future King and Queen. But at that very moment, when they had reason to hope for a new era for Ireland—an era of peace and contentment—the right hon. Gentleman threw among them his apple of discord, his firebrand of contention. The hon. Baronet the Member for Clare (Sir Colman O'Loughlen) wished that Her Majesty should have a residence in Ireland ; but would the destruction of the Church, which Her Majesty had sworn in her Coronation Oath to maintain, afford her an inducement to go and live in Ireland? And who was it that proposed to commit that great wrong? Why, the majority of seventy elected to serve and support the great Lord Palmerston, whose very name was a safeguard against violence and revolution. The shade of that great man, if he could look down upon their proceedings, would be amazed to see the man whom he had so long known as a Colleague leading the first attack upon the most sacred, the most vital, and the most revered part of our great and ancient Constitution.

MR. OSBORNE: Whatever differences of opinion may exist in this House as to the question before us, I think that every Gentleman, on whatever side he may sit, must be rejoiced at the rising talent that has been displayed in this debate. I think no one could have listened to the speech of my hon. Friend and representative the Member for the county of Tipperary (Captain White) without thinking that a very good and promising Member has been added to this House. I will go further, and say that no one could have listened to the clever, bold, but, as I believe, somewhat indiscreet speech of the hon. and gallant Officer who has just sat down, the son of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, without coming to the conclusion that, however the Irish Church may be in danger, this House, at all events, reaps the benefit of much rising ability. No man who has been long connected with or who has been long resident in what is called the sister country but must confess that the noble Lord the Mover of the Amendment was correct when he stated that the ecclesiastical arrangements of that country are in anything but a satisfactory state. Sir, I have no recent conversion to explain ; and although late events have gone on with a velocity which has left me almost a comparative Conservative, still I think we may take some credit to ourselves that by Motions brought forward in earlier times we have encouraged those Members to come forward who have hitherto been rather laggard in the race of Church Reform. I have many times brought forward this question without contemplating such enormous changes as are now proposed ; and, if I was not called a philosopher or an atheist, I was at least regarded as a revolutionist. I proposed merely to reform the Irish Church—to reduce her revenues—to make that Church congregational and not territorial. And how was I met? I was told by hon. Gentlemen on the opposite side that I was endangering the Church, and by my new coadjutors below me that it was not the proper time for such a proposal. Well, Sir, we have now got these Resolutions before us, and most important Resolutions they are ; and so great is the stake involved, and so momentous are the interests in question, that I should regret if this House came to a division on merely party grounds. Sir, I agree with my hon. and learned Friend below me, the Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck), who was formerly my instructor on the Irish Church, that so great a question as this ought not to be made the subject of a mere tournament of party. Hitherto we know Ireland has gained very little by these party Votes. She has, in fact, been sacrificed to the convenience of this House. What has happened? We have had great debates in past times on this and many other subjects ; great issues have been decided here, but very small results have been attained for Ireland. The air on that (the Ministerial) side of the House, particularly on the Government Bench, has been most relaxing to Liberal politicians; the ancient Whigs, always so wakeful in Opposition, were somewhat given to nod in Office. This question has been brought forward and debated many times in this House; it has broken up parties; it has dissolved Cabinets; it has never failed to make a great field-day for the discharge of a quantity of blank rhetorical cartridge; and when it has served the purpose of the hour it is put by in the magazine of political combustibles, and Ireland, after looking on, supposing measures were about to be brought in for her pacification, finds herself left in the lurch, with the miserable reflection that she has merely been used as the occasion for a party struggle. Well, Sir, I am a party man. I am not without my ambitious hopes; but I place party and ambition immeasurably behind this question, and I would not, for one moment, put my ambition or my hopes by the side of the well-being or the welfare of Ireland. Therefore, I say that, whatever may happen in this debate, my object in taking part in it is not to disturb those Gentlemen from the Ministerial Bench, or merely to advance this question by putting the Opposition there. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, in bringing these Resolutions under our notice, touched very lightly on the conduct of the Liberal party in the management of this Church question. I, Sir, am not very solicitous to define the conduct of the late Liberal Leaders; consistency, we all know, at this time of day has become a sort of amiable weakness. No man looks upon it as of any value. Even my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck), who described himself to-night as an imperious Englishman, has not been quite consistent in the arguments which he has held upon this subject, and I must say that if I thought as the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield thought upon this subject, I would give a directly opposite vote to that which he proposes to give. But, Sir, I am surprised the hon. and learned Member commenced this evening's discussion by saying that, though the Church was the badge of conquest—[Mr. ROEBUCK: No, no!] The hon. and learned Member said the Norman Church was the badge of conquest.—[Mr. ROEBUCK: No; the Catholic Church.] Well, then, if you said so to-night, what did you say in 1849? I am glad, Sir, that you did not call upon me sooner in the evening, as I have had time to go into the Library to refresh my recollection of a speech made by the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield in 1849. What did he then say about "the badge of conquest?" Mark you, he was not speaking of the Catholic Church, and here is what he said—

Lord Claud John Hamilton

"The Irish Protestant Church, as a badge of slavery, must be and will be utterly put down. The national feeling of Ireland is influenced by a sense of injury and of oppression; if you wish to tranquillize Ireland you must remove the badge."

But the hon. and learned Gentleman has been "educated" since then. The schoolmaster has been abroad, and he now finds it is not the Protestant Church, but the Norman Catholic Church that is the badge of conquest. I leave the hon. and learned Gentleman there; he has seen much and gone through many changes; but how he will reconcile his speech with his vote remains for his constituents at Sheffield to see. [Mr. ROEBUCK: Hear, hear!] But I deny that the Liberal party have ever been indifferent to this subject. The Liberal Leaders left the Liberal party in the lurch; but, Sir, from the time of Mr. Hume—who was the great pioneer, not only in this but in every other question which has come before and been passed by this House—the great bulk of the Liberal party has always been faithful to its colours on this question. We have always been told to wait till the proper time comes. But it came in 1833, and in 1833 the Liberal Leaders brought in their celebrated Act. And what did it do? It abolished ten Bishops, varied the taxation on certain benefices, and formed the Ecclesiastical Commission. It was a most crude and undigested project. All the anomalies remained; Bishops remained with large salaries and few duties; no care was taken to inquire into the population to see whether there was a Church population in any given district; the fact was that the Bill of 1833 was altogether incomplete, and was passed to answer a temporary requirement not for the benefit of the people of Ireland, but to give security to the Irish Establishment. The measure was never intended to be final. Then came the Appropriation Clause. How was that treated? After five years of constant majorities in this House, majorities which maintained the Church of Ireland as it stood was an injustice, and that its surplus revenues should be appropriated to local purposes in Ireland, what was done? The Whigs got into office, the question was put by on the shelf and remained there for many years. In 1849 I brought this question to the notice of Parliament; in 1856 Mr. Miall, and in 1863 and 1865 the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) also brought this question before the House, and we were then told that the time had not come to deal with the Irish Church. My right hon. Friend the Member for Oxford (Mr. Cardwell) opposed those Motions most vigorously; and an hon. Friend of mine (Sir Robert Peel) who is as remarkable for his talents as for his consistency, completely upset the Liberal party by a speech which he made under the Palmerston Government. Now we are called on to vote for these Resolutions in a party spirit. Sir, there are two distinct questions involved in these Resolutions. First, the question of disestablishment, and next the question of disendowment. I state that these are totally distinct questions. It has been remarked by a writer on the subject that men are so apt to confound their spiritual convictions with their personal interests that an attack upon the property of a Church is always more apt to cause irritation than an attack upon its doctrines. Now, I shall decline altogether to discuss this question as a mere money question. My opinion is that money is quite a secondary element in it. The Protestant clergy of Ireland—and I speak with some experience of that country from having resided there many years,—are not unpopular on account of the tithes they get. On the contrary, the Protestant clergy, so far from being objects of dislike to the people, are objects of pity. And I will tell you why: I do not go with hon. Gentlemen below me or with hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House who take what I call the “country gentleman” line of argument. If they knew as much as I do, they would know the Protestant clergy of Ireland are not capable of acting as country gentlemen. They are a pauper clergy, who have enough to do to maintain their large families. It is true, they have no congregation; but it is equally true that their incomes are so small from the multiplication of small livings and curacies that, so far from being able to act as country gentlemen, they are miserably paid. The worst feature of the Irish Church is an unequal distribution of labour and income. The policy of the Bishops of the present day is, without respect to the congregations, to get as many clergy in the different dioceses as they can, and then they say, “Look at the increase of the churches.” But who pays for the increase? It comes out of the Ecclesiastical Fund. The money granted by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners has increased; the clergy and the churches have increased; but have the congregations increased? Not by one man. I am not fond of statistics; but I will just show the House what is the spiritual staff which is in full vigour for these 693,000 Episcopalians. There are 2,428 parishes and 1,510 benefices, the latter being formed by uniting parishes together; and for these 693,000 persons what do you suppose is the staff that is kept up? Why, first of all, there are twelve Bishops, with incomes amounting to £55,000 a year. I include the two Archbishops; but, of course, there ought to be no such things as Archbishops. Very well-paid men these Bishops are. If you want reform, do not begin at the wrong end, with the unfortunate clergy; but cut down with an unsparing hand these men who are feeding sumptuously every day. These twelve Bishops have thirty-three deans, thirty-four archdeacons, twenty-six precentors, twenty-two chancellors, nine canons, 178 prebends, 1,510 beneficed clergy, and 457 curates. Why, Sir, at this rate, there ought to be 240 Bishops in England; for a single English diocese contains as many Protestants as the whole of Ireland. And further, the 4,000,000 Roman Catholics in Ireland have only 3,000 ecclesiastics, and their congregations not only maintain these, but build and support their own chapels. Now, will any educated man in his senses say that this is a state of things which ought to exist for one minute in a civilized country? But the best proof I can give of the state of the Irish Establishment, and of the necessity of a larger reform, is by referring to the diocese in which I reside. The diocese of Waterford, Lismore, Cashel, and Emly, contains less than 14,000 Protestants. These four dioceses were rolled into one in 1833, because congregations could not be got, and this bishopric numbers 13,853 Protestants. I will give them the benefit of even numbers, and call them 14,000, for I do not wish to be accused, like the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright), of suppressing Protestants. Of these 14,000 Protestants, I am a humble unit. There is a Bishop kept for me, with £4,400 a year, a dean and chapter, 106 beneficed clergy, dividing £31,000 a year, and 40 unfortunate curates, who are paid only £3,414 amongst them. Thus, for these 14,000 Protestants, there is an expenditure of £3 a head. These are figures which cannot be controverted, and the diocese of Killaloe is very nearly as bad. Indeed, there is no diocese in Ireland where you can make out a moderate case for supporting a Bishop, dean and chapter, cathedral, and so forth. With such a state of things before us, is it enough for the right hon. Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) to get up and talk in the old Tory vein about illegality and unconstitutionality? I now come to these Resolutions, and no doubt they are very strong. Nobody—least of all myself—could have imagined, after the way in which I had been opposed by the Members on that (the front Opposition) Bench, that I should find myself dragged on at their tail at this enormous pace. But how have they been met? I must say I have been very much disappointed at the course which has been pursued on the other side. I am not one of those who are in the habit of casting taunts at a successful man, and I have certainly never heard the present Prime Minister utter an illiberal sentiment or commit himself to the bigotry of any party. I was, however, greatly disappointed at the enunciation of his policy at the beginning of the Session, and still more disappointed at the unpardonable vagueness of the Foreign Secretary. “Unpardonable vagueness” was the term employed by his Law Officer. I may take this opportunity, too, of saying that I condole with the right hon. Gentleman on his Law Officers; for I certainly think they have done his Government more harm by their defence than any attacks that have proceeded from this side of the House. The argument of the noble Lord (Lord Stanley) forcibly reminded me of the old play of Richard the Third. The King asks—

Mr. Osborne

“What says Lord Stanley? Will he bring his power?”

And the Messenger answers—

“My Lord, he doth deny to come.”

Now, what said this “Defender of the Faith,” the Foreign Secretary? Why, he said he could not defend the Irish Church; but that this was an electioneering manoeuvre. He said it was the scandal of the time; but he reserved his opinion what he would do. In fact, Sir, almost in the words of his great prototype and namesake in Shakespeare, he said to this side of the House—

“Prepare thy battle early in the morning. . .
I, as I may—that which I would I cannot—
With best advantage will deceive the time,
And aid thee in this doubtful shock of arms.
But on thy side I may not be too forward.”

The noble Lord says, “That which I would I cannot,” and whether he intends to join the camp of the aspiring Richmond or leave the last of the Plantagenets, no man in this House, I venture to say, can really tell. Well, who succeeded him? Why, he was succeeded by a right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Hardy), whose great power and manly tone all must acknowledge. He rallied his party round him; but he did so by the utterance of those old Tory sentiments, which I thought had been buried long ago with the hon. Member for Warwickshire (Mr. Spooner) in Kensal Green Cemetery. The right hon. Gentleman told us that we ought not to be in a hurry. He was not going to do anything—he was not to be hurried. “The glorious light of the Reformation”—we knew all about that. It was a beautiful passage; but we were to wait and see what is in the Church Commission. Now, that Commission has always been put on the shoulders of Lord Russell, who certainly has done as much mischief in his time to the Liberal party as any man. One word upon this system of Government by Commission. The hon. Gentleman below me, the Member for Rochdale (Mr. T. B. Potter) says the Government sins are sins of Commission; and so they are; but I must say that this system of governing by Commission is an abnegation of all responsibility in Parliament. I heard with considerable alarm, the other night, the announcement of the Chief Secretary for Ireland that he was about to issue another Commission, which he called “a solemn inquiry” into the land tenure of Ireland. Now, what will be the natural consequence of issuing a Commission at the same time that you bring in a Bill? You will create perpetual irritation in Ireland; you will give rise to illusory hopes, and the Bill will not be looked upon as a final settlement. This by way of parenthesis; but what about this Commission? Lord Russell has had to answer for a great deal; but he certainly suggested something else. He proposed to enlarge the powers of the Commission, so that they might inquire how far the revenues of the Established Church could be more equitably applied for the benefit of the Irish people; but that was denied; and what is this Commission sitting for? Has it anything to do with the benefit of the Irish people? No; it was issued, and is about to report, merely for the benefit of the Irish Church and its congregations. When, therefore, we are called upon to await the Report of the Commission, I say the whole thing is a solemn inquiry which will end in a solemn farce. What is the composition of this Commission? There are nine Members, and five of them are already pledged against any material reform in the Irish Church. We all remember Sir Joseph Napier, when, as Mr. Napier, he sat for Dublin University; and we know what speeches University Members are in the habit of making. We all know what a desperate adherent of the Irish Church he was. I could read passages from his speeches which would make your hair stand on end, and which Mr. Flanagan himself, as quoted by the hon. Member for Kilkenny (Sir John Gray), could not outdo. Not content with making speeches in this House, Sir Joseph Napier is also chairman and a subscriber to what is called the Church Defence Fund of Ireland. There are three other Members of the Commission who are also subscribers, and I contend that it was most unfairly and improperly constituted. The hon. Member for Kilkenny, as I came in, took exception to Dr. Ball being upon the Commission. I certainly could not agree with him there, for Dr. Ball is one of the best men who could be appointed; he is a fair and impartial man, and was brought forward by my right hon. Friend the Member for Tamworth (Sir Robert Peel) as the Liberal candidate for the University of Dublin. But, on the whole, I say if we are to wait for the Report of this Commission, we shall wait for what will be a mere shuffling of the revenues of the Church among themselves; no real reform, no cutting down of the Establishment. Therefore the argument that we should wait for this Report is one that cannot, and ought not to be, cogent with this House for one moment. What other arguments have we heard in defence of the Church as at present constituted—this Protestant Church which the hon. Member for Sheffield thought was a badge of conquest? [Mr. ROEBUCK: No?] But formerly you did. There is another argument which I have not heard during this debate, but which formerly found favour among hon. Gentlemen opposite—that the Irish Church ought to be looked upon with great respect, because it is undoubtedly the original Church of St. Patrick. Surely at this time of day we shall not have such antiquarian pedantry brought forward, St. Patrick himself being—according to Dr. Todd—a person of whom there is very great doubt whether he ever existed. Very great doubt indeed. As to who or what he was, Dr. Todd is very dubious. We are not discussing this Church upon pedantic grounds. We have got to do with the Church as it is. Everybody knows that the original Church of Ireland had no such thing as tithes or parishes; it was more of an oriental Church, with an infinity of Bishops. Nobody knows exactly what the Irish Church was; but it certainly was very different from what it is now, and, I, therefore, put it aside altogether. Then comes another consideration, which is said to be of greater importance. The Act of Union, it is urged, forbids interference with the Church. I cannot understand anybody at this time of day getting up and saying the Act of Union is to prevent us from passing a great measure for the amelioration and contentment of Ireland. Why, what was the Act of Union? A fraudulent bargain, in which the Protestant aristocracy were bought and Catholic masses were sold. Can any argument more powerful for the destruction of the Act of Union be advanced than to say that, as long as it remains on the statute book, it is to prevent your bringing forward any measure of justice to the people of Ireland? But we are told that the 5th Article of Union is the one of special efficacy. We all know what that 5th Article is; it is the one which says that the faith, discipline, and government [An Hon. MEMBER: Doctrine.] of the Irish Church is to be for ever one with the English Church. How is the 5th Article of Union to be more stringent upon this House than the 4th? Yet the 4th, which undertook to define the number of Members which Ireland should send to this House, was altered in 1832. It was altered for the benefit of the Irish people. Why should not we be equally at liberty to alter the 5th for the benefit of the Irish people? It is a fatal argument towards the Union to say that it prevents you from doing justice to the Catholic people of Ireland. Lord Lansdowne, in “another place,” asked this question—Was he to understand that the Established Church existed for the benefit of Ireland, or Ireland for the benefit of the Established Church? That is the question to be answered in the division to which we shall go. I will not weary the House by going into any distinctions—though I could go into them at length, for I have taken some pains upon the subject—by going into distinctions between ecclesiastical and private property—to meet the hobgoblin arguments which are always brought forward to alarm landowners. All the great lawyers who have spoken upon this subject have always drawn a great distinction between corporate and private property. Dr. Arnold has a celebrated passage on this subject; from Sir James Mackintosh and Brougham I could quote probably fifty extracts on this point. Lord Macaulay says—

Mr. Osborne

“ Church revenues are partly public and partly private; an advowson coming into the hands of an individual seems to be as much his property as his house.”

I cannot understand these arguments being put forward at this time. They have always done duty on these occasions, to be sure. They did duty at the time of Catholic Emancipation, and they did duty so lately as the year 1853, when Lord Aberdeen's Government brought forward the Clergy Reserves Act of Canada, giving the Canadian Parliament power to deal with the clergy reserves in that colony. We were then told that we had no power to deal with the matter—that we could not interfere with the sacred union between Church and State. But what was the wording of that Act?

“ To make better provision for the appropriation of moneys arising from lands known as the clergy reserves, by rendering them available”—what for?—“ for municipal purposes.”

And the 3rd section of the Act begins—

“ Whereas it is desirable to remove all semblance of connection between Church and State”

I am not far enough advanced for that; I never attempted, I never have wished, to remove all connection between Church and State. But when you talk of the United Church of England and Ireland, does not any one who resides in that country know that the name is a mere Parliamentary fiction — a legal phrase — that there is no such thing as a United Church? I hear a great deal of this body of loyal Irish Protestants, well-to-do gentlemen, who are very loyal as long as you keep up their Church for them. I do not know about the North of Ireland; but in the South of Ireland, who are your Irish Protestants there? They are for the most part the descendants—respectable descendants—of an aristocracy, consisting originally of Cromwell's troopers and trumpeters. And these respectable gentlemen, whose ancestors in other days, not only derided episcopacy, but destroyed the monarchy, are now high Conservative gentry. I cannot say that they have any particular reverence for the Thirty-nine Articles; I do not think they know what they mean; but they drink the “glorious, pious, and immortal memory,” which is the one great article of their creed. And then we hear that this is the United Church of England and Ireland. I must say that one of the great inconveniences of the present state of political feeling in this House and the country is the system of what I may call gambling in Liberal stock. One Minister is perpetually outbidding the other, till all moderate measures are rendered impossible, all compromises untenable; and moderate men who wish to lead a quiet life, and to see gradual progress, are left completely behind. Now, while I go with the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) in a desire to see the Established Church disestablished, I agree with the noble Lord who moved the Amendment—the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, who has been so unhappy about home affairs—I agree with him that that Establishment is a mere empty title. Can you do nothing to remedy this without rushing to extremes? You have got at present twelve Bishops. You see what the population of Ireland is. Why not at once, without waiting for the Report of any Commission—for we have quite evidence enough—cut down the number of bishoprics to four? That was the number proposed in 1849, by the present Vice Chancellor of England, Sir William Page Wood. [An hon. MEMBER: Lord Justice.] Cut them down to four, one for each province. He proposed to give them each £1,500 a year: I will go further, and give them £2,000. I will tell you why I take that limit. You have in this country an instance of a Bishop with a population of 52,500—the greater part of whom are Churchmen—with an income of £2,000 a year, and no seat in the House of Lords—the Bishop of Sodor and Man. He has only one archdeacon. Why not model your Irish Church, if you can re-model it, after the fashion of the Bishopric of Sodor and Man? Why should any Irish Bishop be better off than your Bishop of Sodor and Man? Cut down your twelve Bishops to four, and I will show you how you can arrive at a very handsome surplus. [An hon. MEMBER: What would you do with the Archbishops?] I propose, of course, to do away with the Archbishops. Then, as to deans, and chapters, and archdeacons, that have nothing positively to do, why not reduce all these, and cut down your clergy to the real wants of the congregations, bringing them down to, say 500? [An hon. MEMBER. Too late!] I hear an hon. Member saying "Too late!" but you may depend upon it that we have an enormous work before us. Some hon. Gentlemen seem to think that this question of the Irish Church is to be disposed of by a Vote to-night or to-morrow morning. Why, Sir, I expect this business will last during our life-time. I calculate that the surplus which you might gain from the measures which I advocate would at least amount to £300,000 a year. You may ask me very fairly what I would do with it. I will not follow the example of my noble Friend the Secretary for Ireland, who just hinted what he would do. I have no objection to state my view, though my doing so may very probably cost me a contest. In the first place I view the change with considerable hesitation; knowing Ireland as I do, and knowing the poverty that exists there, I hesitate to come to any Vote that would withdraw £30,000 a year from Maynooth and take away the Regium Donum from the Presbyterians without hearing better reasons for so doing than I have heard yet, and no reasons have been given for that yet. You English Members know so little of Ireland that you go upon hard broad, and philosophic principles which are disgusting, especially to the Irish; but I would have you to learn that by leaving these people to their own efforts you may produce an ill-will and a feeling of injustice in that country which it will be difficult to allay. What can be more contradictory and unphilosophical than your whole system of governing Ireland? Take the machinery of the Church. Talk of it as a missionary Church! Why, the only mission in that country is one for which the Established Church can claim no credit. The missions in Galway and in other parts of the West of Ireland are voluntary missions from this country, and not missions of the Established Church. I understand that for those missions about £26,000 a year is sent from this country. At the same time that this missionary Church of the Establishment is to convert all the Roman Catholics, this House votes many thousands each year for educating Roman Catholics. What can be more contradictory than your whole system of governing Ireland on philosophical principles? There was one man who probably understood this question better than any one, and what he said in 1792 applies exactly to the present day, and I ask English Members to give ear to this. In a letter to Mr. Wyndham, Mr. Burke said—

Mr. Osborne

"In England the Roman Catholics are a sect; in Ireland they are a nation. This fundamental difference must affect every reason and every measure concerning them."

And he then goes on thus—

"It is a terrible thing for Government to put its confidence in a handful of people of fortune separate from the rest. A full levy is not a complete garrison, nor the disarmament of a province the destruction of disaffection."

And yet we are arguing as if the Roman Catholics were a mere sect, and were not inheritors of a national feeling. Well, it may be said that the Government are waiting for a policy. They are waiting till their Commission reports. Sir, the First Minister of the Crown, in probably one of the greatest speeches ever delivered in this House, gave a true account of the state of things in Ireland, and though he has recently described that speech as "heedless rhetoric from below the Gangway," he acknowledged one thing which I am glad to hear from him. He observed that whatever he might have said in that speech, the spirit of it was right. I am not going now to repeat the trite quotation of the right hon. Gentleman's epigrammatic saying about an alien Church. In the speech, the spirit of which he still says was right, he said—

"The greatest cause of misery in Ireland was identity of institutions with England; the very primary and most important institution of all—the union of Church and State—was opposed by the Irish people. He ventured to lay down as a principle that the Government of Ireland should be on a system the reverse of England."

We now come to policy, and this is no heedless rhetoric. If those Gentlemen below the Gangway could only speak like this now! The right hon. Gentleman said—

"His principles were Tory, the natural principles of the democracy of England." I believe it. He further said—"They might not be the principles of those consistent gentlemen whose fathers had bled in England for Charles I., and who would now support in Ireland the tyranny established by Oliver Cromwell. Let them recur to the benignant policy of Charles I., then they might settle Ireland with honour to themselves, with kindness to the people, and with safety to the realm. The Church question would be settled, he had no doubt, upon principles analogous to those which were laid down by a great statesman in 1636."

What were the principles, and who was the great statesman of 1636? The principles were those embodied in the Glamorgan treaty in 1644. It was a treaty which no one ever heard of. It was made secretly—is one which Charles I. entered into with the Irish Catholics through Lord Glamorgan. It was made "for ever," too, like the Act of Union. The 1st Article of that treaty states—

"The Roman Catholic clergy of said kingdom shall, and may from henceforth for ever, hold and enjoy all and all such lands, tenements, tithes, &c., whatsoever by them respectively enjoyed within this kingdom, or by them at any time since 23d October, 1641, and such lands, &c., belonging to the clergy within this kingdom, other than such as are actually enjoyed by His Majesty's Protestant clergy."

That was the policy recommended by the right hon. Gentleman in the speech of which he says the spirit was right. I ask him, then, why he will bind himself to a policy which he knows in his heart to be wrong? Why will he bind himself to the Establishment of this Church and State, when he knows that it embroils Ireland, and prevents any substantial union between the two countries? But it may be asked, "Will the disestablishment of the Church bring peace to Ireland?" The misfortune of all your remedies—of all your measures for the pacification of Ireland, is, that, they have been passed too late. The consequence is, the difficulty has become so complex, that by no one single measure can you hope to pacify Ireland immediately. You may talk about Fenianism. There is but one class in the country interested in keeping things as they are—and that is the Fenian conspirators. So long as you deny justice to Ireland you will have Fenian sympathizers; and the people who will encourage those who would like to see this Motion thrown out, and nothing done to Ireland, are these very Fenians. I do not think that this or any one measure would pacify Ireland. Time alone; just and impartial measures only will do that. The sins of the fathers are descending to the children. But this I know, that however delay may suit the exigencies of a Government, it is disastrous to the well-being of a nation.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: No one can have listened to the speeches made on the other side during this debate without feeling that, at all events, by most of the various speakers, two objects have been held in view. The primary object of these Resolutions and of those who have spoken in support of them has been to rally the Liberal party and put out the present Government. The secondary object has been to pass Resolutions for the disestablishment of the Protestant Church in Ireland. I must indeed except from my description some of the speeches to which we have listened to night, delivered by hon. Gentlemen opposed to our views. I except particularly the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck) and the speech we have just heard from the hon. Member for Nottingham (Mr. Osborne). These speeches, though we may find much in them to disagree with, have, at all events, been speeches addressed to the merits of the question nominally before us. But I think no one can have failed to observe—especially no one who heard the speech delivered in the early part of the evening by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe)—that very great stress is laid on what is assumed to be inconsistency and weakness in the position of the Government, and on the course taken by this or that or the other Member of the Ministry, and that this has been made quite as much the question as that which is nominally before us. Now, we who have been for some time in this House cannot complain if our opponents seek a suitable occasion to rally their party and bring about a change of Government. Nothing, indeed, can be more legitimate or more natural; and it is no matter of complaint on our part that, if they think that can bring about such a change, they should select a subject on which they are of opinion their party is likely to be united. I venture, however, to say that when the battle-field which they have chosen is one of such enormous Imperial importance as this, and when it involves interests of such great magnitude, it was the duty of those who chose that battle-field to consider at all events the nominal subject they brought forward for discussion in a more respectful and a more serious manner than the framers of these Resolutions have done. We have no objection to a great party struggle, nor have we any objection whatever to meet hon. Gentlemen opposite on the Question of the Irish Church. We are not surprised to find them differing from us with regard to the position and the future of that Church; but we do say that it is not consistent with their duty to their country that they should come forward and raise an important issue like this unless they are prepared to raise the issue in a manner which admits of its being fairly tried, and which will enable the country fairly to appreciate this serious question. For many years, according to their own confession and in their own defence, they have been telling us that they abstained from bringing forward this question—which has certainly been as important for many years past as it is now—because they were conscious of the great difficulties that beset it, and because they felt they would have been doing wrong if they raised so vast a question when they had not the means of settling it. On their own showing, therefore, they fall in their duty if they now come forward and raise the question unless they are prepared to settle it.

I venture to say that these Resolutions have been constructed, not on the principle of finding a solution of the Irish Protestant Church question; but upon the principle of drawing them up in such a manner that they shall contain a minimum of that which need be raised for the purpose of respecting the Government—that they shall contain just as much as it is possible or probable the Government will not be able to accept, and yet not contain anything which may raise difficulties among their own party. That, no doubt, is a very good system of tactics; but the House ought well to consider those tactics before the division is taken. This system has been adopted for more than twelve months in reference to this subject. We have heard something about the origin of the Commission which is now inquiring into the condition of the Irish Church. Now, what was the origin of that Commission? It was proposed by Earl Russell, the leader of the Liberal party. Notice was given of his intention to bring forward a Motion for a Commission in precisely the same terms in which the Commission has been granted. Perhaps we may be uncharitable, but we may, without any great want of charity, be allowed to conjecture that the noble Earl in giving that notice may have thought he should thereby cause some little embarrassment to the Government when the question was brought forward. For three weeks the notice stood upon the Notice Paper of the House of Lords; but within two or three days of the notice being actually brought forward, it appeared that, in some way or another, the noble Earl had discovered that the Government were perfectly prepared to issue such a Commission as he proposed. The Government had no objection to it; and they have repeatedly stated during the progress of these discussions that it was in entire conformity with their views to institute an inquiry into the present position of the Irish Protestant Church. When Earl Russell learned the determination of the Government, what did he do? He changed the terms of his Resolution, and proposed that the Commission should go further than was originally contemplated, so otherwise it would not embarrass the Government, and that words should be added to empower the Commissioners to inquire into the manner in which the revenues might be appropriated for purposes unconnected with the Established Church. The Government, however, stood firmly on their own ground, and said, "No; if you ask us for a Commission to inquire into the revenues of the Church in Ireland we will give it to you; but if you ask that the terms of the Commission should be further extended in the way you now indicate, we must decline to accede to your request." Accordingly the Commission was issued in the terms originally proposed. I do not dwell much upon this circumstance; but it is, at all events, an indication of the kind of course which has been pursued on the present occasion. We have here placed before us Resolutions which are vague in the extreme. We are asked, in the first place, to consent to an abstract Resolution which anybody may agree to without asking himself the inconvenient questions which may arise thereout. The right hon. Gentleman who brings forward this Resolution has a mind so suggestive that it is unnecessary to suppose that his course has been prompted by any inspiration but his own. Yet I think that occasionally when he was Chancellor of the Exchequer Motions have been brought forward which may have suggested the course pursued by himself on the present occasion. He frequently had to contend against Motions brought forward by independent Members on questions of taxation; but he used to meet them by saying, "It may be all very well to carry abstract Resolutions against this or the other tax; but tell me how you are to make up the deficiencies in the Revenue." The hon. Members who brought forward the Motions retorted—"That is not our business, it is your business." Well, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman now treats the House according to the method in which he himself was treated by his former opponents. He says, "Let us disestablish the Church of Ireland." We say in reply, "What is to be done with the endowments?" Whereupon he retorts, "That is not my business, it is your business." Now, this is not the position in which the House ought to be placed; and if we are to discuss this question, we must do so with a fuller knowledge than we now possess of the nature of the proposals which are by-and-by to be made. And this brings me to the position which the Government have taken in regard to this matter. The Government say—firstly, that the Resolutions are objectionable; and, secondly, that the time for bringing them forward is ill-chosen. I will consider the latter issue first. We propose to challenge the House on the question of time; and if, after hearing the reasons we adduce, you decide against us on that point, we must then meet you on the Resolutions themselves. My noble Friend the Foreign Secretary, whose course in this matter has been so much impugned by hon. Gentlemen opposite, confined himself chiefly, in the first instance, to the question of time. What he said, in effect, was that the present time and the position of the present Parliament rendered it undesirable to enter upon this wide question. Although in his Resolution he has introduced words—and has defended them—showing that we do not object to consider candidly the question of any modifications which may be necessary in the temporalities of the Establishment, yet the gist and point of his Amendment is that, in the present position of Parliament it is inexpedient that the House should enter upon this question. We have been asked whether we have changed our position in regard to this matter. My reply is that our position is not changed in the slightest degree. But when we found from the speeches delivered in this House after the speech of my noble Friend (Lord Stanley) that, in consequence of his raising that issue doubts were entertained as to what our policy would be on the main question, my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary rose and explained to the House that if we were driven to the discussion of the question we were prepared to meet them in the manner which he declared to the House. That, then, is exactly our position. When the division is called for we shall be prepared to vote with my noble Friend the Foreign Secretary on the question of time, and, if defeated upon that, we shall then be prepared to go into the general question of the Resolutions. We have been taunted and blamed for disputing the competency of the present Parliament to deal with this matter; but, in reality, we have not disputed its competency to do so. If this Parliament has sufficient time, and if the matter is fairly brought before it, it is of course perfectly competent to deal with the question; but what my right hon. Friend the First Minister said on a former occasion, and what I maintain now, is that this Parliament is under very great disadvantages and difficulties in addressing itself to a question of this sort. What is it that gives to the House of Commons its great strength? It is the circumstance that it represents public opinion. When public opinion on any great question is fairly matured, and Parliament is informed as to the state of that opinion, then Parliament brings public opinion into a focus, and gives expression to it. Legislation then takes place, not hastily, but with a full knowledge on the part of hon. Members of the feelings of the people, and in such a manner that the Legislature will not find it necessary to retrace its steps. Now, what we say is that the present Parliament was elected under circumstances which did not lead it to consider this question as one that was practically or immediately important, and that hon. Gentlemen were returned to this House uninformed as to the wishes of their constituents in regard to this matter. My right hon. Friend referred on a former occasion to the address of Lord Palmerston when this Parliament was elected. On that occasion Lord Palmerston said not a word to indicate that such a question as this was likely to be raised in the present Parliament. My right hon. Friend referred also to a speech made by the right hon. Baronet (Sir George Grey) in 1865, who showed that in the opinion of the then Government it was most extremely improbable that any such question could be raised during the existence of the present Parliament. Only the other night, too, we heard a quotation from a letter written by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone), which showed that he also at that time took the same view—namely, that the question was not immediately pressing, and that it was well beyond the range of practical politics. This Parliament was elected at a time when the question was not present to the minds of the English people, and it is not fair to legislate until we satisfy ourselves of their opinions. I do not say for a moment that we are incompetent to deal with a question of this sort; but if we do deal with it, considering that we have been elected, not after a long discussion out-of-doors on this question, but at a period when public discussion had not been begun, it is our bounden duty to our constituents to debate fully and fairly all the issues raised, and to enlighten the mind of the country with respect to them. You may think it a very simple thing to pass a Resolution for disestablishing the Irish Church. Many people may think it a remote question, or they may hardly know what the Irish Church is. Those who, acting on the advice of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe), have not studied history may believe, as he appears to do, that the Protestant Church in Ireland was created at the Union. Such persons may say, "This is a very trumpery matter. We think the Church ought to be put down." But they have not the remotest idea of what this putting down may lead to. Now, what will hon. Members who hastily give a vote upon such a question say when they go back to their constituents? If the House of Commons, in spite of the advice which we tender, is determined to go into Committee and discuss this question, we will meet them in Committee, and shall be prepared to argue. But, as the hon. Member (Mr. Osborne) said just now, "This is an enormous question," and it will take a length of time before it is thoroughly argued out. We are at the beginning of a long fight, and we have made up our minds that we shall not be doing our duty if we give up the fight before it is fairly fought out. If you take our advice—looking to the period of the Session, the amount of business we have to get through, and the desirableness of an early dissolution—you will hardly enter into the subject this Session. At the same time, if you are clearly convinced that the emergency is pressing, but the subject cannot wait, and that you are ready to deal with it, we on our part are ready to make all the sacrifices of time and of our own convenience which will be necessary for a full and fair discussion. It may be necessary, of course, somewhat to shorten our customary holidays, and prolong the Business of the House; but such questions as these will not weigh with hon. Members if we are to enter into a discussion of such magnitude as this. On one point I hope hon. Members will be determined; they will not allow this matter to be huddled up in a mere abstract Resolution, the consequences of which they cannot foresee, and will insist upon definite answers to the questions the difficulty of answering which has hitherto prevented legislation. There will be much to answer respecting questions of property, on which a good deal has been said during this debate; and much on the question of Establishment, as to which hardly anything has been said. On the first of these matters we were edified this evening by a good deal of special pleading from the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe) about what he called vested interests. I do not think that part of his speech commanded the attention of the House quite so much as the more interesting and amusing portions of his speech did. But I hope that hon. Members who heard it will bear in mind some of the distinctions of the right hon. Gentleman, even though we may all feel that he is not upon these points a guide whom the House is particularly likely to follow. We know that the right hon. Gentleman has peculiar opinions of his own about property. We remember his views in former days about musty charters and other matters of that sort; and we cannot expect that he will be extremely tender in dealing with vested interests. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to say that nobody had an interest in this matter unless, perhaps, it was the clergy, whom you could easily dispose of by pensioning them for their lives. As to the Church, that was an abstract idea which the right hon. Gentleman was hardly able to comprehend; and as to the laity, he said they have no vested rights, because you could not compensate them in money. The persons to be compensated are the owners of advowsons; and the laity, whose churches are to be taken away, are not to be compensated at all. The Irish Church, we are told, is an Establishment for the rich. The fact is, that it is supported by tithes derived from property which is in the hands of the rich, but applied to objects in which the rich have no greater vested interest than any other members of the congregation. The rich are, in fact, trustees for the congregation. Now, what is the position of the owner of an advowson? He, does not hold the advowson for his own benefit: he, too, is a trustee for the benefit of the laity, and it is his duty to select a clergyman who shall minister efficiently to the laity. Well, what are you going to do? You are going to take away the money now applied for the benefit of the laity in the maintenance of the clergy and the services of the Church, capitalizing the value of that money, and paying it in a lump sum to the owner of the advowson. And that is what you call respecting vested interests. Very likely the owner of the advowson may be an absentee, and the money now spent in Ireland will in that case be withdrawn from Ireland altogether. I think that when you come to discuss this question arguments such as these will not hold water. There are points which will require a great deal of discussion, and the views which are now so glibly put forward as to the compensation you will give and the vested interests you are going to recognize will be strictly criticized. Then, what are you going to do with the property of the Church? That is the great question which the right hon. Gentleman himself asked in 1865. He has not absolutely answered it now; but, so far as we can glean from his statement, the money is to be devoted to secular uses, or, as he vaguely says, to some Irish object. What in the world does that mean? There is one Irish object which we often hear of. I rather think we are told it is in the Act of Union. It is that the money should be spent upon Cork harbour. Are you going to take the property of the Irish Church, which now supports churches in Connanght or in Ulster, and spend it upon Cork harbour. Then there is an object frequently mentioned in the Committee which sat some years ago upon Irish Taxation, and that is the injustice which Ireland suffers from the high rate of spirit duties. Perhaps if the general benefit of Ireland is to be consulted in the appropriation of Church property, some of it will be applied in the reduction of the duty on whisky. This at all events is clear—you are not to give any of this money to the Roman Catholics. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe) dislikes the Protestant Church much, but apparently dislikes the Roman Catholic Church still more. Whatever else we are to do with the money, we are to give nothing to them. The right hon.

Sir Stafford Northcote

Sir Stafford Northcote

Gentleman probably judges their feelings by his own. The Protestant Church is to be stripped, and he may think that they do not care whether they get a share of the spoil or not. They are not to have any generous assistance for their Universities, for their denominational education, or for any of those objects which I believe they have at heart. "These things are abominations," we are told, "but whatever you do, take away this property from the Church, and for Heaven's sake don't conciliate the Catholics." That is what the right hon. Gentleman calls a truly Liberal policy, and I believe, in the sense in which those words are sometimes used, it is a truly liberal policy—that is to say, it is a policy of being liberal at the expense of somebody else. Ireland says, "You have injured us by bad laws, though that is a thing of the past, and we ask for some compensation." "Give us," some say, "a re-settlement of the land question." "Give us," say others, "some advantages in the matter of taxation, or in the matter of expenditure, or in grants for education." "Give us," says another section, "a denominational system of education for ourselves. Give us a University which will meet our wants." But upon all these questions the great Liberal party are greatly divided. They cannot be brought together on any of these points. All they are agreed on is this; they say, "Take away the Irish Protestant Church;" and, as in former days when two nations were about to make up their quarrel, they propose to cement their union by offering up a victim on the altar of friendship. There was one thing very remarkable in the course of this debate, and that was the difference in the tone of hon. Gentlemen opposite. Take, for example, the speeches of the right hon. Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe) and the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright). In the speech of the hon. Member for Birmingham there was an evident desire to tranquillize Ireland, to do something which, at all events, might give satisfaction to the great body of the people. But the tone of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne was quite the contrary. That right hon. Gentleman would only throw in elements of strife; he would not treat Irish dissatisfaction with soothing remedies, but rather by a method of counter irritation. He would not pacify the Catholics, he would irritate the Protestants. And then the right hon. Gentleman talked about the Establishment, and said, "We do not want an ment in Ireland, because Ireland is a different country, and its system is adapted for the country. And he spoke of the Church as voluntaries. But I want to ask Roman Catholic Members whether they consider their Church an Established Church? If an Establishment is only a money question, I would be in the position of the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland is that of a voluntary Church. [Mr. STUART MILL: Hear, hear!] The hon. Member for Westminster (Mr. Stuart Mill) thinks that money is the thing involved in an Establishment. Very far from it. That is almost the only point that has been dwelt on in debate; but there are many others which will be necessary to raise before we have done with this subject. We must hear, not only about the property, but about the form of worship and the discipline which are necessary for an Establishment, and upon these points not a word has been heard from the right hon. Gentleman who has brought forward these Resolutions. Now, will he tell us when he has disestablished the Protestant Church of Ireland, whether that Church is to continue an Episcopalian Church or not? And, if so, if she is to have Bishops, by whom are they to be appointed? Are they to be elected by the congregations, or appointed by the Crown? To what law are they to be subject, and in what way are you going to insure uniformity of doctrine and worship in that Church? Remember that these are not in the present day mere matters of form; they are very important questions, which will undoubtedly be raised in substance; and it seems to me that one of the great difficulties we have to contend with, and upon which, before this matter is finally settled, we must have a distinct and categorical answer, is, in what position is the Established Church in Ireland to be when it comes to be disestablished with respect to the questions of discipline, doctrine, and form of government? We do not want to have another South Africa in Ireland; and I think that English Churchmen who are apt to look upon this question as a thing apart, and to say that it would rather strengthen than weaken the Church of England if the Irish branch of the Church were disestablished, have hardly pictured to themselves what would happen if this long-established branch of their own Church were destroyed. For, do what you will, these Churches are united. Suppose different articles and formularies were by-and-by adopted by Conventions in that Church—a danger restricted and prohibited by the conditions of an Establishment—and that the Church in England was prevented from following the example of her freer sister, what would be the consequence? I venture to say that there would arise a state of things which in a short time would be found to be intolerable. Suppose, for instance, that such questions sprang up as those that were lately raised in the Ecclesiastical Courts in this country, and that certain decisions were given as to the effect of the Articles of the Church of England which were unsatisfactory to a great number of its members, who, nevertheless, would be precluded from making any alterations in those Articles, and suppose our brethren in Ireland entertaining similar opinions were to alter their formularies, what think you would be the effect of that upon the people of the Church of England? I venture to say that the consequences would be such as the advocates of disestablishment are not altogether prepared for. To certain minds, no doubt, they may seem good, and that this enfranchisement of the Church from the restrictions imposed by the State in Ireland can do no harm; but to me it appears that the effect would be to produce such excitement here as would aggravate and intensify all the evils that we are at present troubled by; and members of the Church of England must make up their minds that in destroying the Established Church in Ireland they are striking at the root of the Established Church in England also. I do not put it now upon the miserable presumptions à fortiori argument. I do not say that, because your neighbour's property is taken, you must look after your own, though the same principles that are recognized as an excuse for taking away the property of the Established Church in Ireland may of course be used with equal effect in England also. I do not put it upon that ground; but I say this—if you open the vents, you let out the waters of controversy between Church and State to an extent you are not prepared for. The discussion we are now upon is, whether it is desirable to go into Committee at this time; and the reason why I have entered upon these questions is to show the House the enormous extent of the ground we shall have to cover if we do go into Committee. For, although right hon. Gentlemen may say, "If you into Committee, you will merely have to vote my first Resolution, and the others which are to give effect to it," he cannot say that he will prevent these questions from being fully discussed before he embodies his proposals in a measure. Therefore we feel it our duty to warn the House and to take its sense whether it is desirable — when we are approaching the Easter holydays, and the state of business is so little advanced—to enter upon this extensive field of controversy. But if the House, after full consideration, decides to go into Committee, we shall then be ready to enter upon the discussion, and depend upon it these questions shall be fully and fairly argued, and all the collateral issues raised, before the whole matter is allowed to conclude.

Sir Stafford Northcote

MR. COLERIDGE moved the adjournment of the debate.

